Philpot. Yes, my lord, it is soon answered, if you will consider all the words of Cyprian; for he speaketh of such as in his time were faithful at Rome, and followed the doctrine of St. Paul, as he had taught them, and as it was notified throughout the world, by an epistle which he had written in the commendation of their faith. With such as are praised by St. Paul at Rome, for following the true faith, misbelief can have no place. And if you can shew, that the faith which the church of Rome holdeth now, is that faith which the apostle praised and allowed in the Romans in his time, then will I say what St. Cyprian then said, and with you, That infidelity can have no place there; but otherwise it maketh not absolutely for the authority of the church of Rome, as you do mistake it.

Christopherson. You understand Cyprian well indeed; I think you never read him in your life?

Philpot. Yes, Mr. Doctor, that I have, I can shew you a book noted with mine own hand: though I have not read so much as you, yet I have read somewhat. It is a shame for you to rest and wreath the doctors as you do, to maintain a false religion, which be altogether against you, if you take them aright; and indeed your false packing of doctors together hath given me and others occasion to look upon them, whereby we find you shameful liars, and mis-reporters of the ancient doctors.

Morgan. What, will you be in hand to allow doctors now? They of your sect do not so. I marvel therefore that you will allow them.

Philpot. I do allow them inasmuch as they do agree with the scriptures, and so do all they which are of the truth, howsoever you term us, and I praise God for that good understanding I have received by them.

Christopherson. What? you understand not the doctors, you may be ashamed to say it.

Philpot.

Philpot. I thank God, I understand them better than you: for you have Excœdationem cordis, The blindness of heart; so that you understand not truly what you read, no more than the wall here, as your taking of Cyprian doth declare. And, before God, you are but deceivers of the people, for all the brag you make of learning; neither have you scripture or ancient doctor on your side, being truly taken.

Morgan. Why, all the doctors are on our side, and against you altogether.

Philpot. Yea, so you say when you are in your pulpits alone, and none to answer you. But if you will come to cast accounts with me thereof, I will venture with you a recantation, that I (as little fight as I have in the doctors) will bring more authorities of ancient doctors on my side than you shall be able for your's, and he that can bring most, to him let the other side yield. Are you willing so to do?

Christopherfon. It is but folly to reason with you, you will believe no man but yourself.

Philpot. I will believe you or any other learned man, if you can bring any thing worthy to be believed. You cannot win me with vain words from my faith. Before God there is no truth in you.

Morgan. What, no truth? No truth? ha, ha, ha!

Philpot. Except the articles of the Trinity, you are corrupt in all other things, and sound in nothing.

Morgan. What say you, do we not believe well on the sacrament?

Philpot. It is the thing which (among all others) you do most abuse.

Morgan. Wherein I pray you? tell us.

Philpot. I have told you before, Mr. Doctor, in the convocation-house.

Morgan. Yes marry: indeed you told us there very well. For there you fell down upon your knees, and fell to weeping, ha, ha, ha!

Philpot. I did weep indeed, and so did Christ upon Jerusalem, and am not to be blamed for it, if you consider the cause of my weeping.

Morgan. What, make you yourself Christ? ha, ha, ha!

Philpot. No, sir, I make not myself Christ; but I am not ashamed to do as my master and Saviour did, to bewail and lament your infidelity and idolatry, which I there foresaw through tyranny you would bring again to this realm, as this day doth declare.

Morgan. That is your argument.

Christopherfon. Wherein do we abuse the sacrament? tell us.

Philpot. As I may touch but one of the least abuses, you administer it not in both kinds as you ought to do, but keep the one half from the people, contrary to Christ's institution.

Christopherfon. Why, is there not as much contained in one kind, as in both? And what need is it then to minister in both kinds?

Philpot. I believe not so: for if it had, Christ would have given but one kind only; for he instituted nothing superfluous: and therefore you cannot say that the whole effect of the sacrament is as well in one kind as in both, since the scripture teacheth otherwise.

Christopherfon. What if I can prove it by scripture, that we may administer it in one kind? The apostles did so, as it may appear in the Acts of the Apostles in one or two places, where it is written, that the apostles continued "in prayers and in breaking of bread," which is meant of the sacrament.

Philpot. Why, Mr. Doctor, do you not know that St. Luke, by making mention of breaking of bread, meaneth the whole use of the sacrament according to Christ's institution, by a figure which you have learned in grammar, Synecdoche, where part is mentioned, and the whole understood to be done, as Christ commanded it?

Christopherfon. Nay, that is not so: for I can shew you out of Eusebius, in his Ecclesiastical history, that there was a man of God, whom he named, that sent the sacrament in one kind by a boy, to one that was sick.

Philpot. I have read indeed that they did use to give what was left of the communion-bread to children, to mariners, and to women, and so perverture the boy might carry a piece of what was left to the sick man.

Christopherfon. Nay, as a sacrament it was purposely sent unto him.

Philpot. If it were so, yet you cannot precisely say, that he had not the cup administered unto him also by some sent unto him: but though one man did use it thus, doth it follow that all men may do the like? St. Cyprian noteth many abuses of the sacrament in his time, which rose upon singular men's examples, as using of water instead of wine: therefore he saith, "We must not look what any man hath done before us, but what Christ first of all did and commanded."

Christopherfon. Hath not the church taught us so to use the sacrament? And how do we know that Christ is Homousios, that is, of one substance with the Father, but by the determination of the church? How can you prove that otherwise by express words of scripture, and where find you Homousios in all the scripture?

Philpot. Yes, that I do in the first of the Hebrews, where it is written that Christ is the express image of God's own substance, Ejusdem substantiæ.

Christopherfon. Nay, that is not so. That is, there is no more but Expressa imago substantiæ, The express image of God's substance, and image is accident.

Philpot. It is in the text, Of his substance, Substantiæ illius, or his own substance, as it may be right well interpreted. Besides this, that which Christ spake of himself in St. John manifesteth the same, saying, I and the Father be one thing, Ego & Pater unum sumus. And wherers you say, Imago here is an accident, the ancient fathers use this for a strong argument to prove Christ to be God, because he is the very image of God.

Christopherfon. Do they? Is this a good argument, Because we are the image of God, therefore we are God?

Philpot. We are not called the express image of God, as it is written of Christ, and we are but the image of God by participation; and as it is written in Genesis, We are made to the likeness and similitude of God. But you ought to know, Mr. Christopherfon, that there is no accident in God, and therefore Christ cannot be the image of God, but he must be of the same substance with God.

Christopherfon. Tush.

Morgan. How say you to the presence of the sacrament? Will you stand here to the judgment of your book, or no? Or will you recant?

Philpot. I know you go about to catch me in words. If you can prove that book to be my setting forth, lay it to my charge when I come to judgment.

Morgan. Speak, are you of the same mind as this book is of, or no? Sure I am you were once, unless you are become another manner of man than you were.

Philpot. What I was, you know; what I am, I will not tell you now: but this I will say to you by the way, that if you can prove the sacrament of the mass (as you now use it) to be a sacrament, I will then grant you a presence; but first you must prove the same a sacrament, and afterward treat of the presence.

Morgan. Ho, do you doubt that it is a sacrament?

Philpot. I am past doubting, for I believe you can never be able to prove it a sacrament.

Christopherfon. Yea, do you? Good Lord, doth not St. Augustine call it the sacrament of the altar? How say you to that?

Philpot. That maketh nothing for the probation of your sacrament. For so he with other ancient writers do call the holy communion or supper of the Lord, in respect that it is the sacrament of the sacrifice which Christ offered upon the altar of the cross, which sacrifice all the altars and sacrifices done upon the altars in the old law did prefigure and shadow, which pertaineth nothing to your sacrament hanging upon your altars of lime and stone.

Christopherfon.

Christopherfon. Doth it not? I pray you, what signifieth Altar?

Philpot. Not as you falsely take it, materially, but for the sacrifice of the altar of the cross.

Christopherfon. Where find you it ever so taken?

Philpot. Yes, that I do in St. Paul to the Hebrews, the thirteenth chapter, where he saith, "We have an altar, of which it is not lawful for them to eat that serve the tabernacle." Is not altar in this place taken for the sacrifice of the altar, and not for the altar of lime and stone?

Christopherfon. Well, God blefs me out of your company. You are such an obstinate heretic, as I have not heard the like.

Philpot. I pray God keep me from such blind doctors, who when they are not able to prove what they say, then fall to reviling (as you do now) for lack of better proof. In the mean while the bishop of London was talking with some other hard by, and at length came in to supply his part, and said:

Bonner. I pray you, masters, hearken to what I shall say to this man. Come hither, Mr. Green: and now, fir, (pointing to me) you cannot think it sufficient to be wicked yourself, but must go about to procure this young gentleman by your letters to do the like.

Philpot. My lord, he cannot say that I ever hitherto wrote unto him concerning any such matter, as he here can testify.

Green. No, you never wrote unto me.

Bonner. Why, is not this your letter which you did write concerning him?

Philpot. This letter was written by a friend and not by me; it was not written to Mr. Green, neither was he privy to the writing thereof.

Bonner. How say you then, if a man be in an error, and you know thereof, what are you bound to do in such a case?

Philpot. I am bound to do the best I can to bring him out of it.

Bonner. If Mr. Green here be in the like, are you not bound to reform him thereof if you can?

Philpot. Yes, that I am, and will do the uttermost of my power therein.

But the bishop remembering himself, thinking that he would but shrewdly after his expectation be holpen at my mouth, but rather confirmed in that which he called an error, ceased to go any further in his demand, and called Mr. Green aside, and before his register read him a letter, I know not the contents thereof: and therewithal he gave Mr. Green the book of my disputation in the convocation-house, and afterwards went aside, communing with Mr. Christopherfon, leaving Mr. Morgan, Mr. Harpsfield, and Mr. Cofins, to reason with me in the hearing of Mr. Green.

Morgan. Mr. Philpot, I would ask you how old your religion is?

Philpot. It is older than your's by a thousand years and more.

Morgan. I pray you, where was it fifty years ago?

Philpot. It was in Germany apparent by the testimony of Hufs, Jerome of Prague, and Wickliffe, whom your generation an hundred years ago and more did burn for preaching the truth unto you; and before their time and since hath been, although under persecution it hath been put to silence.

Morgan. That is a marvellous strange religion, which no man can tell certainly where to find it.

Philpot. It ought to be no marvel unto you to see God's truth through violence oppressed; for so it hath been from the beginning from time to time, as it appeareth by history, and as Christ's true religion is now to be found here in England, although hypocrisy hath by violence the upper hand. And in the Revelations you may see it prophesied, that the true church should be driven into corners, and into the wilderness, and suffer great persecutions.

Morgan. Ah, are you versed in the Revelations? there are many strange things therein.

Philpot. If I tell you the truth which you are not able to refute, believe it, and dally not out so earnest matters: methinks you are more like a scoffer in a play, than a reasonable doctor to instruct a man; you have no fease of shame, but dance naked in a net, and see not your own nakedness.

Morgan. I pray you, be not so quick with me, let us talk a little more calmly together.

Philpot. I will talk with you as mildly as you can desire, if you will speak learnedly and charitably. But if you go about with taunts to delude the truth, I will not hide it from you.

Morgan. Why will not you submit your judgment to the learned men of this realm?

Philpot. Because I see they can bring no good ground whereupon I may with a good conscience settle my faith, more surely than on that which I am now grounded upon by God's manifest word.

Morgan. Can they not? It is marvellous that so many learned men should be deceived.

Philpot. It is not marvellous to St. Paul, for he saith, "That not many wise, neither many learned after the world be called to the knowledge of the gospel."

Morgan. Have you then alone the Spirit of God, and not we?

Philpot. I say not that I alone have the Spirit of God, but as many as abide in the true faith of Christ, have the Spirit of God as well as I.

Morgan. How know you that you have the Spirit of God?

Philpot. By the faith of Christ which is in me.

Morgan. Ah, by faith do you so? I think it is the spirit of the buttry, which your fellows have had that have been burned before you, who were drunk the night before they went to their death, and I believe went drunken unto it.

Philpot. It appeareth by your communication, that you are better acquainted with the spirit of the buttry than with the Spirit of God; wherefore I must now tell thee, thou painted wall and hypocrite, in the name of the living Lord, whose truth I have told thee, that God shall rain fire and brimstone upon such scornors of his word and blasphemers of his people as thou art.

Morgan. What, you rage now.

Philpot. Thy foolish blasphemies have compelled the Spirit of God, which is in me, to speak that which I said to thee, thou enemy of all righteousness.

Morgan. Why do you judge me so?

Philpot. By thine own wicked words I judge of thee, thou blind and blasphemous doctor; for as it is written, "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." I have spoken in God's behalf, and now I have done with thee.

Morgan. Why then I tell thee, Philpot, thou art an heretic, and shalt be burned for thine heresy, and afterwards go to hell-fire.

Philpot. I tell thee, thou hypocrite, that I mind not thy threats of fire and faggots, neither, I thank God my Lord, stand in fear of the same: my faith in Christ shall overcome them. But the hell-fire with which thou threatenest me, is thy portion, and is prepared for thee, (unless thou speedily repent) and for such hypocrites as thou art.

Morgan. What, thou speakest upon wine, thou hast tippled well to-day by appearance.

Philpot. So said the cursed generation to the apostles, being replenished by the Holy Ghost, and speaking the wondrous works of God; they said they were drunk, when they had nothing else to say, as thou dost now.

Morgan. Why, I am of opinion I am able to answer thee.

Philpot. So it seemeth, with blasphemies and lies.

Morgan. Nay, even with learning, say what thou canst.

Philpot. That appeared well at my disputation in the convocation-house, where thou didst undertake to answer those few arguments I was permitted to make, and yet were not able to answer one; but in thine answers did fumble and flammer, that the whole house was ashamed of thee: and the final conclusions of all thine answers answers was, that thou couldst answer me if I were in the schools at Oxford.

Morgan. What, did I so? thou beliefst me.

Philpot. I do not belie thee, the book of the report of the disputation beareth record thereto, and all that were present then can tell thou sayedst so, if they list. And I tell thee plain, thou art not able to answer that Spirit of truth which speaketh in me for the defence of Christ's true religion.

Morgan. Why, have I not answered thee in all things thou hast said unto me? I take them to record.

Philpot. Ask my fellow whether I be a thief.

Cofins. Hark, he maketh us all thieves.

Philpot. You know that phrase of the proverb, that like will hold with like. And I am sure you will not judge with me against him, speak I ever so true; and in this sense I speak it. The strongest answer that he hath made against me is, that you will burn me.

Morgan. Why, we do not burn you, it is the temporal men that burn you, and not we.

Philpot. Thus you would (as Pilate did) wash your hands of all your wicked doings. But, I pray you, call upon the secular power to be executioners of your unrighteous judgments. And have you not a title in your law, To burn heretics?

Harpfield. I have heard you both a good while reason together, and I never heard so stout an heretic as you are, Mr. Philpot.

Cofins. Nor I, in all my life.

Philpot. You are not able to prove me an heretic, by one jot of God's word.

Harpfield. You have the spirit of arrogancy, I will reason with you no more. And so he was departing, and Mr. Cofins also. And with that the bishop and Christopherson came in again, and said:

Bonner. Mr. Doctor, how doth this man and you agree?

Morgan. My lord, I do ask him where his church was fifty years ago.

Bonner. Are you not half agreed? as one man said once to two parties, in whom the one was equally disagreeing from the other.

Christopherson. It is but folly to reason with him any further, for he is incurable.

Bonner. Well, then let his keeper have him away. And with that Dr. Chedsey led me a way by which we could not pass, and therefore came back again through the bishop's chamber, where all these doctors were clustered together: and as I was passing by, the bishop took me by the gown, and said, Know you what Mr. Christopherson telleth me? I pray you, Mr. Christopherson, rehearse the sentence in Latin; and so he did: the contents whereof were, That an heretic would not be won.

Christopherson. St. Paul saith; "Fly an heretic after once or twice warning."

All the Doctors. Yea, my lord, it is best you so do, and trouble your lordship no more with him.

Philpot. You must first prove me justly to be an heretic, before you use the judgment of St. Paul against me: for he speaketh of such as hold opinion against the manifest word, which you cannot prove by me.

You are the heretics which so stoutly and stubbornly maintain so many things directly against God's word, as God in his time will reveal. As I went out of his chamber, the bishop called me aside, and said:

Bonner. What didst thou mean by writing in the beginning of thy bible, "The Spirit is the vicar of Christ on the earth?" I suppose you have some special meaning therein.

Philpot. My lord, I have no other meaning than as I have told you already, That Christ, since his ascension, worketh all things in us by his Spirit, and by his Spirit doth dwell in us. I pray you, let me have my bible, with other lawful books and writings which you have of mine, whereof many of them be none of mine, but lent to me by my friends.

Bonner. Your bible you shall not have, but I will perhaps let you have another, and after I have perused the rest you shall have such as I think good.

Philpot. I pray your lordship then, that you would let me have candle-light.

Bonner. To what purpose, pray?

Philpot. The nights be long, and I would fain occupy myself, and not spend my time idly.

Bonner. Then you may pray.

Philpot. I cannot well say my prayers without light.

Bonner. Can you not say your Pater-noster without a candle? I tell you, you shall have some meat and drink of me, but candles you shall have none.

Philpot. I had rather have candles than your meat and drink; but seeing I shall not have my request, the Lord shall be my light.

Bonner. Have him down.

Chedsey. I will bring him to his keeper, my lord. I am sorry you will so wilfully cast yourself away, whereas you might live worshipfully: do you not think that others have souls to be saved?

Philpot. Every man shall receive according to his own doings. Sure I am that you are deceived, and maintain a false religion; and as for my casting away, I wish my burning day was to-morrow, for this delay is every day to die, and yet not be dead.

Chedsey. You are not like to die yet.

Philpot. I am the more sorry thereof. But the will of God be done of me to his glory, Amen.

The twelfth examination took place on the 4th of December, before the bishops of London, Worcester, and Bangor, in the chapel of the palace; three of the chaplains having before called him to hear mass, from which he excused himself, as being excommunicate. Having stated that it was for contumacy, and that the bishop would dispense with him if he would come, he replied that the bishop had no power to do it, not being his ordinary. After mass, being brought into the chapel, in the presence of the register, the bishop of London called upon him to say, why sentence should not be pronounced against him as an heretic, though, as Mr. Philpot said, no witnesses had been examined, which was against their own law. After retiring for an hour, he was again sent for, the bishops of Worcester and Bangor being present, they severally addressed him; when he replied particularly to the bishop of Bangor, who had said that the protestant religion had been set forth by violence and tyranny; retorting that their religion was supported by violence; and that the protestant religion was in Germany long before it found its way into England. He admitted, that he agreed with the true catholic church, and held a real and essential presence by the Spirit of God in the right administration. After farther conversation after dinner with the bishop of Worcester, who seemed to incline towards him most, Dr. Chedsey and the archdeacon of Oxford, and others, on his departure, came to him; whereupon Dr. Chedsey proposed to prove, that the church of Rome had its foundation and being, by the scriptures, by the apostles, and by the primitive church, confirmed by the blood of martyrs, and with the testimony of all confessors. In this Mr. Philpot heartily agreed; but when it came to the proof, which he attempted from St. Austin, he was able to shew none, but for want of it slipped into a by-matter, making himself ridiculous and shameless.

The THIRTEENTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, before the Archbishop of YORK, and other Bishops.

THE Thursday after, I was called in the morning before the archbishop of York, the bishop of Chichester, the bishop of Bath, and the bishop of London. The bishop of Chichester being first come, began to talk with me.

Chichester. I am come of good will to talk with you, to instruct you what I can, to come to the catholic church, and to exhort you to instruct your own judgment, and to learn first to have humility, and by the same to learn first to have humility, and by the same to learn of others that be better learned than you, as they did learn of such as were their betters before them.

Philpot. We must be taught of God, and I will with all humility learn of them that will inform me by God's word, what I have to do. I confess I have but little learning in respect of you, that both of your years and great exercise do excel therein: but faith consisteth not in learning, but in the simplicity which God's word teacheth. Therefore I shall be glad to hear both of your lordship, and of any other, (that God hath revealed unto by his word) the true doctrine thereof, and to thank you that it doth please you to take pains herein.

Chichester. You take the first alledged amiss, as though all men should be taught by inspiration, and not by learning. How do we believe the gospel, but by the authority of the church, and because the same hath allowed it?

Philpot. St. Paul saith, "He learned not the gospel by men, neither of men, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." Which is a plain and sufficient proof that the gospel taketh not it's authority of man, but of God only.

Chichester. St. Paul speaketh but of his own knowledge how he came thereto.

Philpot. Nay, he speaketh of the gospel generally, "which cometh not from man, but from God;" and that the church must only teach that which cometh from God, and not man's precepts.

Chichester. Doth not St. Augustine say these words, "I would not believe the gospel, if the authority of the church did not move me thereto."

Philpot. I grant the authority of the church doth move the unbelievers to believe; but yet the church doth not give the word it's authority; for the word hath it's authority only from God, and not of men; men be but disposers thereof. For first the word had it's being before the church, and the word is the foundation of the church, and first is the foundation sure, before the building thereon can be steadfast.

Chichester. I perceive you mistake me, I speak of the knowledge of the gospel, and not of the authority; for by the church we have all knowledge of the gospel.

Philpot. I confess that; for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. And I acknowledge that God appointeth an ordinary means for men to come unto the knowledge now, and not miraculously, as he hath done in times past; yet we that be taught by men, must take heed that we learn nothing else but that which was taught in the primitive church by revelation. Here came in the bishops of York and Bath; and after they had saluted one another, and communed a while together, the archbishop of York called me unto them, saying,

York. Sir, we hearing that you are out of the way, are come of charity to inform you, and to bring you into the true faith, and to the catholic church again; willing you first to have humility, and to be humble and willing to learn of your betters, for else we can do no good with you. And God saith by his prophet, "On whom shall I rest but on the humble and meek, and such as tremble at my word?" Now if you be so, we shall be glad to travel with you.

Philpot. I know that humility is the door whereby we enter unto Christ; and I thank his goodness I have entered in at the same unto him, and with all humility will hear whatsoever truth you shall speak unto me.

York. What be the matters you stand on, and require to be satisfied in?

Philpot. My lord, if it shall please your grace, we were entered into a good matter before you came, of the church and how should we know the truth but by the church?

York. Indeed that is the head we ought to begin at, for the church being truly known, we shall sooner agree in particular things.

Philpot. If your lordships can prove the church of Rome to be true catholic church, it will do much to persuade me towards what you would have me incline unto.

York. Why, let us go to the definition of the church. What is it?

Philpot. It is a congregation of people dispersed throughout the world, agreeing together in the word of God, using the sacraments, and all other things according to the same.

York. Your definition is of many words to no purpose.

Philpot. I do not precisely define the church, but declare unto you what I think the church is.

York. Is the church visible or invisible?

Philpot. It is both visible and invisible. The invisible church is of the elect of God only; the visible consists both of good or bad, using all things in faith, according to God's word.

York. The church is an universal congregation of faithful people in Christ throughout the world; which this word catholic doth well express; for what is catholic else? doth it not signify universal?

Philpot. The church is defined by St. Augustine to be called catholic in this wise, "The church is called therefore catholic, because it is truly perfect, and lacketh in nothing."

York. Nay, it is called catholic, because it is universally received of all christian nations, for the most part.

Philpot. The church was catholic in the apostles time, yet was it not universally received of the world; but because their doctrine which they had received of Christ was perfect, and appointed to be preached and received of the whole world, therefore it is called the catholic faith, and all persons receiving the same, to be counted the catholic church. And St. Augustine in another place writeth, that the catholic church is that which believeth aright.

York. If you will learn, I will shew you St. Augustine, writing against the Donatists, that he proveth the catholic church by two principal points, which is, universality and succession of bishops, in one apostolical see, from time to time. Now thus I will make mine argument.

The church of Rome is universal, and hath her succession of bishops from time to time.

Therefore, it is the catholic church.

How answer you to this argument?

Philpot. I deny the antecedent, that the catholic church is only known by universality and succession of bishops.

York. I will prove it, and with that he brought forth a book, which he had noted out of the doctors, and turned to his common places therein of the church, and recited one or two out of St. Augustine, especially out of his epistle written against the Donatists, where St. Augustine manifestly proveth, that the Donatists were not the catholic church, because they have no succession of bishops in their opinion, neither universality; and the same force hath St. Augustine's argument against you.

Philpot. My lord, I have weighed the force of that argument before now, and I perceive it maketh nothing against me, neither cometh it to your purpose; for I will stand to the trial of St. Augustine for the approbation of the catholic church whereof I am. For St. Augustine speaketh of universality joined with verity, and of faithful successors of Peter before corruption came into the church. And so if you can deduce your argument for the see of Rome now, as St. Augustine might do in his time, I would say it might be of some force, otherwise not.

York. St. Augustine proveth the catholic church principally by succession of bishops, and therefore you understand not St. Augustine. For what, I pray you, was the opinion of the Donatists, against whom he wrote, can you tell? what country were they of?

Philpot. They were a certain sect of men, affirming, among other heresies, that the dignity of the sacraments depended upon the worthiness of the minister; so that if the minister was good, the sacraments which he ministered were available, or else not.

Chichester. That was their error, and they had none other other but that. And he read another authority of St. Austin, out of a book which he brought, even to the same purpose that the other was.

Philpot. I challenge St. Austin to be with me thoroughly in this point, and will stand to judgment, taking one place with another.

Chichester. If you will not have the church to be certain, I pray you by whom will you be judged in matters of controversy.

Philpot. I do not deny the church to be certain; but I deny that it is necessarily tied to any place, longer than it abideth in the word; and for all controversies the word ought to be judge.

Chichester. But what if I take it one way, and you another, how then?

Philpot. St. Austin sheweth a remedy for that, and willeth, "That one place of the scripture ought to be understood by the majority."

York. How answer you to this argument?

Rome hath known succession of bishops, which your church hath not.

Therefore, that is the catholic church, and your's is not, because there is no such succession can be proved in your church.

Philpot. I deny, my lord, that succession of bishops is an infallible point to know the church by: for there may be a succession of bishops known in a place, and yet there be no church, as at Antioch and Jerusalem, and in other places where the apostles abode as well as at Rome. But if you put to the succession of bishops, succession of doctrine withal, as St. Austin doth, I will grant it to be a good proof for the catholic church; but a local succession only is nothing available.

Bath. If you be of the true catholic church, then will you hold with the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, which the true church hath ever maintained.

Philpot. And I, my lord, with the true church, do hold the same in the due administration of the sacrament; but I desire you, my lord, there may be made a better conclusion in our first matter, before we enter into any other; for if the church be proved, we shall soon agree in the rest. In the mean while my lord of York was turning his book for more places to help his cause.

York. I have found at length a very notable place, which I have looked for all this while, of St. Austin, De simplicitate credendi.

After he had read the sentence, he said, that by four special points St. Augustine here proveth the catholic church. The first is by consent of all nations; the second, by the apostolic see; the third, by universality; and the fourth, by this word catholic.

Philpot. I pray you, my lord, of what church doth St. Augustine write the same, of Rome, or not?

York. Yea, he writeth of the church of Rome.

Philpot. I will lay your lordship as much as I have; that it is not so; and let the book be seen.

Bath. What art thou able to lay? Thou hast nothing.

York. Doth he not make mention here of the apostolic see, whereby he meaneth Rome?

Philpot. That is very straightly interpreted, my lord, as though the apostolic see had been no where else but at Rome. But let it be at Rome; and yet you shall never verify the same, unless all the other conditions do go therewith, as St. Augustine doth proceed withal, whereof none, except the apostolic see, can now be verified of the church of Rome. For the faith which that see now maintaineth hath not the consent of all nations, neither hath had. Besides that, it cannot have the name of catholic, because it differeth from the catholic churches which the apostles planted, almost in all things.

York. Nay, he goeth about here to prove the catholic church by universality; and how can you shew your church to be universal fifty or an hundred years ago?

Philpot. That is not material, neither any thing against St. Augustine: for my church (whereof I am) were to be accounted universal, though it were but in ten persons, because it agreeth with the same that the apostles did universally plant.

York. I perceive you are an obstinate man in your own opinion; and will not be taught; wherefore it is but lost labour to talk with you any longer; you are a member to be cut off.

Chichester. I have heard of you before, how you troubled the good bishop of Winchester, and now I see in you what I have heard.

Philpot. I trust you see no evil in me by this; I desire of you a sure ground to build my faith on, and if you shew me none, I pray you speak not ill of him that meaneth well.

Chichester. Thou art as impudent a fellow as any I have talked with.

Philpot. That is spoken uncharitably, my lord, to blaspheme him whom you cannot justly reprove.

Chichester. Why, thou art not God: blasphemy is counted a rebuke to God-ward, and not to man.

Philpot. Yes, it may be as well verified of an infamy laid to man, speaking in God's cause, as you now do lay unto me, for speaking freely the truth before God, to maintain your vain religion. You are void of all good ground. I perceive you are blind guides, and leaders of the blind: and therefore (as I am bound to tell you) very hypocrites, tyrannously persecuting the truth, which otherwise by just order you are by no means able to convince. Your own doctors and testimonies which you bring, be evidently against you, and yet you will not see the truth.

Chichester. Have we these thanks for our good will, in coming to instruct thee?

Philpot. My lords, you must bear with me, since I speak in Christ's cause; and because his glory is defaced, and his people cruelly and wrongfully slain by you, because they will not consent to the dishonour of God, and to hypocrisy with you; if I told you not your fault, it would be required at my hands in the day of judgment.

The LAST EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, in open JUDGMENT, with his final CONDEMNATION by BISHOP BONNER, in the CONSISTORY at ST. PAUL'S, December 13, 14, and 16.

Bonner. MR. Philpot, amongst other things that were laid and objected against you, these three things you were principally charged and burthened with.

The first is, That you being fallen from the unity of Christ's catholic church, do refuse and will not come to be reconciled thereunto.

The second is, That you have blasphemously spoken against the sacrifice of the mass, calling it idolatry.

And the third is, That you have spoken against the sacrament of the altar, denying the real presence of Christ's body and blood to be in the same.

And according to the will and pleasure of the synod legislative, you have been often by me invited and required to go from your said errors and heresies, and to return to the unity of the catholic church, which if you will now willingly do, you shall be mercifully and gladly received, charitably used, and have all the favour I can shew you. And now to tell you true, it is assigned and appointed me to give sentence against you, if you stand herein, and will not return. Wherefore if you so refuse, I do ask of you whether you have any cause that you can shew, why I now should not give sentence against you.

Philpot. Under protestation, not to go from my appeal that I have made, and also not to consent to you as my competent judge, I say, touching your first objection concerning the catholic church, I neither was nor am out of the same. And as touching the sacrifice of the mass, and the sacrament of the altar, I never spoke against the same. And as concerning the pleasure of the synod, I say, that these twenty years I have been brought up in the faith of the true catholic church, which is contrary to your church, wherein you would have me to come: and in that time I have been many times sworn both in the reign of king Henry the Eighth, and good king Edward his son, against the usurped power of the bishop of Rome, which oath I think that I am bound in my conscience to keep, because I must perform unto the Lord mine oath. But if you, or any of the synod, can by God's word persuade me that my said oath was unlawful, and that I am bound by God's law to come to your church, whereof you be now, I will gladly agree, otherwise not.

Bonner then not able with all his learned doctors to accomplish this his offered condition, fell to persuading him, both by his accustomed promises and threatenings, to return to their church; to which he answered: You and all other of your sort, are hypocrites, and I wish all the world knew your hypocrisy, your tyranny, ignorance, and idolatry.

Upon these words the bishop did for that time dismiss him, commanding that on Monday the 16th day of the same month, between the hours of one and three in the afternoon, he should again be brought thither, there to have the definitive sentence of condemnation pronounced against him, if he remained then in his former constancy. At which day and time Mr. Philpot was again presented before the bishops of London, Bath, Worcester, and Litchfield.

Bonner. Philpot, amongst others I have to charge you especially with three things:

First, Where you have fallen from the unity of Christ's catholic church, you have thereupon been invited and required, not only by me, but also by many and divers other catholic bishops, and other learned men, to return and come again to the same: and also you have been offered by me, that if you would so return and confess your errors and heresies, you should be mercifully received, and have so much favour as I could shew unto you.

The second is, That you have blasphemously spoken against the sacrifice of the mass, calling it idolatry and abomination.

And thirdly, That you have spoken and held against the sacrament of the altar, denying the real presence of Christ's body and blood to be in the same.

This being spoken, the bishop recited unto him a certain exhortation in English, the tenor and form whereof is this:

BISHOP BONNER'S EXHORTATION.

MR. Philpot, this is to be told you, that if you, not being reconciled to the unity of the catholic church, from whence you did fall in the time of the late schism, here in this realm of England, against the see apostolic of Rome, will now heartily and obediently be reconciled to the unity of the same catholic church, professing and promising to observe and keep, to the best of your power, the faith and christian religion observed and kept by all faithful people of the same: and moreover, if you, which heretofore, in the years of our Lord 1553, 1554, and 1555, or in one of them have offended and trespassed grievously against the sacrifice of the mass, calling it idolatry and abominable: and likewise have offended and trespassed against the sacrament of the altar, denying the real presence of Christ's body and blood to be there in the sacrament of the altar, affirming also withal, material bread and material wine to be in the sacrament of the altar; and not the substance of the body and blood of Christ: if you, I say, will be reconciled as aforesaid, and will forsake your heresies and errors before touched, being heretical and damnable, and will also allow the sacrament of the mass, you shall be mercifully received, and charitably used with as much favour as may be; if not, you shall be reputed, taken, and judged for an heretic (as you be indeed). Now do you chuse what you will do; you are counselled herein friendly and favourably.

Ita est quod EDM. BONNER, Episc. Lond.

The bishop's exhortation thus ended, Mr. Philpot turned himself to the lord mayor, and said,

Philpot. To you, my lord mayor, bearing the sword, I am glad it is my chance now to stand before that authority, that hath defended the gospel and the truth of God's word; but I am sorry to see that that authority, which representeth the king and queen's persons, should now be changed, and be at the command of Antichrist; and you (speaking to the bishops) pretend to be the followers of the apostles of Christ, and yet be the very Antichrists and deceivers of the people; and I am glad that God hath given me power to stand here this day, and to declare and defend my faith, which is founded on Christ.

Therefore, as touching your first objection, I say that I am of the catholic church, whereof I never was out, and that your church (which you pretend to be the catholic church) is the church of Rome, and so the Babylonical, and not the catholic church; of that church I am not.

As touching your second objection, which is, that I should speak against the sacrifice of the mass; I do say, that I have not spoken against the true sacrifice, but I have spoken against your private masses that you use in corners, which is blasphemy to the true sacrifice; for your daily sacrifice is reiterated blasphemy against Christ's death, and it is a lie of your own invention: and that abominable sacrifice which you set upon the altar, and use in your private masses, instead of the living sacrifice, is idolatry, and you shall never prove it by God's word; therefore you have deceived the people with that your sacrifice of the mass, which you make a masking.

Thirdly, where you lay to my charge, that I deny the body and blood of Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar, I cannot tell what altar you mean, whether it be the altar of the cross, or the altar of stone: and if you call it the sacrament of the altar in respect of the altar of stone, then I defy your Christ, for it is a rotten Christ.

And as touching your transubstantiation, I utterly deny it, for it was first brought up by a pope. Now as concerning your offer made from the synod, which is gathered together in Antichrist's name; prove to me that you be of the catholic church (which you never can), and I will follow you, and do as you would have me to do. But you are idolaters, and daily do commit idolatry. You be also traitors; for in your pulpits ye rail against good kings, as king Henry, and king Edward his son, who have stood against the usurped power of the bishop of Rome; against whom I have also taken an oath, which, if you can shew me by God's law that I have taken unjustly, I will then yield unto you: but I pray God turn the king and queen's heart from your synagogue and church, for you do abuse that good queen.

Then the bishop brought forth a certain instrument, containing articles and questions, agreed upon both in Oxford and Cambridge. Also he exhibited two books in print; the one was the catechism made in king Edward's days; in the year 1552, the other concerning the report of the disputation in the convocation-house, mention whereof is above expressed.

Moreover he brought forth two letters, and laid them to Mr. Philpot's charge; the one touching Bartlet Green, the other containing godly exhortations and comforts; which were both written to him by some of his friends.

A L E T T E R,

Produced by BONNER, written by some FRIEND of Mr. PHILPOT's, and sent to him, concerning the Usage of Mr. GREEN, in BONNER'S House at London.

YOU shall understand that Mr. Green came unto the bishop of London on Sunday last, where he was courteously received; for what policy the sequel declareth. His entertainment for one day or two was to dine at my lord's own table, or else to have his meat from thence. During those days he lay in Dr. Chedsey's chamber, and was examined. Albeit in very deed, the bishop earnestly and faithfully promised many right worshipful men (who were suiters for him, but to him unknown) that he in no case should be examined; before which Mr. Fecknam would have had him in his friendly custody, if he would have desired to have conferred with him, which he utterly refused. And in that the bishop objected against his singularity and obstinacy; his answer thereunto was thus, To avoid all suspicion thereof, although I myself am young and utterly unlearned in respect of the learned, (and yet I understand, I thank my Lord) yet let me have such books as I shall require, and if I, by God's Spirit, do not thereby answer all your books and objections contrary thereto, I will assent to you. Whereunto the bishop and the rest assented, permitting him at the first to have such books. They at sundry times have reasoned with him, and have found him so strong and ripe in the scriptures and godly fathers, that since they have not only taken from him the liberty of those books, but all other books, not leaving him so much as the New Testament. Since, they have beat and used him most cruelly. This Mr. Fecknam reported; saying farther, that he never heard the like young man, and so perfect. What shall become farther of him, God knoweth; but death I think, for he remaineth more and more willing to die, as I understand. Concerning your bill, I shall confer with others therein, knowing that the same court is able to redress the same: and yet I think it will not be reformed, for that I know few or none that dare or will speak therein, or prefer the same, because it concerneth spiritual things. Notwithstanding, I will ascertain you thereof; committing you to the Holy Ghost, who keep you and us all as his.

Your own, &c.

THESE books, letters, supplications, and other matters being thus read, the bishop demanded of him, if the book intitled, "The true report of the disputation," &c. were of his penning, or not? Whereupon Philpot answered, That it was a good and true book, and of his own penning and setting forth.

The bishops growing weary, and not being able by any sufficient ground, either of God's word, or of the true ancient catholic fathers, to convince and overcome him, fell with fair and flattering speech to persuade with him; promising, that if he would revoke his opinions, and come home again to their Romish and Babylonical church, he would not only be pardoned that which was past, but also they would, with all favour and cheerfulness of heart, receive him again as a true member thereof. Which words when Bonner saw would take no place, he demanded of Mr. Philpot (and that with a charitable affection, I warrant you), whether he had any just cause to alledge why he should not condemn him as an heretic. Well, quoth Mr. Philpot, your idolatrous sacrament, which you have found out, you would fain defend, but you cannot, nor ever shall.

In the end the bishop, seeing his unmoveable steadfastness in the truth, did openly pronounce the sentence of condemnation against him. In the reading whereof, when he came to these words, And you an obstinate, pernicious, and impenitent heretic, &c. Mr. Philpot said, I thank God that I am an heretic out of your cursed church; I am no heretic before God. But God bless you, and give you once grace to repent your wicked doings, and let all men beware of your bloody church.

Moreover, whilst Bonner was about the midst of the sentence, the bishop of Bath pulled him by the sleeve, and said, My lord, my lord, know of him first whether he will recant, or not. Then Bonner said, (full like himself) O let him alone; and so read forth the sentence.

And when he had done, he delivered him to the sheriffs; and so two officers brought him through the bishop's house into Pater-noster-row, and there his servant met him, and when he saw him, he said, Ah, dear master.

Then Mr. Philpot said to his man, Content thyself, I shall do well enough; for thou shalt see me again.

And so the officers thrust him away, and took him to Newgate; and as he went, he said to the people, Ah, good people, blessed be God for this day; and so the officers delivered him to the keeper. Then his man pushed to go in after his master; and one of the officers said unto him, Hence fellow, what wouldst thou have? And he said, I would go speak with my master.

Then the under keeper said to Mr. Philpot, Is this your man? and he said, Yea. So he gave his man leave to go in with him. And Mr. Philpot and his man were turned into a little chamber on the right hand, and there remained a short time, until Alexander, the chief keeper, came unto him; who at his entering, greeted him in these words, Ah, said he, hast thou not done well to bring thyself hither? Well, said Mr. Philpot, I must be content, for it is God's appointment; and I shall desire you to let me have your gentle favour, for you and I have been of old acquaintance. Well, said Alexander, I will shew thee gentleness and favour, so thou wilt be ruled by me. Then said Mr. Philpot, I pray you shew me what you would have me to do.

He said, If you will recant, I will shew you any pleasure I can. Nay, said Mr. Philpot, I will never recant that which I have spoken, whilst I have my life, for it is most certain truth, and in witness hereof I will seal it with my blood. Then Alexander said, This is the saying of the whole pack of you heretics. Whereupon he commanded him to be set upon the block, and as many irons upon his legs as he could bear, because he would not follow his wicked mind.

Then the clerk told Alexander in his ear, that Mr. Philpot had given his man money. And Alexander said to his man, What money hath thy master given thee? He answered, My master hath given me none. No, said Alexander, hath he given thee none? That will I know, for I will search thee.

Do with me as you like, and search me all that you can, quoth his servant; he hath given me a token or two to send to his friends, to his brothers and sisters. Ah, said Alexander unto Mr. Philpot, thou art a maintainer of heretics, thy man should have gone to some of thine affinity, but he shall be known well enough. Nay, said Mr. Philpot, I do send it to my friends; there he is, let him make answer to it. But, good Mr. Alexander, be so much my friend, that these irons may be taken off. Well, said Alexander, give me my fees, and I will take them off; if not, thou shalt wear them still.

Then said Mr. Philpot, Sir, what is your fee? He said, Four pound was his fees. Ah, said Mr. Philpot, I have not so much; I am but a poor man, and I have been long in prison. What wilt thou give me then, said Alexander? Sir, said he, I will give thee twenty shillings, and that I will send my man for, or else I will give you my gown in pledge; for the time is not long I am sure, that I shall be with you; for the bishop said unto me that I should be soon dispatched.

Then Alexander said unto him, What is that to me? And with that he departed from him, and commanded him to be had into limbo.

Then one Witterence, steward of the house, took him on his back, and carried him down, his man knew not whither. Wherefore Mr. Philpot said to his man, Go to Mr. Sheriff, and shew him how I am used, and desire Mr. Sheriff to be good unto me; and so his servant went away, and took an honest man with him.

And when they came to Mr. Sheriff, (which was Mr. Macham) and shewed him how Mr. Philpot was handled in Newgate, the sheriff hearing this, took his ring from off his finger, and delivered it to that honest man, that came with Mr. Philpot's man, and bade him go unto Alexander the keeper, and commanded him to take off his irons, and to handle him more gently, and to give his man again that which he had taken from him.

And when they came again to the said Alexander, and delivered their message from the sheriff, Alexander took the ring and said, Ah, I perceive that Mr. Sheriff is a bearer with him, and all such heretics as he is, therefore to-morrow I will shew it to his betters:

yet at ten o'clock he went into Mr. Philpot where he lay, and took off his irons, and gave him such things as he had taken before from his servant.

Upon Tuesday at supper, being the 17th of December, there came a messenger from the sheriffs, and bade Mr. Philpot make ready, for the next day he should suffer, and be burned at a stake with fire. Mr. Philpot answered and said, I am ready; God grant me strength, and a joyful resurrection. And so he went into his chamber, and poured out his spirit unto the Lord God, giving him most hearty thanks, that he of his mercy had made him worthy to suffer for his truth.

In the morning the sheriffs came according to order, about eight o'clock, and calling for him, he most joyfully came down to them. And there his man met him, and said, Ah, dear master, farewell. His master said unto him, Serve God, and he will help thee. And so he went with the sheriffs to the place of execution; and when he was entering into Smithfield, the way was foul, and two officers took him up to bear him to the stake. Then he said merrily, What, will you make me a pope? I am content to go to my journey's end on foot. But first coming into Smithfield, he kneeled down there, saying these words, "I will pay my vows in thee, O Smithfield."

And when he was come to the place of suffering, he kissed the stake, and said, Shall I disdain to suffer at this stake, seeing my Redeemer did not refuse to suffer the most vile death upon the cross for me? and then with an obedient heart, full meekly he said the cvi, cvii. and cviii. Psalms: and when he had made an end of all his prayers, he said to the officers, What have you done for me? And every one of them declared what they had done, and he gave money to them.

Then they bound him to the stake, and set fire to that constant martyr; who, the 18th day of December, in the midst of the fiery flames, yielded his soul into the hands of Almighty God, and like a lamb gave up his breath, his body being consumed to ashes.

EXTRACT of LETTER I.

From Mr. PHILPOT to a CHRISTIAN CONGREGATION, exhorting them to refrain from IDOLATRY, and to serve GOD after his WORD.

IT is a lamentable thing to behold, at this time in England, the faithless departing, both of men and women, from the true knowledge and use of Christ's sincere religion, which so plentifully they have been taught, and do know, their own consciences bearing witness to the verity thereof. Therefore, my dearly beloved, be stable and immoveable in the word of God, and in the faithful observation thereof, and let no man deceive you with vain words, saying, that you may keep your faith to yourselves, and dissemble with Antichrist, and to live at rest and quietness in the world, as most men do, yielding to necessity. This is the wisdom of the flesh, but the wisdom of the flesh is death and enmity to God, as our Saviour, for example, did aptly declare in Peter, who exhorteth Christ not to go to Jerusalem to celebrate the passover, and there to be slain, but counselled him to look better to himself.

God hath one catholic church dispersed throughout the world, and therefore we are taught in our creed to believe one catholic church, and to have communion therewith: which catholick church is grounded upon the foundation of the prophets and of the apostles, and upon none other, as St. Paul witnesseth to the Ephesians. Therefore whosoever we perceive any people to worship God truly after his word, there we may be certain the church of Christ to be; unto which we ought to associate ourselves, and to desire with the prophet David, to praise God in the midst of his church. But if we behold through the iniquity of the time, separations to be made with counterfeit religion, otherwise than the word of God doth teach, we ought then, if we be required to be companions thereof, to say again with David, "I have hated the synagogue of the malignant, and will not sit with the wicked." In the Revelations the church of Ephesus is highly commended, because she tried such as said they were apostles, and were not indeed, and therefore would not abide the company of them. Further, God commanded his people, that they should not seek Bethel, neither enter into Gilgal, where idolatry was used, by the mouth of his prophet Amos. Also, we must consider that our bodies be the temple of God, and whosoever (as St. Paul teacheth) doth prophane the temple of God, him the Lord will destroy. May we then take the temple of Christ, and make it the member of an harlot? All strange religion and idolatry is accounted whoredom with the prophets, and more detestable in the sight of God, than the adventurous abuse of the body.

St. Paul to the Hebrews saith, "If any man withdraw himself from the faith, his soul shall have no pleasure in him;" therefore he saith also, "That we are not such as do withdraw ourselves unto perdition, but we belong unto faith, for the attainment of life." St. John in the Revelation telleth us plainly, that none of those who are written in the book of life, do receive the mark of the beast, which is of the papistical synagogue, either in their foreheads, or else in their hands, that is, apparently or obediently.

St. Paul to the Philippians affirmeth, that we may not have any fellowship with the works of darkness, but in the midst of this wicked and froward generation we ought to shine like lights upholding the word of truth. Further he saith, that we may not touch any unclean thing; which signifieth, that our outward conversation in foreign things ought to be pure and undefiled as well as the inward, that with a clean spirit and rectified body we might serve God justly in holiness and righteousness all the days of our life.

Finally, in the 18th of the Revelations, God biddeth us plainly to depart from the Babylonical synagogue, and not to be partakers of her trespasses. St. Paul to the Thessalonians commandeth us in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, to withdraw ourselves from every brother that walketh inordinately, and not according to the institution which he hath received of him.

Ponder ye therefore well, good brethren and sisters, these scriptures which are written for your erudition and reformation, whereof one jot is not written in vain: which be utterly against all counterfeit illusion to be used by us with the papists in their fantastical religion, and be adversaries to all them that have so light consciences in so doing: and if they do not agree with this adversary (I mean the word of God) which is contrary to their attempts, he will (as is signified in the gospel) deliver them to the judge, which is Christ; and the judge will deliver them to the executioner, that is, to the devil: and the devil shall commit them to the horrible prison of hell-fire (where is the portion of all hypocrites) with sulphur and brimstone, with wailing and gnashing of teeth, world without end. But yet many will say for their vain excuse, God is merciful, and his mercy is over all. But the scripture teacheth us, That cursed is he that sinneth upon hope of forgiveness. Truth it is, that the mercy of God is over all his works, and yet upon such as fear him: for it is written in the Psalms, "The mercy of God is on them that fear him, and on such as put their trust in him." Where we may learn, that they only put their trust in God, that serve him; and to fear God, is to turn from evil and do what is good. So that such as do look to be partakers in God's mercy, may not abide in that which is known to be manifest evil, and detestable in the sight of God.

Let all vain excuses be set apart; and whilst you have light, as Christ commandeth, believe the light, and abide in the same, lest eternal darkness overtake you unawares. The light is come into the world, but (alas) men love darkness more than light. God give us his pure eye-salve to heal our blindness in this behalf. O that both men and women would be healed, and not seek to be wilfully blinded. The Lord open their eyes, that they may see how dangerous a thing it is to decline from the knowledge of truth, contrary to their conscience.

But what said I, conscience? Many affirm their conscience will bear them well enough to do all that they do, and to go to the idolatrous church to service; whose conscience is very large to satisfy man more than God. And although their conscience can bear them so to do, yet I am sure that a good conscience will not; which cannot be good, unless it be directed after the knowledge of God's word; and therefore in Latin this feeling mind is called Conscientia, which soundeth by interpretation, as much as with knowledge.

And therefore if our conscience be led of herself, and not after true knowledge, yet we are not so to be excused as St. Paul beareth witness, saying, "Although my conscience accuseth me not, yet in this I am not justified." And he joineth a good conscience with these three sisters, charity, a pure heart, and unfeigned faith. Charity keepeth God's commandments, a pure heart loveth and feareth God above all, and unfeigned faith is never ashamed of the profession of the gospel, whatsoever damage he shall suffer in body thereby. The Lord, who hath revealed his holy will unto us by his word, grant us never to be ashamed of it, and give us grace so earnestly to cleave to his holy word, and the true church, that for no manner of worldly respect we become partakers of the works of hypocrisy, which God doth abhor; so that we may be found faithful in the Lord's testament to the end, to the glory of God and our everlasting salvation. Amen.

Letters II. and III. are address'd to Mr. John Careless, prisoner in the King's Bench, and Letter IV. to certain godly women who forsook their own country for the Gospel.

LETTER V.

Containing an Exhortation to his own Sister, constantly to stick to the Truth, which she had fruitfully professed.

GOD the eternal Father, who hath justified you by the blood of his Son Jesus Christ, and called you to hallow his name through a good conversation and profession of life, sanctify you with daily increase of virtue and faith by his Holy Spirit, that you may appear a vessel of sanctification, in the midst of this wicked and perverse generation, to the laud and praise of the gospel. Amen.

I have occasion (my own dear sister) to praise God in you for two causes; the one, that to your ability you are ready to shew yourself a natural and loving sister to me your poor afflicted brother, as by your gentle tokens you have often testified being absent, and also present in visiting me; which well declareth that you be a very natural sister indeed, and to be praised in this behalf. But in the other, that you be also a sister to me in faith, after Christ's gospel, I have occasion to thank God so much the more, how much the one excelleth the other, and the spiritual consanguinity is more perdurable than that which is of flesh and blood, and is a worker of that which is by nature; for commonly such as be ungodly, be unnatural, and only lovers of themselves, as daily experience teacheth us. The living Lord, which through the incorruptible seed of his word hath begotten you to be my liege sister, give you grace to grow in that generation, that you may increase to a perfect age in the Lord, to be my sister with Christ for ever.

Look therefore that you continue a faithful sister, as you are called and are godly entered, not only to me, but to all the church of Christ, yea to Christ himself, who voucheth you, in this your unfeigned faith, worthy to be his sister. Consider this dignity to surmount all the vain dignities of the world, and let it accordingly prevail more with you than all earthly delights: for thereby you are called to an equal proportion of the everlasting inheritance of Christ, if in no wise you do shew yourself an unnatural sister to him in forsaking him in trouble, which I trust you never will do for any kind of worldly respect. You are under dangerous temptations to be turned from that natural love you owe unto Christ, and you shall be tried with God's people through a sieve of great affliction; for so Satan desireth us to be sifted, that through fear of sharp troubles we might fall from the stability of our faith, and so be deprived of that honour, joy, and reward, which is prepared for such as continue faithful brothers and sisters in the Lord's covenant to the end. Therefore the wise man, in the book of Ecclesiasticus, biddeth them that come to the service of the Lord, "To prepare themselves to suffer temptations."

Since then that for the glory of God and our faith, we are called now to abide the brunt of them, and that when our adversary hath done all that he can, yet we may be stable and stand; this Christ, our first-begotten brother, looketh for at our hands; and all our brethren and sisters in heaven desire to see our faith through afflictions to be perfect, that we might fulfil their number: and the universal church here militant rejoiceth at our constancy, all whom by the contrary we should make sorry, to the danger of the loss both of body and soul. Fear not therefore, whatsoever be threatened of the wicked; prepare your back, and see it be ready to carry Christ's cross. And, if you see any unwillingness in you, (as the flesh is continually repugnant to the will of God) ask with faithful prayer, that the good Spirit of God may lead your sinful flesh whither it would not: for if we will dwell in the flesh and follow the counsel thereof, we shall never do the will of God, neither work that which tendeth to our salvation.

You are at this present in the confines and borders of Babylon, where you are in danger to drink of the whore's cup, unless you be vigilant in prayer. Take heed the serpent seduce you not from the simplicity of your faith, as he did our first mother Eve. Let not worldly fellowship make you partaker of iniquity. He that toucheth tar, cannot but be defiled thereby. With such as be perverse, a man shall soon be perverted; with the holy you shall be holy. Therefore say continually with the prophet David, Psalm 35. "Unto the saints that be on the earth, all my will is on them." You have been sanctified, and made pure through the truth: take heed you be not unholy and defiled, lest the last be worse than the worst. I write not this because I stand in any doubt of your sincere continuance, of which I have had so good experience; but because the days be evil, and in the same it is the duty of each of us to exhort and stir up one another; I am bold to put you (my good sister) in remembrance of that which doth not a little comfort me to remember, in my troubles and daily temptations. Wherefore I doubt not but you will take that in good part, which cometh from your brother both in spirit and body, who tendereth your salvation as earnestly as his own, that we might joy together eternally with such joy as the world shall never be able to take from us. Thanks be unto God, you have begun to run a good and a great time well in the ways of the Lord: run out the race to the end which you have begun, and then shall you receive the crown of glory. None shall be crowned, but such as lawfully strive. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good, and the Lord will make you one of those faithful virgins that shall follow the Lamb wheresoever he goeth; which Christ grant both to you and me. Amen.

Commend me to all them that love me in the Lord unfeignedly. God increase our faith, and give us never to be ashamed of his gospel. That same request which I have made to my brother Thomas, I make also to you, desiring you by all means you can to accomplish my request, that my sureties might be satisfied with what is mine own, to the content of my mind, which cannot be quiet until they be discharged: therefore I pray you help to purchase my quietness, that I may depart out of this world in peace. My dissolution I look for daily, but the Lord knoweth how unworthy I am of so high an honour, as to die for the testimony of his truth. Pray that God would make me worthy, as he hath done of long imprisonment, for which his name be praised for ever. Pray and look for the coming of the Lord, whose wrath is great over us, and I will pray for you as long as I live. The 9th of July, in the King's Bench.

Your own loving brother, as well in faith as in body,

JOHN PHILPOT.
LET.

LETTER VI.

From Mr. PHILPOT to certain godly Brethren.

THE grace of God the Father, and the peace of our Saviour, Jesus Christ his eternal Son, and the consolation of the Holy Ghost our comforter, strengthen your hearts, and comfort your minds; that you may rejoice and live in the truth of Christ's gospel to the end, Amen.

I do much rejoice, dearly beloved in the Lord, to hear of your constant faith in the word of God, which you have so purely received; which does not with the worldlings decline from the purity thereof, albeit you suffer grief and trouble thereby; for which I praise God most heartily: and the Lord of all strength, who hath begun this good work in you, make it perfect to the end, as I doubt not but he will, for the faithful zeal you have to his truth, and to his afflicted church. Therefore that you may the better stand and bear the brunt of many temptations you are like to be assaulted withal, in these wicked and stormy days; I thought it good, as it is the duty of one christian man to exhort another in the time of trouble, to put you in remembrance thereof, and to will you with the wise man to prepare yourselves to temptations; and to beware that you, which yet do stand by the goodness of God, may not fall from your lively knowledge and hope. It is an easy thing to begin to do well, but to continue out in well-doing, is the only property of the children of God, and such as assuredly shall be saved. For so saith our Saviour in his gospel, "Blessed are they that persevere to the end."

Let not therefore this certainty of your salvation, which is continuance in the sincerity of faith, slide from you. Esteem it more than all the riches and pleasures of this world, for it is the most acceptable treasure of eternal life. This is that precious stone, for which the wise merchant-man, after the gospel, doth sell all that he hath and buyeth the same. God, in Revelations iii. doth signify to the church, that there shall come a time of temptation upon the whole world, to try the dwellers upon earth. From the danger of which temptation all such shall be delivered as observe his word: which word is there called the word of patience; to give us to understand, that we must be ready to suffer all kind of injuries and slanders for the profession thereof.

Therefore God commandeth us there to hold it fast, that no man might bereave us of our crown of glory; and St. Peter telleth us, now we are afflicted with divers trials, as it is need it should be so, That the trial of our faith being much more precious than gold that perisheth, and yet is tried by fire, might redound to the laud, glory, and honour of Jesus Christ. St. Paul to the Hebrews sheweth us, that Christ our Saviour was in his humanity made perfect by afflictions, that we being called to perfection in him, might more willingly sustain the troubles of the world, by which God giveth all them, that be exercised in the same for his sake, his holiness. And in the 12th chapter of the said epistle is written, My son, refuse not the correction of the Lord, nor shrink when thou art rebuked of him: for the Lord doth chastise every son whom he receiveth, &c. Christ, in the gospel of St. John, biddeth his disciples to look for afflictions, saying, In the world you shall have trouble, but in me ye shall have joy. And therefore in the midst of their trouble, in the 21st of St. Luke, he biddeth them look up and lift up their heads, for your redemption, saith he, is at hand. And in the 22d he saith to all such as be afflicted for him, You are those that have continued with me in my temptations, and therefore I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed for me, to eat and drink upon my table in my kingdom.

Oh how glorious be the crosses of Christ, which bring the bearers of them unto so blessed an end! Shall we not be glad to be partakers of such shame as may bring us to so high a dignity? God open our eyes to see all things as they be, and to judge uprightly. Then doubtless we would think with Moses, that it is better to be afflicted with the people of God, than to be counted the king of Egypt's son. Then should we joyfully say with David, in all our adversities and troubles, It is good, O Lord, thou hast brought me low, to the end I might learn thy righteousness. Therefore St. Paul would not glory in any other thing of the world, but in the cross of Christ, and in other his infirmities: we have the commandment of Christ, daily to take up his cross and follow him. We have the godly ensamples of all his apostles and holy martyrs, who with great joy and exultation have suffered the loss of all lands, goods, and life, for the hope of a better reward, which is laid up for all those in heaven, that unfeignedly cleave to the gospel, and never be ashamed thereof.

Great is the felicity of the world to the outward man, and very pleasant are the transitory delights thereof: but the reward of the righteous after the word of God, doth incomparably excel them all, inasmuch that St. Paul to the Romans doth plainly affirm, that all the tribulations of this world cannot deserve that glory which shall be shewed unto us.

Let us therefore (good brethren and sisters) be merry and glad in these troublesome days, which be sent of God to declare our faith, and to bring to the end and fruition of that which we hope for. If we would enter into the Lord's sanctuary, and behold what is prepared for us, we could not but desire the Lord to hasten the day of our death, in which we might set forth, by true confession, his glory. Neither should we be afraid to meet our adversaries, who so earnestly seek our spoil and death, as Christ did Judas and that wicked rout, which came to apprehend him, saying, I am he whom ye seek. It is commanded us by the gospel, not to fear them that kill the body, but to fear God, who can cast both body and soul into hell-fire. So much we are bound to observe this commandment as any other which God hath given us. The Lord increase our faith, that we fear God more than man. The Lord give us such love towards him and his truth, that we may be content to forsake all and follow him. Now will it appear what we love best; for to what we love best we shall stick. There is none worthy to be counted a christian, except he can find in his heart, for Christ's sake, if the confession of his truth doth require it, to renounce all that he hath, and follow him; and in so doing he gaineth an hundred fold more in this life (as our Saviour said to Peter) and hereafter is assured of eternal life. Behold, I pray you, what he loseth who in this life receiveth an hundred for one, with assurance of eternal life. O happy exchange! Perchance your outward man will say, If I were sure of this great recompence here, I could be glad to forsake all; but where is this hundred fold in this life to be found? Yes, truly; for instead of the worldly riches which thou dost forsake, which be but temporal, thou hast found the everlasting riches of heaven, which the glory, honour, and praise, both before God, angels, and men; and for an earthly habitation, hast an eternal mansion with Christ in heaven; for even now thou art of the city and household of the saints with God, as it is verified in the fourth of the Philippians. For worldly peace, which can last but a while, thou dost possess the peace of God, which passeth all understanding; and for the loss of a few friends, thou art made a fellow of the innumerable company of heaven; and a perpetual friend of all those that have died in the Lord, from the beginning of the world. Is not this more than an hundred fold? Is not the peace of God which we in this world have through faithful imitation of Christ (which the world cannot take from us) ten thousand fold more, than those things that most highly be esteemed in the world, without the peace of God? All the peace of the world is no peace, but a mere anguish, and a gnawing fury of hell: as of late God hath set example before our eyes, to teach us how horrible an evil it is to forsake the peace of Christ's truth, which breedeth a worm in the conscience that never shall rest.

O that we would weigh this with indifferent ballances! Then should we not be dismayed at this troublesome time, neither sorrow after a worldly manner for the loss which we are now like to sustain, as weak faithless persons do, which love their goods more than God, and the things visible above those which be invisible, but rather rather would heartily rejoice and be thankful, that it pleased God to call us to be soldiers in his cause against the works of hypocrisy, and to make us like unto our Saviour Christ in suffering, whereby we may assure ourselves of his eternal glory: For blessed are they, saith Christ, that suffer persecution for righteousness' sake. And as St. Paul witnesseth to Timothy, If we die with Christ, we shall live with Christ, and if we deny him, he will deny us.

O that we would enter into the vail of God's promises. Then should we with St. Paul to the Philippians, reject all, and count all things but for dross, so that we may gain Christ. God, which is the enlightener of all darkness, and putter away of all blindness, anoint our eyes with the true eye-salve, that we may behold his glory, and our eternal felicity, which is hidden with Christ, and prepared for us that do abide in his testament: for blessed is that servant, whom the master when he cometh (as Christ said) doth find faithful. Let us therefore watch and pray one for another, that we yield not in any point of our religion to the antichristian synagogue, and that we be not overthrown by these temptations. Stand therefore, and be no cowards in the cause of your salvation; for his Spirit that is in us, is stronger than he which in the world doth now rage against us. Let us not put out the Spirit of God from us, by whose might we shall overcome our enemies, and then death shall be as great a pain to us as it was to the blessed apostle St. Paul. Why then do ye mourn? Why do ye weep? Why are ye so careful, as though God hath forsaken you? He is never more present with us, than when we are in trouble, if we do not forsake him. We are in his hands, and no body can do us any injury or wrong without his good will and pleasure. He hath commanded his angels to keep us, that we stumble not at a stone without his divine providence. The devil cannot hurt any of us, and much less any of his ministers, without the good will of our eternal Father.

Therefore let us be of good comfort, and continually give thanks unto God for our estate, whatsoever it be; for if we murmur against the same, we murmur against God, who sendeth the same: which if we do, we kick but against the pricks, and provoke more the wrath of God against us; which by patient suffering otherwise would sooner be turned into our favour through faithful prayer.

I beseech you with St. Paul, to give your bodies pure and holy sacrifices unto God. He hath given us bodies to bestow unto his glory, and not after our own concupiscence. If many years God hath suffered us to use our bodies, which be his temples, after the lust of the flesh, in vain delights, not according to his glory; is it not our duty in the latter end of our life, the more willingly to yield unto God's glory our bodies, with all that we have, in demonstration of true repentance of that we have evil spent before? Cannot the example of the blessed man Job, horribly afflicted, cause us to say, "The Lord hath given it, the Lord hath taken it: blessed be the name of the Lord, so is it come to pass?" If we cast our whole care likewise upon God, he will turn our misery into felicity, as well as he did to Job. God tempteth us now as he did our father Abraham, commanding him to slay his son Isaac in sacrifice to him; which Isaac, by interpretation, doth signify mirth and joy. Who by his obedience preserved Isaac unto long life, and offered in his stead a ram that was tied by the horns in the brambles. So likewise we are all commanded to sacrifice unto God our Isaac, which is our joy and consolation: which if we be ready to do, as Abraham was, our joy shall not perish, but live and be increased, although our ram be sacrificed for our Isaac: which doth signify, that the pride and concupiscence of our flesh, entangled through sin with the cares of this stinging world, must be mortified for the preservation and perfect augmentation of our mirth and joy, which is sealed up for us in Christ.

And to withstand these present temptations wherewith we are now encumbered, you cannot have a better remedy than to set before your eyes how our Saviour Christ overcame them in the desert, and to follow his example. That if the devil himself, or any other by him, willeth you to make stones bread, that is, to take such a worldly-wise way, that you may have your fair houses, lands and goods to live on still; you must say, that every man liveth not only by bread, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

Again, if the devil counsellereth you to cast yourselves down to the earth, as to revoke your sincere belief and godly conversation, and to be conformable to the learned men of the world, pretending that God will be well enough content therewith; you must answer that it is written, that a man shall not tempt his Lord God:

Further, if the devil offer you large promises of honour, dignity, and possessions, so that you will worship idols in his synagogue, you must say, Get behind me, Satan, for it is otherwise written, that a man must worship his Lord God, and serve him only.

Finally, if your mother, brother, sister, wife, child, kinsman, or friend, do require you to do otherwise than the word of God hath taught you, you must say with Christ, that they are your mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, children, kinsmen, which do the will of God the Father. To which will the Lord for his mercy conform us all unfeignedly to the end, Amen.

Your loving and faithful brother in Christ, in captivity,

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER VII.

From Mr. PHILPOT to Mr. ROBERT HARRINGTON.

GENTLE Mr. Harrington, I cannot tell what con-dign thanks I may give unto God for you, in respect of the great gentleness and pains which you have taken for the relief of me and of our other afflicted brethren in Christ. God be praised for his mercy, whose loving providence we have seen towards us by such faithful stewards as you have been towards a great many. Blessed be you of God for the loving care which you have taken for his poor flock. God hath reserved your reward of thanks in heaven; and therefore I go not about to render you any, lest I might seem to judge that you looked for that here, which is reserved for a better place. I thank God for that which I have found by your faithful and diligent industry, and God forgive me my unworthiness of so great benefits. God give me grace to serve him faithfully, and to run out my race with joy. Glorious is the course of the martyrs of Christ at this day. Never had the elect of God a better time for their glory than this is. Now may they be assured under the cross, that they are Christ's disciples for ever.

Methinks I see you desiring to be under the same. The flesh draweth back, but the spirit saith, It must be brought whither it would not. Here is the victory of the world: here is the true faith, and everlasting glory. Who is he which desireth not to be found faithful to his master? And now is the time that every faithful servant of Christ hath just opportunity to shew himself a glorious soldier in the Lord's fight. Now do the Amalekites invade the true Israelites, that the Israelites might with speed be glorified; I need not for want of understanding to admonish you hereof, but as a willing soldier in Christ, to exhort you so to run as you may get the victory, and that speedily with us. A man that is invited to a glorious feast, desireth his friend may go with him, and be partaker thereof. God doth call me, most unworthy, among others, to drink of the bride-cup of his Son, whereby we shall be made worthy (as many of our brethren have been before us) to sit at the right hand and at the left hand of Christ. O what unspeakable condition is that? May any worldly thing hinder us from the desire thereof? Since we seek the kingdom of God, why do we not apprehend it, being so near offered unto us?

Let us approach near unto God, and God will draw near unto us. God draw us after him, that we may all run after the favour of his sweet ointments. Christ anoint us, that we may be suppled in these evil days to run lightly unto the glory of the Lord. Shame, imprisonment, sonment, loss of goods, and shedding of our blood, be the just price which we must willingly bestow for the same. Wherefore (dearly beloved in the Lord) let not the great charges keep you back from buying this glory: for the reward is ten thousand fold greater than the price.

That you have married a wife, whom God bless, I cannot excuse you from this mart, but you must bring your wife for an usury to the Lord, whose pleasure is in godly yoke-fellows. I wish you to be as I am, except these horrible bands, but yet most comfortable to the spirit, assuring you, that we are made worthy, through Christ, of the kingdom for which we suffer. Praised be the Lord for the affliction which we suffer, and may he give us strength to continue to the end.

Commend me to Mr. Heath, and tell him that I would wish him with me, to prove how apt he is to carry the cross of Christ. I pray for his continuance in Christ, as for mine own. Commend me to his wife, and to Mrs. Hall, certifying them that I am brought to the gates of hell, that I might never enter into the same, but be raised up from hell to heaven, through the word that sanctifieth us. Commend me to Mr. Elsing and his wife, and thank them that they remembered to provide for me some ease in prison; and tell them, that though my lord's coal-house be but very black, yet it is more to be desired by the faithful than the queen's palace. God make her a joyful mother, and preserve them both to the comfort of God's people. Thus for this time farewell, dear brother. Written in post-haste because of strait keeping.

This day I expect to be called before the commissioners again. Pray, dear brother, for the Spirit of wisdom to remain with me. Commend me to your wife, and I thank you both for your tokens. Your token I have sent to your wife; and my token unto you, is my faithful heart with this letter. Commend me to all my friends, and tell them that I am cheerful in Christ, wishing them to fear God more than man, and to learn to despise earnestly the vanities of this world; desiring you all to pray for me, that I may end my journey with fidelity. Amen.

JOHN PHILPOT.

Letters VIII, IX, and X. are addressed to the Lady Vane, regretting in the first that the glorious light, which had been displayed to England, was now changed into such huge darkness, and that the plagues hanging over England were great, though the gospel should be again restored. "Happy," says he, "shall that person be whom the Lord shall take out of this world, not to see them." He advises to rejoice "in the cross of Christ, to be of good comfort, and hold the buckler of faith; for by the strength of the Lord they would shortly meet in eternal glory." This was dated the 10th of December, 1555. Another to the same Lady, who was a great support to him, is dated from the King's Bench prison on the last of May of that year; wherein he remarks, that "neither the fear of imprisonment, neither the possession of the world, wherewithal she was sufficiently endued above a great many, could separate her from the love of the truth." He exhorts her to "pray heartily, and that often, that God once again for his Christ's sake would be merciful to his afflicted church in England." And in the tenth letter which was written on the 20th of August, wherein, after he had blessed "God that made her so worthy a member in his kingdom," he adds, "for it cannot be but such shall reap with abundance in time of reward, that here do sow so plentifully in well-doing; although I am most unworthy to receive any such benefits at your hands as in respect of of a pillar of Christ's church in you wisheth me to be such an one as the time doth require. God fulfil your desire of me, that I may be found constant, and no wandering star." In this truly primitive and apostolical manner did this faithful servant of Christ employ every moment he could procure, to fulfil the object and discharge the mission of a diligent pastor and faithful martyr. As a true specimen of his manner and sincerity, we have given the following Letter at large.

LETTER XI.

To the same Lady.

THE mercy of God the Father, and the consolation of the Holy Ghost through Jesus Christ, be with you, and strengthen you, my dear mother and sister in the Lord, in these dangerous days, to the crown of eternal glory, which is now offered to all faithful soldiers in the gospel, Amen.

As your good ladyship doth desire to hear from me, so am I desirous to write, as your gentleness and daily goodness bind me. But Satan of late hath hindered me, who envying all good exercises which I have had and received by mine easy imprisonment in times past, hath brought me out of the King's-Bench into the bishop of London's coal-house, a dark and an ugly prison as any about London, (but my dark body of sin hath well deserved the same, and the Lord hath now brought me into outward darkness, that I might the more be enlightened by him, as he is most present with his children in the midst of darkness) where I cannot be suffered to have any candle-light, neither ink nor paper, but by stealth. Wherefore I cannot write to you as I would, neither as my duty is. As Christ, my master, was sent from Annas to Caiaphas, so am I sent from Winchester diocese to London, I trust to make a speedy end of my course; God give me grace and patience to be a faithful follower of my master. I have been already a week in this coal-house, and have of late been four times called to mine answer, but hitherto not called to judgment, which I do daily look for; but I fear they will prolong me, and try me by strait imprisonment a while, in which God's will be done.

Pray (dear lady) that my faith faint not, which I praise God is now more lively with me than it hath been in times past, I taste and feel the faithfulness of God in his promise, who hath promised to be with his in their trouble, and to deliver them. I thank the Lord I am not alone, but have six other faithful companions; who in our darkness do faithfully sing hymns and praises unto God for his great goodness. We are so joyful, that I wish you part of my joy; but rather be glad and thankful unto God with me, that it hath pleased him to make me, most wretched sinner, worthy to suffer any thing for his sake. Hitherto we have not resisted unto blood. God make us never to count our blood more precious in our eyes than his truth.

Ah, my dear sister, I thank you again for the last letter you sent me; it is a singular comfort unto me, as oft as I read the same. I have it in my bosom, and will carry the same even to the stake with me, in witness that Christ hath so constant and faithful a lady in England. God succour and keep that spirit in you; for it is the very spirit of adoption of the child of God. Such cheerful and holy spirits under the cross are acceptable sacrifices in the sight of God; for Christ came to cast fire into the earth, and looketh that it should be kindled. Be you fervent in spirit in our Christ's cause, as you have begun, for that is the principal spirit wherewithal David desired to be confirmed. O, how do I rejoice, your ladyship to go arm in arm with me unto Christ, or rather before me! I cannot but joy of such a worshipful fellow. Methinks I see you mourn, and desire to be loosed out of the earthly and frail habitation of this body. O how amiable and pleasant is it to dwell in God's tabernacle! Our Christ and his heavenly company look for us; let us haste and run thereto, for behold the Lord is ready to embrace us. Mine own bowels in the Lord, be merry in the Lord with your afflicted brother, who daily offereth your merciful alms, which most unworthily I do receive still of you, unto the Lord. But now (dear mother) you need not burden yourself so much (as my last letters did signify) for that my chargeable imprisonment is cut off, and a little now serveth me; wherefore I pray you send no more until I send to you, for I have sufficient, and do abound. God's peace be with you for ever. Out of my lord of London's coal-house, the last of October.

Your own,

JOHN PHILPOT.
LET.

LETTER XII.

From Mr. PHILPOT to the said Lady, wherein he partly complains of the Dissimulation and Perjury of Englishmen falling again to the Pope, and partly expresses his Joy in his Afflictions.

I Cannot but joy with you (my heartily beloved in Christ) of the fall of Sennacherib: since it is to the glory of God, and to the consolation of his church, to see the fall of their enemies before their face, according as it is written, "The just shall rejoice, when he seeth the vengeance of the wicked." God make this joy perfect; for as concerning myself I count not to see those good days whereof you have a glimmering in this life. For although the cockatrice be dead, yet his pestilent chickens, with the whore of Babylon, still live. But a great hope there is of their short confusion, because God doth not prosper their doings according to their expectation. Most happy shall he be, whom the Lord shall soonest take out of this life, that he may not see the plagues which the manifest perjury, and the manifold idolatry and detestable dissimulation, and that of such as do know the truth, do threaten to come.

The Lord is just, and all unrighteousness displeaseth him, and either here or else in another world he will punish this gross infidelity of the world: but his elect, and such as he loveth, will he punish here, that they should not be condemned hereafter with the world eternally: we have nothing so much to rejoice in, as in the cross of Jesus Christ, and in that we are partakers of his afflictions, which are the earnest-penny of that eternal kingdom which he upon the cross for us hath purchased. For as Paul, his faithful witness, saith, "If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him. If we die with him, we shall live with him."

Wherefore (mine own dear bowels) praise God with me most intirely, that it hath pleased him now mercifully to visit the sins of my youth, and my huge unthankfulness, and by the same doth give me much consolation, that he assureth me of his great goodness and mercy, and turneth his fatherly chastisement into my crown of glory. O good God, what am I on whom he should shew this great mercy? To him that is immortal, invisible, and only wise, be all honour, praise and glory therefore, Amen.

This is the day which the Lord hath made, let us rejoice and be glad in the same. This is the way, though it be narrow, which is full of the peace of God, and leadeth to eternal bliss. O how my heart leapeth for joy, that I am so near the apprehension thereof! God forgive me mine unthankfulness and unworthiness of so great glory. The sword which pierced Mary's heart in the passion of our Saviour, which daily also goes through your faithful heart, be more glorious and to be desired than the golden sceptres of this world. O blessed be they that mourn in this world to God-ward, for they shall eternally be comforted: God make my stony heart to mourn more than it doth. I have so much joy of the reward that is prepared for thee, most wretched sinner, that though I be in a place of darkness and mourning, yet I cannot lament; but both night and day I am so joyful, as though I were under no cross at all; yea, in all the days of my life I was never so merry, the name of the Lord be praised therefore for ever and ever, and may he pardon mine unthankfulness. Our enemies do fret, fume, and gnash their teeth, to see and hear that we, under this grievous affliction in the world, can be so merry. We are by them counted as desperate persons, for the certain hope and feeling which we have of our everlasting salvation: and it is no marvel, for the worldly men cannot perceive the things of God, they being mere foolishness and abomination to them.

Be thankful unto our God, (mine own dear helper) for his wondrous working in his chosen people. Pray instantly that this joy be never taken from us, for it passeth all the delights of this world. This is the peace of God which surmounteth all understanding: this peace, the more his chosen be afflicted, the more they feel, and therefore cannot faint, neither for fire, nor for water.

Let us pray for our weak brethren and sisters' sake, that it may please God to alleviate the grievous and intolerable burden of these cruel days. But touching ourselves, let us heartily beseech our Saviour to vouchsafe to give us this glorious gift to suffer for his gospel's sake, and that we may think the shame of the world to be our glory, as it is indeed. God increase our faith, and open our eyes to behold what is prepared for us. I lack nothing, praise be to God. I trust my marriage-garment is ready. I will send you my examinations as soon as I can get them written, if you be desirous of them.

God of his mercy fill your merciful heart with all joy and consolation of the hope to come. Out of the coal-house, the 19th of November.

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER XIII.

From Mr. PHILPOT to a Friend of his, Prisoner the same time in Newgate, wherein is debated and discussed the Matter or Question of the Baptizing of Infants.

THE God of all light and understanding enlighten your heart with all true knowledge of his word, and make you perfect to the day of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereunto you are now called, through the mighty operation of his Holy Spirit, Amen.

I received yesternight from you (dear brother, saint and fellow-prisoner for the truth of Christ's gospel) a letter, wherein you gently require my judgment concerning the baptism of infants; which is the effect thereof. And before I do shew you what I have learned out of God's word, and of his true and infallible church touching the same, I think it not out of the matter first to declare what vision I had the same night: while musing on your letter I fell fast asleep, knowing that God doth not without cause reveal to his people, who have their minds fixed on him, special and spiritual revelation to their comfort, as a taste of their joy and kingdom to come, which flesh and blood cannot comprehend.

Being in the midst of my sweet rest, it seemed as if I saw a great beautiful city, of the colour of azure and white, four-square, in a beautiful composition in the midst of the sky, the sight whereof so inwardly comforted me, that I am not able to express the consolation I had thereof, yea the remembrance thereof causeth as yet my heart to leap for joy: and as charity is no churl, but would wish others to be partakers of his delight, so methought I called to others (I cannot tell whom), and while they came and we together beheld the same, by and by, to my great grief, it faded away.

This dream I think not to have come of the illusion of the senses, because it brought with it so much spiritual joy, and I take it to be of the working of God's Spirit for the contentation of your request, as he wrought in Peter to satisfy Cornelius. Therefore I interpret this beautiful city to be the glorious church of Christ; and the appearance of it in the sky, signifieth the heavenly state thereof, whose conversation is in heaven; and that according to the primitive church which is now in heaven, men ought to measure and judge the church of Christ now on earth: for as the prophet David saith, "The foundations thereof be in the holy hills, and glorious things be spoken of the city of God." And the marvellous quadrature of the same, I take to signify the universal agreement of the same, and that all the church here militant ought to consent to the primitive church throughout the four parts of the world; as the prophet affirmeth, saying, "God maketh us to dwell after one manner in one house." And that I conceived so wonderful joy at the contemplation thereof, I understand the unspeakable joy which they have that be at unity with Christ's primitive church: for there is joy in the Holy Ghost, and peace, which passeth all understanding; as it is written in the Psalms, as of joyful persons is the dwelling of all them that be in thee. And that I called others to the fruition of this vision, and to behold this wonderful city, I construe it by the will of God this vision to have come upon me musing on your letter, to the end that under this figure I might have occasion to move you with many others, to behold the primitive church in all your opinions concerning faith, and to conform yourself in all points to the same, which is the pillar and establishment of the truth, and teacheth the true use of the sacraments, and having with a greater fulness than we have now, the first fruits of the Holy Ghost, did declare the true interpretation of the scriptures, according to all verity, even as our Saviour promised to send them another Comforter, which should teach them all truth.

And since all truth was taught and revealed to the primitive church, which is our mother, let us all, that be obedient children of God, submit ourselves to the judgment of the church, for the better understanding of the articles of our faith, and of the doubtful sentences of the scripture. Let us not go about to shew in us (by following any private man's interpretation upon the word) another spirit than they of the primitive church had, lest we deceive ourselves. For there is but one faith and one Spirit, which is not contrary to himself, neither otherwise now teacheth us than he did them. Therefore let us believe as they have taught us of the scriptures, and be at peace with them, according as the true catholic church is at this day: and the God of peace will assuredly be with us, and deliver us out of all our worldly troubles and miseries, and make us partakers of their joy and blis, through our obedience to faith with them.

Therefore God commandeth us in Job, to ask of the elder generation, and to search diligently the memory of the fathers. For we are but yesterday's children, and are ignorant, and our days are like a shadow, and they shall teach thee, faith the Lord, and speak to thee, and shall utter words from their hearts. And by Solomon we are commanded, not to reject the direction of our mother. The Lord grant you to direct your steps in all things after her, and to abhor contention with her. For as St. Paul writeth, "If any man be contentious, neither we, neither the church of God hath any such custom."

Hitherto I have shewed you (good brother) my judgment generally of that you stand in doubt and dissent from others, to which I wish you as mine own heart to be conformable, and then doubtless you cannot err, but boldly may be glad in your troubles, and triumph at the hour of your death, that you shall die in the church of God a faithful martyr, and receive the crown of eternal glory. And thus much have I written upon the occasion of a vision before God unfeigned. But that you may not think that I go about to satisfy you with uncertain visions only, and not after God's word, I will take the ground of your letter, and especially answer to the same by scriptures, and by infallible reasons deduced out of the same, will prove the baptism of infants to be lawful, commendable, and necessary, whereof you seem to stand in doubt.

Indeed if you look upon the papistical synagogue only, which had corrupted God's word by false interpretations, and hath perverted the true use of Christ's sacraments, you might seem to have good handfast of your opinion against the baptism of infants. But forasmuch as it is of more antiquity, and hath it's beginning from God's word, and from the use of the primitive church, it must not in respect of the abuse in the popish church be neglected, or thought not expedient to be used in Christ's church. Auxentius, one of the Arian sect, with his adherents, was one of the first that denied the baptism of children, and next after him Pelagius the heretic, and some others that were in St. Bernard's time, as it doth appear by his writings, and in our days the Anabaptists, an inordinate kind of men stirred up by the devil, to the destruction of the gospel. But the catholic truth delivered unto us by the scriptures, plainly determineth, that all such are to be baptized, whom God acknowledgeth for his people, and voucheth them worthy of sanctification or remission of their sins. Therefore since that infants be in the number or scroll of God's people, and be partakers of the promise by their purification in Christ, it must needs follow thereby, that they ought to be baptized as well as those that can porfess their faith. For we judge the people of God as well by the free and liberal promise of God, as by the confession of faith. For to whomsoever God promiseth himself to be their God, and whom he acknowledgeth for his, those no man without great impiety may exclude from the number of the faithful. But God promiseth that he will not only be the God of such as do profess him, but also of infants, promising them his grace and remission of sins, as it appeareth by the words of the covenant made unto Abraham. "I will set my covenant between thee and me, faith the Lord, and between thy seed after thee in their generations, with an everlasting covenant, to be thy God, and the God of thy seed after thee." To which covenant circumcision was added, to be a sign of sanctification as well in children as in men; and no man may think that this promise is abrogated with circumcision and other ceremonial laws. For Christ came to fulfil the promises, and not to dissolve them. Therefore in the gospel he saith of infants, that is, of such as yet believed not, "Let the little ones come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Again, "It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that any one of these little ones do perish." Also, "He that receiveth one of these little ones receiveth me. Take heed therefore that ye despise not one of these babes, for I tell you their angels do continually see in heaven my Father's face." And what may be said more plain than this? It is not the will of the heavenly Father that the infants should perish; whereby we may gather, that he receiveth them freely unto his grace, although as yet they confess not their faith. Since then that the word of the promises, which is contained in baptism, pertaineth as well to children as to men, why should the sign of the promise, which is baptism in water, be withdrawn from children, when Christ himself commandeth them to be received of us, and promiseth the reward of a prophet to those that receive such a little infant, as he for an example did put before his disciples?

Now will I prove with manifest arguments that children ought to be baptized, and that the apostles of Christ did baptize children. The Lord commanded his apostles to baptize all nations; therefore also children ought to be baptized, for they are comprehended under this word, All nations.

Further, whom God doth account among the faithful, they are faithful, for it was said to Peter, "That thing which God hath purified, thou shalt not say to be common or unclean." But God doth repute children among the faithful: therefore, they are faithful, except we had rather to resist God, and seem stronger and wiser than he.

And without all doubt the apostles baptized those which Christ commanded: but he commanded the faithful to be baptized, among which infants are reckoned: the apostles then baptized infants.

The gospel is more than baptism, for Paul said, "The Lord sent me to preach the gospel, and not to baptize:" not that he denied absolutely that he was sent to baptize, but that he preferred doctrine before baptism, for the Lord commanded both to the apostles: but children be received by the doctrine of the gospel of God, and not refused: therefore what person being of reason may deny them baptism, which is a thing less than the gospel? For in the sacraments be two things to be considered, the thing signified, and the sign, and the thing signified is greater than the sign; and from the thing signified in baptism, children are not excluded; who therefore may deny them the sign, which is baptism in water?

St. Peter could not deny them to be baptized in water, to whom he saw the Holy Ghost given, which is the certain sign of God's people: for he saith in the Acts, "May any body forbid them to be baptized in water who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" Therefore St. Peter denied not baptism to infants, for he knew certainly both by the doctrine of Christ, and by the covenant which is everlasting, that the kingdom of heaven pertaineth to infants.

None are received into the kingdom of heaven but such such as God loveth, and which are indued with the Spirit: for whoso hath not the Spirit of God, he is none of his. But infants are beloved of God, and therefore want not the Spirit of God: wherefore if they have the Spirit of God as well as men, if they be numbered among the people of God as well as we that be of age, who (I pray you) may well withstand children to be baptized with water, in the name of the Lord?

The apostles in times past, being yet not sufficiently instructed, did murmur against those which brought their children unto the Lord, but the Lord rebuked them, and said, "Let the babes come unto me." Why then do not these rebellious Anabaptists obey the commandment of the Lord? For what do they now-a-days else that bring their children to baptism, than that they did in times past which brought their children unto the Lord, and our Lord received them, and putting his hands on them, blessed them, and both by words and by gentle behaviour towards them, declared manifestly that children be the people of God, and intirely beloved by him. But some will say, Why then did not Christ baptize them? Because it is written, Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples.

Moreover, circumcision in the old law was administered to infants: therefore baptism ought to be administered in the new law unto children. For baptism is come in the stead of circumcision, as St. Paul witnesseth, saying to the Colossians, "By Christ ye are circumcised with a circumcision which is without hands, when ye put off the body of sin of the flesh, by the circumcision of Christ, being buried together with him through baptism." Behold, Paul calleth baptism the circumcision of a christian man, which is done without hands, but that with hands no man any longer ought to be circumcised, although the mystery of circumcision do still remain in faithful people.

To this I may add, that the servants of God were always ready to administer the sacraments to them for whom they were instituted. As for an example, we may behold Joshua, who most diligently procured the people of Israel to be circumcised before they entered into the land of promise; but since the apostles were the preachers of the word, and the very faithful servants of Jesus Christ, who may hereafter doubt that they baptized infants, since baptism is in the place of circumcision.

Item, The apostles did attemperate all their doings to the shadows and figures of the old Testament: therefore it is certain that they did attemperate baptism accordingly to circumcision, and baptized children because they were under the figure of baptism; for the people of Israel passed through the Red Sea, and the bottom of the water of Jordan, with their children. And although the children be not always expressed, neither the women in the holy scriptures, yet they are comprehended and understood in the same.

Also the scripture evidently telleth us, that the apostles baptized whole families or households; but the children are comprehended in a family or household, as the chiefest and dearest part thereof; therefore we may conclude, the apostles did baptize infants or children, and not only men of lawful age. And that the house or household is taken for man, woman, and child, it is manifest in the 17th of Genesis; and also in that Joseph doth call Jacob with all his house, to come out of the land of Canaan into Egypt.

Finally, I can declare out of ancient writers, that the baptism of infants hath continued from the apostles' time unto ours, neither was it instituted by any councils, neither of the pope, nor of other men, but commanded from the scripture by the apostles themselves. Origen, upon the declaration of St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, expounding the 6th chapter saith, "That the church of Christ received the baptism of infants from the very apostles." St. Jerom maketh mention of the baptism of infants in the third book against the Pelagians, and in his epistle to Leta. St. Augustine reciteth, for this purpose, a place out of John, bishop of Constantinople, in his first book against Julian, chap. 2. and he again writing to St. Jerom, epist. 28. saith, "That St. Cyprian, not making any new decree, but firmly observing the faith of the church, judged with his fellow bishops, that as soon as one was born, he might be lawfully baptized." The place of Cyprian is to be seen in his epistle to Fidus.

Also St. Augustine, in writing against the Donatists, in the fourth book, chap. 23 and 24, saith, That the baptism of infants was not derived from the authority of man, neither of councils, but from the tradition or doctrine of the apostles.

Cyril, upon Leviticus, chap. 8, approveth the baptism of children and condemneth the iteration of baptism. These authorities of men I do alledge, not to tie the baptism of children unto the testimonies of men, but to shew how men's testimonies do agree with God's word, and that the verity of antiquity is on our side, and that the Anabaptists have nothing but lies for them, and new imaginations, which feign the baptism of children to be the pope's commandment.

After this will I answer to the sum of your arguments for the contrary. The first, which includeth all the rest, is, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the glad tidings to all creatures. He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved: but he that believeth not, shall be damned," &c.

To this I answer, That nothing is added to God's word by baptism of children, as you pretend, but that is done which the same word doth require, for that children are accounted of Christ in the gospel among the number of such as believe, as it appeareth by these words, "He that offendeth one of these little babes which believe in me, it were better for him to have a mill-stone tied about his neck, and to be cast into the bottom of the sea." Where plainly Christ calleth such as be not able to confess their faith, Believers, because of his mere grace he reputeth them for believers. And this is no wonder so to be taken, since God imputeth faith for righteousness unto men that be of riper age: for both in men and children, righteousness, acceptation, sanctification, is of mere grace, and by imputation, that the glory of God's grace might be praised.

And that children of faithful parents are sanctified, and that among such as do believe, is apparent in the seventh chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians. And whereas you do gather by the order of the words in the said commandment of Christ, that children ought to be taught before they be baptized, and to this end you alledge many places out of the Acts, proving that such as confessed their faith first, were baptized: I answer, that if the order of words might weigh any thing in this cause, we have the scripture that maketh as well for us. For in St. Mark we read that John did baptize in the desert, preaching the baptism of repentance. In which place we see baptizing go before, and preaching to follow after.

And also I will declare this place of Matthew, exactly considered, to make for the use of baptism in children; for St. Matthew hath it written in this wise, "All power is given me (saith the Lord) in heaven and in earth," therefore going forth MATTHEWUSATE, that is, Disciple ye, (as I may express the signification of the word) or, Make or gather to me disciples of all nations. And following, he declareth the way how they should gather to him disciples out of all nations, "Baptizing them and teaching;" by baptizing and teaching ye shall procure a church to me. And both these aptly and briefly severally he setteth forth, saying, "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Now then, baptism goeth before doctrine.

But hereby I do not gather, that the Gentiles who never heard any thing before of God, and of the Son of God, and of the Holy Ghost, ought to be baptized, neither would they permit themselves to be baptized before they knew to what end. But this I have declared to shew you upon how feeble foundation the Anabaptists be grounded. And plainly it is not true, which they imagine of this text, that the Lord did only command such to be baptized whom the apostles had first of all taught taught. Neither here verily is signified who only are to be baptized, but he speaketh of such as be at perfect age, and of the first foundations of faith, and of the church to be planted among the Gentiles, which were as yet rude and ignorant of religion.

Such as be of age may hear, believe, and confess that which is preached and taught, but infants cannot: therefore we may justly collect, that he speaketh nothing here of infants or children. But for all this they ought not to be excluded from baptism.

It is a general rule, "He that doth not labour must not eat." But who is so barbarous as to think hereby, that children should be famished?

The Lord sent his apostles, at the beginning of his setting up his true religion, unto all nations, unto such as were both ignorant of God, and were out of the covenant of God; and truly such persons it behoved not first to be baptized, and afterward taught; but first to be taught, and after baptized. If at this day we should go to the Turks to convert them to the faith of Christ, verily first we ought to teach them, and afterwards baptize such as would yield to be the servants of Christ. Likewise the Lord himself in time past did, when first he renewed the covenant with Abraham, and ordained circumcision to be a seal of the covenant after that Abraham was circumcised. But he, when he perceived the infants also to pertain to the covenant, and that circumcision was the sealing up of the covenant, did not only circumcise Ishmael his son, that was 13 years of age, but all other infants that were born in his house, among whom we reckon Isaac.

Even so, faithful people who were converted from heathen idolatry by the preaching of the gospel, and confessing the faith, were baptized; when they understood their children to be counted among the people of God, and that baptism was the token of the children of God, they procured also their children to be baptized. Therefore, it is written, "Abraham circumcised all the male children in his house." In like manner we read in the Acts and writings of the apostles, that after the master of the house was turned to the faith, all the whole house was baptized. And as concerning those which of old time were compelled to confess their faith before they received baptism, which were called Catechumeni, they were such as with our fore-fathers came from the Gentiles into the church, who being yet rude of faith, they did instruct in the principles of their belief, and afterward they did baptize them; but the same ancient fathers notwithstanding did baptize the children of faithful men, as I have already partly declared.

And because you do require a hasty answer of your letter of one that is but a dull writer, I am here enforced to cease particularly to go through your letter in answering thereto, knowing that I have fully answered every part thereof, in that I have already written, although not in such order as it had been meet, and as I purposed. But forasmuch as I understand that you will be no contentious man, neither in this matter, nor in any other contrary to the judgment of Christ's primitive church, which is the body and fulness of Christ, I desire you in the fulness of him, or rather Christ desireth you by me (that your joy may be perfect, whereto you are now called) to submit your judgment to that church, and to be at peace and unity in the same; that the coat of Christ, which ought to be without seam, but now, alas, most miserably torn in pieces by many dangerous sects and damnable opinions, may appear to you in no part to have been rent, neither that any giddy head in these dog-days, might take an example by you to dissent from Christ's true church: I beseech thee, dear brother in the gospel, follow the steps of the faith of the glorious in the primitive church, and of such as at this day follow the same; decline from them neither to the right hand nor to the left. Then shall death, be it ever so bitter, be more sweet than this life: then shall Christ with all the heavenly Jerusalem triumphantly embrace your spirit with unspeakable gladness and exultation, who in this earth was content to join your spirit with their spirits, according as it is commanded by the word, that the spirit of the prophets should be subject to the prophets. One thing ask with David ere you depart, and require the same, that you may dwell with a full accord in his house, for there is glory and worship: and so with Simeon in the temple embracing Christ, depart in peace: to which peace Christ bring both you and me, and all our loving brethren that love God in the unity of faith, by such ways as shall please him, to his glory. Let the bitter passion of Christ, which he suffered for your sake, and the horrible torments which the godly martyrs of Christ have endured before us, and also the inestimable reward of your life to come, which is hidden yet a little while from you with Christ, strengthen, comfort, and encourage you to the end of that glorious race which you are in, Amen.

Your yoke-fellow in captivity for the verity of Christ's gospel, to live and die with you in the unity of faith.

JOHN PHILPOT.

Other letters were written by Mr. Philpot to divers persons, but these, as most principal, I have inserted. Amongst which I thought here not much impertinent to the place, to adjoin another certain letter of a godly and zealous gospeller (whose name in her writing doth not appear), who in defending and commending the quarrel of Mr. John Philpot, the famous and worthy martyr of Christ, was therefore troubled and brought before bishop Bonner. And therefore being appointed by the said bishop to appear upon a certain day to answer for herself: indeed kept not her day with the bishop, but instead of her appearance, sent him this letter here following:

"Woe be unto the idolatrous shepherds of England, that feed themselves. Should not the shepherds feed the flock? but ye have eaten the fat, ye have cloathed you with the wool; the best fed have ye slain, but the flock have ye not nourished, the weak have ye not holden up, the sick have ye not healed, the broken have ye not bound together, the outcasts have ye not brought again, the lost have ye not sought, but churlishly and cruelly have ye used them," Ezekiel xxxiv.

FORASMUCH (my lord) as my business is such that I cannot come to your lordship, according to my promise, I have been so bold to write these few words unto you, partly to excuse mine absence, and partly to answer your lordship's demands at my last most happy departure from you. As touching the breach of my promise with you in not coming again at the hour appointed, your lordship shall understand that I take the counsel of the angel, which warned the wise men not to come again to Herod according to their promise, but to return home again another way. Now, my lord, I perceive your lordship to be a more cruel tyrant than ever was Herod, and more desirous to destroy Christ in his poor members than ever he was, who to destroy Christ killed his own son, I thought good to take the angel's counsel, and to come no more to you; for I see that you are set all in a rage like a ravening wolf against the poor lambs of Christ, appointed to the slaughter for the testimony of the truth. Indeed you are called the common cut-throat, and general slaughter-house to all the bishops in England; and therefore it is wisdom for me and all other simple sheep of the Lord, to keep us out of your butcher's stall as long as we can: especially seeing that you have such store already, that you are not able to drink all their blood, lest you should break your belly; and therefore let them lie still and die with hunger. Therefore (my lord) I thought it good to tarry a while until your lordship's stomach were come to you a little better; for I do perceive by your great fat cheeks, that you lack no lamb's flesh yet, and belike you are almost glutted with supping so much blood, and therefore you will let some of the leanest die in prison, which will then be meat good enough for your barking beagles, Harpsfield and his fellows: but yet, my lord, it were a great deal more for your lordship's honour, if your chaplains chaplains might have the meat roasted in Smithfield at the fire of the stake, yea, and when it is something fat, and fair liking; for now they have nothing but skin and bones, and if the dogs come hastily to it, they may chance shortly to be choaked, and then your hunting will be greatly hindered, if it be not altogether marred. I hear say, my lord, that some of the butcherly curs came of late to my house to seek their prey, and that they go round about the city (as David saith) grinning and grudging that they have not meat enough: therefore belike they have killed my poor brethren and sisters, that have lain so long upon the butcherly stall, and eaten them up: for I hear say their friends could not be suffered to see them these three days and more; therefore I perceive now that if I had come again according to my promise, your lordship, like a ravening wolf, or else some of your hell-hounds, would quickly have worried me: but I see well my appointed time is not yet come, therefore I will yet live and thank God for my deliverance with continual songs of laud and praise. Thus have I been bold to trouble your lordship with telling you the truth, and the very cause that came not to you again according to my unpurposed promise. I trust your lordship will take this in good part, and accept it as a lawful excuse, and not doubting but your lordship would have done the like if you had been in my case.

Now concerning the second part that caused me to write unto your lordship, which is to answer unto your subtle or rather cruel demand of my judgment of the death of that blessed martyr of Christ Jesus, good Mr. Philpot, I will answer your lordship simply and plainly, what peril soever shall come thereof. Truly, my lord, I do not only think, but I am also most certain and sure, that he was a very man of God, died a true martyr, and constant confessor of his dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom he did most faithfully commit his dear soul, who will surely keep the same with him in joy for evermore. Also, my lord, I do verily believe and know, that your lordship hath committed a most cruel murder in the unjust condemning and killing of him, and that you shall make as heavy an account for his blood, which shortly shall be required at your hand, as ever your great grandfather, cruel Cain, did or shall do for his innocent brother Abel. Moreover, because I am credibly informed, that your lordship doth believe, and have in secret said, that there is no hell, I certify you, that your lordship never did any thing in all your life that did so much redound to your lordship's dishonour, and perpetual shame and infamy, as your killing the body of this blessed prophet doth; especially seeing that he was none of your diocese; nor had offended any of your lordship's devilish and cruel laws. Verily I hear almost every body say in all places where I come, that your lordship is made the common slaughter-slave to all your fellows, bite-sheep bishops I would say; yea, the very papists themselves begin now to abhor your blood-thirstiness, and speak shame of your tyranny and cruelty. Believe me, my lord, every child that can any whit speak, can call upon your name and say, Bloody Bonner is bishop of London; and every man hath it as perfectly upon his finger ends as his Pater-noster, how many have you for your part burned with fire, and famished in prison; they say the whole sum amounteth to forty persons within this three quarters of a year. Therefore, my lord, though your lordship believeth that there is neither heaven nor hell, nor God nor devil, yet if your lordship loves your own honesty, which was lost long ago, you were best to cease from this cruel burning of true christian men, and also from murdering of some in prison; for that indeed offendeth men's minds most; yea, even your old friends, the rankest papists that be. For, say they, Felix the heathen ruler did not forbid Paul's friends to visit him in prison, and to bring him necessary relief; and therefore it is a very great shame and sin, to see a bishop that beareth the name of a christian, to be more cruel upon his poor brethren, than an Heathen, Turk, or Infidel.

These are men's sayings in every place, not only of this realm, but also of the most part of the world, and the common talk they have of your lordship; therefore I thought to be so bold with your lordship, as to tell you of it, though perchance you will give me but small thanks for my labour. Well, as for that, I put it to your lordship's choice, for I have as much already as I look for: finally, my lord, I will give you to understand, that the death of this constant martyr and valiant soldier of Jesus Christ, hath given a greater shake towards the overthrowing of your papistical kingdom, than you shall ever be able to recover again these seven years, do the best you can, and set as many crafty daubers to patch it up with untempered clay as you will; yea, though prating Pentleton, that wicked apostate, apply all his wily wits to help them. Verily, my lord, by all men's reports, his blessed life could never have done the like sorrow to Satan's synagogue, whereof some say your lordship is a mighty member, as his happy death hath done. You have broken a pot indeed, but the precious word contained therein is so notably therewith shed abroad, that the sweet savour thereof hath wonderfully well refreshed all the true household or congregation of Christ, that they cannot abide any more the stinking savour of your filthy ware that came from the dunghill of Rome, though your lordship's Judases do set them to sale every where to fill your bags. I put your lordship out of doubt, that if you do break any more such pots, you will mar your own market altogether: for I promise you, most men begin to mislike your devilish doings, and wonderfully to loathe your popish pedlary wares.

Thus have I (according to your lordship's command) shewed you simply what I think of that good man's death, whose blood crieth for vengeance against your lordship's butcherly bloody proceedings in the ears of the Lord of Hosts, who will shortly revenge the same upon your pilled pate, and upon the rest of your poll-thorn brethren, the very marked cattle of the great Antichrist of Rome. The measure of his iniquity is filled up to the brim, therefore God will shortly pour in double unto your deserved destruction. And then your new made proselytes will be glad to cover their crowns with filth and dirt (saving your lordship's reverence I should have said first). Well, I rather desire their conversion than confusion, the Lord send one of them shortly, as may be most to his glory, Amen.

I signify also unto your lordship, that the railing words which your lying preacher shewed forth of his filthy fountain upon Sunday, against the dear servant of God, good Mr. Philpot, do greatly redound to your lordship's dishonesty, and much deface your spiritual honour. Verily I see that the great wrath of God hath so blinded your eyes, that you see not what is with you, nor what is against you, but still you vomit out your own shame, and make all the world to wonder at you. Was it not enough for you to condemn him most unjustly, yea, contrary to your own laws, and to kill his innocent body most tyrannously, but you must also set a lying limb of the devil to blaspheme, slander, and belie him, now he is dead? O viperous generation, seed of the serpent, and right children of the devil: full well do you counterfeit your father's steps, whom Christ calleth a murderer, and a liar from the beginning; which two things are the only weapons of your war, wherewith you maintain all your mischief, that is to say, lying and murder; for those whom you cannot overcome with your lying persuasions, them you kill most cruelly, and then blaspheme and belie them with railing sentences when they are dead. But all this will not blind the people of God, nor yet make them any whit the less believe the truth, nor abate their love from the true preachers thereof, yea, it is a true sign and a token that they are the very disciples of Christ; for he hath said, "Blessed are ye when men revile you, and say all manner of evil sayings against you for my name's sake. Rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven." And doubtless great is that good man's reward in heaven by this time, as your lordship's damnation shall be great in hell, except you repent and cease from shedding innocent blood. But it is to be feared your heart is hardened as Pharaoh was, seeing that with Judas you have sold and betrayed your master. Take heed, my lord, lest you come to the same end, or a worse than he did: for verily I cannot perceive how you should escape it long; therefore say not but that a woman gave you warning, if you like to take it. And as for the obtaining your popish purpose in suppressing the truth, I put you out of doubt, you shall not obtain it so long as you go the way to work as you do; for verily I believe that you have lost the hearts of twenty thousand that were rank papists within these twelve months.

It is found very true what one holy doctor saith, The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the gospel; when one is put to death, a thousand do rise from him. And that this is true, you may well perceive by the hearty love that the people shewed unto good Mr. Philpot at his going to his death. They went not about to make an idol of him, as your adders' brood would have men imagine; but they worshipped God who gave such strength to his dear child, to die so constantly for the testimony of his truth, to the utter destruction of that detestable idolatry which your lordship doth most devilishly maintain with the force of fire, faggots, and sword; yea, and rather than fail, to furnish men in prison again, as you have done already. It is reported by your own tormentors, that the six prisoners which you have in your prison, are put in six several places all the day, and every night brought together, and set in the stocks. Forsooth, my lord, this doth get you a foul name all about the country, and yet all will not help your lordship's pestilent purpose, but every way hinder the same. For Zorobabel will be found no liar, who said, The truth shall have victory. You do but strive against the stream, and kick against the pricks; the Lord doth laugh your doings to scorn, and will bring all your counsels and devices to nought (as knoweth the Lord God), who of his great mercy shortly convert your lordship, or utterly confound you, and get his name a glory over you, Amen.

Your lordship's suppliant, who prayeth daily to God that he may reward you according to your deeds, Anno 1556.

Then follows an account of seven martyrs who suffered together at London for the true faith of the gospel, on the 27th of January, 1555; whose names were, Thomas Whittle, priest; Bartlet Green, gentleman; Thomas Browne, John Judson, and John Went, artificers; Isabel Forster, a married woman; and Joan Lashford, alias Warne, a single woman, whose parents had suffered martyrdom in the preceding year. To say nothing of their various private examinations in the bishop's house, to which their replies were no way satisfactory; he caused to be prepared nine articles, and to be administered to them in his consistory, which, with their answers, were in substance to this effect. The first respected a catholic church, to which they all agreed, but John Judson and Thomas Brown added, that the church of England, as then used, was no part of that church. The second of the seven sacraments was denied by all of them, who acknowledged but two; and John Went and Judson farther asserted, that the sacrament of the altar, as then used, was an idol, and no sacrament. The third, relative to their baptism in the faith of the catholic church, was admitted as done in the faith of Christ, and the church then taught. The fourth had relation to a departure from their faith, which they asserted they had not; but John Went observed his dislike of the sacrament of the altar seven years before, and John Judson and Isabel Forster to the like effect. The fifth charged them with swerving from the catholic faith, which they denied, as they had only swerved from the church of Rome. To the sixth, on their being reconciled to the unity of the church, they were not averse, but could not be reconciled to the church of Rome. The seventh related to the sacrament of the altar and the real presence, which last they denied. The eighth stated their being delivered over to him for contumacy, which they severally explained; and the ninth, which related to the truth of the premises, was admitted, as they had respectively answered.

The History of the Rev. THOMAS WHITTLE, Martyr.

Having served a parish in Essex, he had been induced to sign a recantation of what he had taught in king Edward's days. After being expelled from this place, he for some time preached as an itinerant, until he was apprehended by a gaping sycophant with the hope of reward and promotion; who first brought him as a prisoner to the bishop of Winchester, and afterwards to the bishop of London. The latter used him very rudely; but, after several conferences, committed him to the care of Dr. Harpsfield, whilst he retired to Fulham. In these intervals he had been found in the coal-house by Mr. Philpot, of whom an account has been lately given; and when Dr. Harpsfield came to him, instead of endeavouring by arguments to convince him, a bill of submission was tendered to him, which his afflictions pressed him to sign. But this had been no sooner done, than he felt much sorrow and remorse for such an act; for as he says, in his own narrative, his mind and conscience told him by God's word, that he had done wrong. On which he makes this important reflection:

Let every man that God shall deliver into their hands take good heed and cleave fast to Christ: for they will leave no corner of his conscience unsought, but will attempt all guileful and subtil means to corrupt him, to fall both from God and his truth. But yet let no man despair of God's help, for Peter did fall and rise again. And David saith, "A righteous man, though he fall, he shall not be cast away: for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand." For my own part, I have felt my infirmities, and yet I found God's present help and comfort in time of need, I thank him therefore.

The night after I had subscribed I was sore grieved, and for sorrow of conscience could not sleep. For in the deliverance of my body out of bonds, which I might have had, I could find no joy nor comfort, but still was in my conscience tormented more and more, being assured by God's Spirit and his word, that I through evil counsel and advice had done amiss. And both with disquietude of mind, and with my other cruel handling, I was sickly; lying upon the ground when the keeper came; and so I desired him to pray Dr. Harpsfield to come to me, and so he did.

And when he came, and the register with him, I told him that I was not well at ease, but especially I told him I was grieved very much in my conscience and mind because I had subscribed. And I said that my conscience had so accused me, through the just judgment of God and his word, that I had felt hell in my conscience, and Satan ready to devour me: and therefore I pray you, Mr. Harpsfield, (said I) let me have the bill again, for I will not stand to it. So he gently commanded it to be fetched, and gave it me and suffered me to put out my name, whereof I was right glad when I had so done, although death should follow. And hereby I had experience of God's providence and mercy towards me, who trieth his people, and suffereth them to fall, but not to be lost: for in the midst of this temptation and trouble, he gave me warning of my deed, and also delivered me; his name be praised for evermore, Amen.

Neither devil nor cruel tyrant can pluck any of Christ's sheep out of his hand. Of which flock of Christ's sheep I trust undoubtedly I am one, by means of his death and blood-shedding, which shall at the last day stand at his right-hand, and receive with others his blessed benediction. And now, being condemned to die, my conscience and mind, I praise God, is quiet in Christ, and I by his grace am very willing and content to give over this body to the death, for the testimony of his truth and pure religion, against Antichrist and all his false religion and doctrine. They that report otherwise of me, speak not truly. And as for Fountain, I saw him not all this while.

By me THOMAS WHITTLE, Minister.

The Condemnation and Martyrdom of Mr. THOMAS WHITTLE.

AT his last examination before the bishop upon the 14th day of January, 1556, bishop Bonner, with others sitting in his consistory in the afternoon, first called forth Thomas Whittle, with whom he began in effect as followeth: Because you be a priest (said he) as I and other bishops here be, and did receive the order of priesthood after the right and form of the catholic church, you shall not think but I will administer justice as well unto you as unto others. And then the said Bonner, in further communication, did charge him, that where in times past he said mass according to the order then used, the same Whittle now of late had spoken and railed against the same, saying, that it was idolatry and abomination. Whereunto Thomas Whittle answering again, said, That at such a time as he so said mass, he was then ignorant, &c. adding that the elevation of the sacrament at the mass, giveth occasion of idolatry to them that be ignorant and unlearned.

After this the bishop making haste to the articles came to this, That thou wast in times past baptized in the faith of the catholic church.

To this Whittle replied, I was baptized in the faith of the catholic church, although I did forsake the church of Rome. And you, my lord, do call these heresies which are no heresies, and do charge me therewith as heresies, and you ground yourself upon that religion which is not agreeable to God's word, &c.

Thomas Whittle was again admonished, and with persuasions intreated by the bishop; who because he would not agree unto the same, the bishop forthwith proceeded first to his degradation. The order and manner of which their popish and most vain degradation, may be seen before in the history of bishop Hooper.

Then Whittle, in the midst of the ceremonies, when he saw them so busy in degrading him, after their father the pope's pontifical fashion, said unto them, Paul and Titus had not so much to do with their priests and bishops. And farther, speaking to the bishop, he said unto him, My lord, your religion standeth most with the church of Rome, and not with the catholic church of Christ.

The bishop after this, according to his accustomed formal proceedings, tried him yet again with words, rather than with substantial arguments, to conform him to his religion. Who then refusing so to do, said, As for your religion, I cannot be persuaded that it is according to God's word.

The bishop then asked, what fault he found in the administration of the sacrament of the altar?

Whittle answered and said, It is not used according to Christ's institution, in that it is privately and not openly done. And also because it is administered but in one kind to the lay-people, which is against Christ's ordinance. Farther, Christ commanded it not to be elevated nor adored: for the adoration and elevation cannot be proved by scripture.

Well, said Bonner, my lords here and other learned men have shewed great learning for thy conversion, wherefore if thou wilt yet return to the faith and religion of the catholic church, I will receive thee thereunto, and not commit thee to the secular power, &c. To make short, Whittle, strengthened with the grace of the Lord, stood strong and immovable in what he had affirmed. Wherefore the sentence being read, the next day following he was committed to the secular power, and so in a few days after brought to the fire with the other six above-named, sealing up the testimony of his doctrine with his blood, which he willingly and cheerfully gave for witness of the truth.

Mr. Whittle wrote several letters during his confinement. Letter I. is addressed to Mr. J. Careless, prisoner at the same time; and Letter II. to his friend John Went and other prisoners.

LETTER III.

From Mr. WHITTLE to all the true Professors and Lovers of GOD's Holy Gospel, within the City of London.

DEARLY beloved, be not troubled in this heat which is now come amongst you to try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you, but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's passions, that when his glory appeareth, ye may be merry and glad, &c. Out of these words of St. Peter I gather more especially these four notes. First, that persecution happeneth to Christ's church for their trial, that is, for the probation and proof of their faith. Which faith, like as it is known with God in the depth of our hearts, so will he have it made manifest to the whole world through persecution, that so it may evidently appear that he hath such a church and people upon earth, which so trusteth in him and feareth his holy name, that no kind of persecution, pains, nor death, shall be able to separate them from the love of him. And thus was Abraham tried, and Job tempted, that their faith, which before lay hid almost in their hearts, might be made known to the whole world to be so stedfast and strong, that neither the devil, natural love, nor any other enemy could be able to bereave them thereof. Whereby also God was to be magnified, who hath tried his people by many tribulations, and also standeth by them in the midst of their troubles, to deliver them by life or death as he seeth best: like as he assisted Lot and delivered him out of his enemy's hands; Joseph out of the hands of his brethren, and out of prison; Paul from his enemies in Damascus, and the apostles out of the stocks and prison.

These with many more he delivered to life; and also he delivered Abel, Eleazar, Stephen and John Baptist, with many others by death, and hath also by the trial of their faith made them good precedents and examples to us and all that come after, to suffer affliction in the like cause: as St. James saith, Take, my brethren (saith he) the prophets for an example of suffering adversity and of long patience, which spake unto you in the name of the Lord: behold, we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have known what end the Lord made with him, for the Lord is very pitiful and merciful. Also the Lord trieth us, to let us see our own hearts and thoughts, that no hypocrisy or ambition deceive us, and that the strong in Christ may pray that he fall not but endure to the end; and that those that fall through fearful infirmity, might speedily repent and rise again with Peter, and also that the weak ones might bewail their weakness, and cry with David, Psal. vi. "Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am weak: O Lord, heal me, for all my bones are vexed." Abide the trial (dear friends), that ye may obtain the crown of life. Fight manfully in this the Lord's cause, that ye may obtain a glorious victory here, and receive greater reward in heaven hereafter.

As ye are called christians, and would be angry to be called Jews or Turks, so declare your christianity by following the steps of Christ, whose name ye bear; suffer with him and for his gospel's sake, rather than deny him or defile your faith and conscience with false worshipping of Romish religion.

Take up your cross (my hearts) now when it is offered you, and go up with Christ to Jerusalem amongst the bishops, priests, and rulers, if God call you thereto, and they will anon send you to Calvary: from whence (dying in the cause of the gospel, wherein our good preachers and brethren have given their lives) your souls (I warrant you) through Christ Jesus shall ascend to God that gave them, and that body shall come after at the last day, and so shall ye dwell with the Lord for ever in unspeakable joy and bliss. O blessed are they that suffer persecution for righteousness' sake as Christ's people in this Jewish England now doth, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. O my beloved, set your minds on this kingdom, where Christ our head and king is; considering that as the brute beast looketh downwards with the face towards the earth; so man is made contrariwise with his face looking upwards towards the heavens, because his conversation should be in heaven and heavenly things, and not upon the earth and earthly things, as St. Paul saith, Coloss. iii. Set your mind on things that are above, where Christ is. And again he saith, Phil. iii. Our conversation is in heaven, from whence we look for our Saviour, who will change our vile bodies, and make them like to his glorious body. O the glorious estate that we be called unto! The Lord preserve us harmless unto his eternal kingdom through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

The second thing that I note in the aforesaid words of Peter, is, that he calleth persecution no strange thing. And truth it is: for which of the prophets were not persecuted, with Christ and his apostles, and some of them in the end cruelly killed for the truth's sake? Cain killed Abel, Isaac was persecuted of Ishmael, Jacob was hated of Esau, Joseph was imprisoned and set in the stocks, the prophet Isaiah was cut in two with a saw, Jeremiah was stoned, Micaiah was buffeted and fed with bread and water, Elias was sore persecuted, Eleazar, and the woman with her seven sons, were cruelly killed. What Christ and the apostles suffered is well known. So that by many tribulations (as Paul saith, Acts xiv.) we must enter into the kingdom of heaven. All the holy prophets, Christ and his apostles, suffered such afflictions not for evil doing, but for preaching God's word, for rebuking the world of sin, and for their faith in Jesus Christ.

This is the ordinance of God (my friends), this is the high way to heaven, by corporal death to eternal life, as Christ saith, John v. He that heareth my words, and believeth in him that sent me, hath eternal life; and shall not come into judgment, but is escaped from death to life. Let us never fear death, which is killed by Christ, but believe in him, and live for ever, as St. Paul saith, Rom. viii. There is no damnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, which walk not after the flesh but after the spirit. And again, Paul saith, 1 Cor. xv. Death, where is thy sting? Hell, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, which hath given us the victory through Jesus Christ.

Besides this, ye have seen, and daily do see, the blood of your good preachers and brethren, which hath been shed in the gospel's cause in this sinful Sodom, this bloody Jerusalem, this unhappy city of London. Let not their blood be forgotten, nor the blood of your good bishop Ridley, who like a shepherd, to your comfort and example, hath given his life for his sheep. Good St. Paul saith, Heb. xiii. Remember them that have spoken to you the word of God, and look upon the end of their conversation, and follow their faith.

The devil ever stirreth up false teachers, as he hath done now over all England, as Peter, Paul, and Jude prophesied it should be, to poison and kill our souls with the false doctrine. And where he faileth of his purpose that way, then moveth he his members to persecute the silly carcasses of the saints, because they will not deny nor dissemble their pure faith in our living Christ, and confess a dead breadly Christ, and honour the same as Christ, God and man, contrary to God's commandment, Exod. xx.

This is the working of Satan, who knowing his own just damnation, would have all mankind to be partakers with him of the same; such a mortal hatred beareth he against God and his people. And therefore when this wicked tempter could not kill Christ, with subtil temptation to fall down and worship him, then he stirred up his servants the bishops and pharisees to kill his body, whereby notwithstanding the devil lost his title and interest which he had to man's soul, and man by his precious passion and death was ransomed from the devil, death and hell, to immortality and life everlasting: and so when Satan thought to have won all in killing of Christ, he lost all: and so shall he do in us, if we abide constant and strong in the faith of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ unto the end. God grant it for his mercy's sake in Christ. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him. Amen.

Wherefore (my hearty beloved brethren and sisters) be of good comfort through Jesus Christ, for he that is in us is stronger than he that is in the world. Therefore draw ye near to God, and he will draw near to you. Resist the devil, and he will (as St. James saith) flee from you. Beware of the leaven of the pharisees. Touch not pitch lest ye be defiled therewith. Eat no swine's flesh, for it is against the law; I mean, defile not yourselves either inwardly or outwardly with this false and wicked religion of Antichrist: for it is nothing else but pitch and swine's flesh. Beware of the beast's mark, lest ye drink of the cup of God's wrath. If God hath given you knowledge and faith, dissemble not therewith. Deny not the known verity before men, lest Christ deny you before his Father. Come away from Babylon, as St. John biddeth you, Rev. xviii. and touch no unclean thing, but separate yourselves from the company of the ungodly, as St. Paul commandeth you. Whatsoever you have done amiss heretofore, now repent ye and amend: for with the Lord there is mercy and plentiful redemption.

The third thing and note which I gather out of the aforesaid words of Peter, is this, that he saith, Rejoice, because ye are partakers of Christ's passion. Our sufferings (my well beloved) are Christ's sufferings, and that injury that is done to us for his sake, he reckoneth it to be done to himself, as he said to St. Paul, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Therefore we ought to rejoice in our sufferings, as St. Paul writeth, which we suffer with Christ, and one with another, as St. Peter said, and to fulfil that which is behind of the passions of Christ in our flesh; which Christ hath, by his passion, fully redeemed and saved us in his own person: howbeit, his elect must suffer with him and for him unto the world's end, that he may be glorified in them, and they thereby corrected and cleansed from sin in this world, and be made more meet temples for the Holy Ghost, and also obtain a great reward in heaven for their suffering for righteousness' sake, according to his promise. And therefore I say (my brethren) rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, rejoice. Let us rejoice in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified to us, and we to the world.

And why should we so greatly rejoice in the cross of Christ, which we now suffer? Because (saith St. Peter) when his glory appeareth, we may be merry and glad. And this is the fourth note that I gather out of his words above written. Wherein is set out the reward of suffering, not to be had in this world; but at his coming to judgment when we shall be raised again; and then shall they that have sown in tears reap in joy, as Christ saith, Blessed are they that weep here, for they shall laugh. Blessed are ye when men hate you, thrust you out of their company, railing on you, and abhorring your name as an evil thing for the Son of man's sake: rejoice ye in that day and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven.

Wherefore (my dearly beloved) through the hope of this heavenly joy and reward, which he that cannot lie hath promised (which joy is so great that no ear hath heard, no eye hath seen, nor the heart can think, where we shall dwell for ever in the heavenly city, the celestial Jerusalem, in the presence of God the Father, and Jesus Christ our Mediator, as Paul saith, and in the company of innumerable angels, and with the spirits and souls of all faithful and just men), rejoice and be glad: and seeing ye be called to so great glory, see that you make your election and vocation sure by good works, and especially by suffering adversity for the gospel's sake: for it is given us of God, saith St. Paul, not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for his sake. Continue in prayer, and pray for me, that I may end my course with joy. Have brotherly love amongst yourselves, which is a token that ye be Christ's disciples. Edify and comfort one another in the word of the Lord, and the God of peace and love be with you always, Amen. For your liberality and kindness shewed upon the prisoners and afflicted people of God in this time of persecution, the Lord will reward you when he cometh to reward every man according to his deeds, and will not leave a cup of cold water bestowed upon his faithful people unrewarded. God make you rich in all grace, that ye always having sufficient, may be rich unto all manner of good works.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you always, Amen.

Your brother now in bonds for the gospel,

THOMAS WHITTLE.

The remaining letters are to the same purport, addressed to other godly and persecuted brethren.

HISTORY of the APPREHENSION, SUFFERINGS, &c. of Mr. BARTLET GREEN.

AFTER the martyrdom of Mr. Whittle, Bartlet Green the next day was likewise condemned. Mr. Green was of a good house, and had such parents, as both favoured learning, and were also willing to bring up this their child in the same. After some entrance in other inferior schools, he was sent to the university of Oxford; where through exercise and diligent study he so profited, that in a short time he attained, as well to the knowledge of sundry profane sciences, as also now in his last years unto the godly understanding of divinity. Whereunto through ignorance (in which he was trained up from his youth) he was at first an utter enemy, until such time as God of his mercy had opened his eyes, by his often repairing unto the common lectures of Peter Martyr, reader of the divinity-lecture in the same university, so that thereby he saw the true light of Christ's gospel.

When he was called by his friends from the university, he was placed in the Temple at London, there to attain to the knowledge of the common laws of the realm; he continued still in his former study and earnest profession of the gospel; wherein also he greatly profited. For the better maintenance of himself in these his studies, and other his affairs, he had a large exhibition of his grandfather, Mr. Doctor Bartlet, who during the time of Green's imprisonment made unto him large offers of great livings, if he would recant, and (forsaking the truth and the gospel of Christ) come home again to the church and synagogue of Rome. But his persuasions took small effect in his faithful heart. He was a man beloved of all men (except the papists, who love none that love the truth), and so he well deserved: for he was of a meek, humble, discreet, and most gentle behaviour to all. Injurious he was to none, beneficial to many, especially to those who were of the household of faith, as appeareth, amongst others, by his friendly dealing with Mr. Christopher Goodman, at that time a poor exile beyond the seas. With whom this Bartlet Green (as well for his toward learning, as also for his sober and godly behaviour) had often society in Oxford, in the days of good king Edward: who now, notwithstanding his friend's misery and banishment, he did not lightly forget; consequently his letters, by the apprehension of the bearer, fell into the hands of the king and queen's council. Who, at their convenient leisure, perused the whole number; in the contents whereof (amongst other news and private matters) they found these words, The queen is not yet dead. Which words were only written as an answer, to certify Mr. Goodman of the truth of his former demand. Howbeit (to some of the council) they seemed very heinous words, but not being able to prove them treasonable, they then examined him upon his faith in religion, and his answers being such as little pleased them after they had detained him in prison, as well in the Tower of London as elsewhere, they sent him to Bonner, bishop of London, to be ordered according to his ecclesiastical law, as appeareth by their letters sent to the bishop, with the said prisoner also: wherein it may appear that Sir John Bourne (then secretary to the queen) was a chief stirrer in such cases, yea and an enticer of the council: who otherwise (if for fear they durst) would have been content to have let such matters alone. The Lord forgive them their weakness, if it be his good pleasure, and give all such men true repentance, Amen.

A LETTER

Of BARTLET GREEN, written to JOHN PHILPOT, containing, besides other particular Matters betwixt him and Mr. PHILPOT, a brief Rehearsal of his Conferences with Bishop BONNER and others, at his first coming before them.

THAT which was wanting in task (through my default) at your being here, I have supplied by writing in your absence, now at length getting some opportunity and leisure. The 17th day of November, being brought hither by two of the clock in the afternoon, I was presented before my lord of London, and other two bishops, Mr. Deane, Mr. Roper, Mr. Welch, Dr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, and two or three others, all sitting at one table. There were present Dr. Dale, Mr. George Mordaunt, Mr. Dee. Then after the bishop of London had read unto himself the letter that came from the council, he spake with more words, but (as I remember) to this effect; that the cause of their assembly was, to hear my examination, whereunto he had authority by the council, and had provided Mr. Welch and another, whose name I know not, (but well I remember, though he obtained it not, yet desired he my lord, that I might hear the council's letters) to be there if any matters of the common law arise, to discuss them, he intreated my lord to determine all controversies of scriptures; and for the civil law, he and Dr. Dale should take on them.

Wherefore he demanded of me the cause of my imprisonment: I said, that the occasion of my apprehension was a letter which I wrote to one Christopher Goodman, wherein (certifying him of such news as happened here) among the rest, I wrote that there were certain printed papers of questions scattered abroad. Whereupon, being suspected to be privy to the devising or publishing of the same, I was committed to the Fleet: but, after the commissioners had received my submission, I heard nothing thereof. The sum whereof was, that as I was sure there neither could be true witnesses, nor probable conjecture against me in that behalf, so refused I no punishment, if they of their consciences would judge me privy to the devising, printing, or publishing of those questions. But my lord affirming that there was another cause of my imprisonment, demanded if I had not after, since I was committed to the Fleet, spoken or written somewhat against the natural presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar.

Then I desired his lordship to be good unto me, trusting that he would not put answer to new matters, except I were first discharged of the old. And when I stood long in that, Mr. Welch answered, that it was procured that I should so do, right well. For albeit I were imprisoned for treason, if during the time of my confinement I had maintained heresy, that were no sufficient allegation against the ordinary; neither whether I were before him acquitted or condemned, should it take away the former fault. Then my lord affirming that I was not brought before him but for heresy, and the other gentlemen saying, that doubtless I was discharged of my former matter; my desire was, that I might be charged according to the order of the law, to hear my accusers.

Then Dr. Chedsey was sent for, who reported, that in the presence of Mr. Mosley and the lieutenant of the Tower, I spake against the real presence and the sacrifice of the mass, and that I affirmed their church was the church of Antichrist.

Is not this true? said my lord. I said, Yea. Will you continue therein? said he. Yea, said I. Wilt thou then maintain it by learning? said he. Therein, quoth I, I should shew myself to have little wit, knowing mine own youth and ignorance, if I would take on me to maintain any controversy against so many grave and learned men. But my conscience was satisfied in the truth, which was sufficient to my salvation.

Conscience! said Mr. Roper, so shall every Jew and Turk be saved.

We had hereafter much talk to no purpose, and especially on my part, who felt in myself, through cold and open air, much dulness of wit and memory. At length I was asked what conscience was: and I said, the certifying of the truth.

With that Mr. Welch rose up, desiring leave to talk with me alone. So he taking me aside into another chamber, said that he was sorry for my trouble, and would gladly see me at liberty: he marvelled that I being a young man, would stand against all the learned men of the realm, yea and contrary to the whole determination of the catholic church from Christ's time, in a matter wherein I could have no great learning; I must not think mine own wit better than all men's, but I should believe them that were learned. I promise you (quoth he) I have read all Peter Martyr's book, and Cranmer's, and all the rest of them, and have conferred them with the contrary, as the bishop of Winchester, &c. and could not perceive but that there was one continual truth, which from the beginning had been maintained; and those which at any time severed from this unity, were answered and answered again. This was the sum of his tale, which lacked both wit and eloquence.

Mr. Green. Forasmuch as it pleaseth your mastership to use me so familiarly (for so he behaved himself towards me, as though I had been his equal) I shall open my mind freely unto you, desiring you to take it in good part. I consider my youth, lack of wit and learning, which would to God it were but a little under the opinion that some men have of me. But God is not bound to time, wit, or knowledge, but rather chuseth the weak of the world that they may confound the strong; neither can men appoint bounds to God's mercy: For, I will have compassion, saith he, on whom I will shew mercy. There is no respect of persons with God, whether it be old or young, rich or poor, wife or foolish, fisher or basket-maker. God giveth knowledge of his truth, through his free grace, to whom he list, James i. Neither do I think myself only to have the truth, but stedfastly believe that Christ hath his spouse, the catholic and universal church, dispersed in many realms where it pleaseth him, the Spirit blowing where it listeth: no more is he addicted to any one place, than to the person and quality of any one man. Of this church I nothing doubt myself to be a member, trusting to be saved by the faith that is taught in the same. But how this church is known, is in a manner the end of all controversy. And the true marks of Christ's church are the true preaching of his word, and administering of his sacraments. These marks were sealed by the apostles, and confirmed by the ancient fathers, till at length they were, through the wickedness of men and the devil, almost utterly taken away. But God be praised that he hath renewed the print, that his truth may be known in many places. For myself, I call God to witness, I have no hope in mine own wit and learning, which is very small; but I was persuaded thereto by him, as by an instrument, that is excellent in all good learning and living. And God is my record, that chiefly I sought it of him by continual prayer with tears.

Furthermore, what I have done herein, is not needful for me to speak: but one thing, I say, I wish of God with all my heart, that all men which are of contrary judgment, would seek the truth in like manner. Now I am brought hither before a great many bishops and learned men, to be made a fool and a laughing-stock, but I value it not a rush; for God knoweth that my whole study is to please him: beside that, I care not for man's pleasure or displeasure.

Mr. Welch. No, Mr. Green, said he, think not so uncharitably of any man, but judge rather that men labour for your soul's health, as for their own. But, alas, how will you condemn all our forefathers? Or how can you think yourself to be of the catholic church, without any continuance, and contrary to the judgment of all learned men?

Green. Sir, I have no authority to judge any man; nevertheless, I doubt not but that I am of the true catholic church, howsoever our learned men here judge of me.

Welch. Why, then, do you suppose your own wit and learning better than all their's? If you do not give credit only to them, other learned men shall resort unto you, that shall persuade you by the scriptures and doctors.

Green. Sir, God knoweth that I refuse not to learn of any child, but I would embrace the truth from the mouth of a natural fool, in any thing wherein I am ignorant, and that in all things, saving my faith: but concerning the truth, wherein I am thoroughly persuaded, I cannot submit myself to learn, unless it be, as your mastership said, that I perused books on both sides. For so might I make myself an indifferent judge; otherwise I may be seduced.

And here we had a long discourse of the church, wherein his learning and wit was much above mine: but in the end I told him I was persuaded, and that he did but lose his labour.

Welch. Why then, what shall I report to my lord?

Green. Even as it pleaseth you; or else you may say that I would be glad to learn, if I had books on both sides.

So he going in, the bishops (being risen and ready to depart) asked how he liked me? He answered, In faith, my lord, he will be glad to learn. Which words when they were spoken, lest they should mistake his meaning and mine, I said, Yea, my lord, so that I have books on both sides, as Calvin, and my lord of Canterbury's books, and such others. Well, said my lord, I will satisfy thy mind therein also: and they were all in great hopes, that shortly I should become a good catholic, as they call it.

Then I was brought into my lord's inner chamber (where you were) and there was put in a chamber with Mr. Dee, who treated me very friendly. That night I supped at my lord's table, and lay with Mr. Dee in the chamber you did see. On the morrow I was served at dinner from my lord's table, and at night did eat in the hall with his gentleman; where I have been placed ever since, and fared wonderfully well. Yea, to say the truth, I had my liberty within the bounds of his lordship's house: for my lodgings and fare, scarce have I been at any time abroad in better case so long together, and have found so much gentleness of my lord and his chaplains, and other servants, that I should easily have forgotten that I was in prison, were it not that this good cheer was often powdered with unsavoury sauces of examinations, exhortations, posings, and disputations.

For shortly after supper, the first Monday at night, I was had into my lord's bed-chamber, and there he would know of me how I came first into these heresies: I said, I was persuaded thereto by the scriptures, and authorities of the doctors, alledged by Peter Martyr in his lectures upon the eleventh chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, while he treated there on that place of the Lord's supper for a month together. But then my lord enforced the plainness of Christ's words, and his almighty power, demanding of me, what reason should move me from the literal sense of the words: but I having no lust to those matters, would have alledged that there were books sufficient of that matter, as Peter Martyr, Cranmer, and Oecolampadius: nevertheless, when this shift would not serve, but I was constrained to say somewhat, I said I was moved from the literal sense by the manner of speaking, by the circumstance, and by conference of other places of the scriptures. It is evident that Christ took bread, and that he shewed them (they seeing it) bread, which he affirmed to be his body.

Christ affirmed that bread was his body.

But that affirmation taken literally, can by no means be true.

Therefore,

Therefore, The words, if they be taken according to the letter, cannot be true.

For this predication, Panis est corpus Christi, or Corpus Christi est panis, is neither Identica nor Accidentalis, nor Essentialis prædication. Wherefore of necessity I must say it was spoken in the same sense, as Christ was a door, a vine, and a way. Neither can it serve to say, that it was not bread that he affirmed to be his body, and that for two causes.

For whatsoever he shewed, that was bread, for nought else was seen.

But that which he shewed he affirmed to be his body.

The second reason is, For that it was not changed before, seeing Benedixit, is Gratias egit, or else Christ affirmed no true proposition, and you are without authority.

In the end of this letter there were noted these sentences following, collected for confirmation of his former assertions, viz.

Eadem locutio poculi, that is, The phrase is used and spoken upon the cup.

Dicitur postea panis. It is called bread in the same place afterwards.

Eadem ratione rejecero corpus, qua tu panem, that is, By the same reason as it may be denied to the bread, it may be denied to be the body.

Ascendit in cælum, that is, His body ascended into heaven.

Corpore nobis factus est similis in omnibus post nativitatem. At nostrum corpus non potest esse in duobus locis. Therefore, &c. In body he was like to us in all things after his nativity (sin excepted). Seeing then our body cannot be in two places at once: therefore, neither his.

Discipuli non stupebant, &c. His disciples took it as no miracle nor wonder.

The last Examination and Condemnation of Mr. GREEN.

THUS, as it seemeth, for this time they left off. But not long after the bishop perceiving Green's learning and constancy to be such, as neither he, nor any of his doctors and chaplains could by the scriptures refute, began then to object and put in practice his chief and strongest argument against him; which was the rigour of the law, and cruelty of execution: an argument, I assure you, which without the special grace of our God to flesh is insupportable. And therefore using law as a cloak of his tyranny, the 28th day of November, the said bishop examined him upon certain points of christian religion. Whereunto when he had answered, the bishop appointed the register (as their most common manner is) there to draw out an order of confession: which being afterwards read unto Green, was also subscribed by him, as a confirmation of his former assertions: the tenor whereof here ensueth.

The Confession of BARTLET GREEN.

BARTLET GREEN, born in the city of London, in the parish of Basing-hall, of the diocese of London, and of the age of 25 years, being examined in the bishop's palace the 27th day of November, Anno 1555, upon certain articles, answered as followeth, viz. That neither in the time of king Edward, after the mass by him was put down, neither in the time of queen Mary after the mass was restored again, he hath heard any mass at all; but he saith that in the reign of the said queen's majesty, he the said Bartlet, two times, to wit, at two Easter-tides or days, in the chamber of John Pulline, one of the preachers in king Edward's time, within the parish of St. Michael's, Cornhill, of the diocese of London, did receive the communion with the said Pulline, and Christopher Goodman, sometime reader of the divinity lecture in Oxford, now gone beyond the sea; and the second time with the said Pulline, and with one Rimneger, Master of Arts, of Magdalen college, in Oxford: and this examine also saith, that at both the said communions, he and the other before named, did take and receive bread and wine, which bread and wine he called sacramental bread, and sacramental wine, which he saith were used there by them, Pulline only reading the words of the institution, expressed in the book of communion.

In which receiving and using, this examine saith, that the others aforementioned did receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that they received material bread and material wine, no substance thereof changed, and so no real presence of the body and blood of Christ there being, but only grace added thereto. And further, this examine saith, that he had heretofore, during the reign of the queen's majesty aforesaid, refused, and so now doth refuse to come and hear mass, and to receive the sacrament of the altar, as they are now used and administered in this church of England, because he saith, that concerning the mass, he cannot be persuaded in his conscience, that the sacrifice pretended to be in the same, is agreeable to God's word, or maintainable by the same: and that without deadly offence he cannot worship the body and blood of Christ that is pretended to be there. And as concerning the sacrament of the altar, this examine saith, that he heretofore during the said reign, hath refused, and now doth refuse to receive the same, as is now used in this church of England, because it is not used according to the institution of Christ, but both in a strange tongue, and also ministered in both kinds; and besides that, contrary to God's word it is there taught, that the thing there administered is to be adored, as the real and true body of Christ. And furthermore this examine saith, that during the said reign he hath not been confessed to the priest, nor received absolution at his hands, because he is not bound by God's word to make auricular confession.

BARTLET GREEN.

Many other conferences and examinations they brought him unto. But in the end (seeing his steadiness of faith to be such, against which neither their threatenings, nor yet their flattering promises could prevail) the 15th day of January the bishop caused him with the rest before mentioned, to be brought into the consistory of St. Paul's; where being set in his judgment seat, accompanied by Mr. Fecknam, then dean of the same church, and other his chaplains, after he had condemned the other six, he then calling for Bartlet Green, began with these, or the like words:

Honourable audience, I think it best to open unto you the conversation of this man, called Bartlet Green. And because you shall not charge me, that I go about to seek any man's blood, here you shall hear the council's letters, which they sent with him unto me. The effect whereof is; that whereas he had been a long time confined in the tower of London for heresy, they have now sent him unto me to be ordered, according to the laws therefore provided. And now to thee, Bartlet Green, I propose these nine articles. Then he read the articles before mentioned, which were generally objected to all these seven prisoners, to wit, Thomas Whittle, John Tudson, John Went, Thomas Brown, Isabel Foster, Joan Lashford, Bartlet Green.

But when Mr. Green would have answered them particularly, he was put to silence, with promise that he should have time to answer sufficiently, and therefore the bishop proceeding, said, that when Green came first to his house, he desired to have the books of the ancient doctors of the church to read, which he said he granted him.

Whereunto Green answered, and said, that if the doctors were with indifferent judgment weighed, they made more a great deal with him, than they did with them.

Upon which words, Dr. Fecknam, dean of St. Paul's, stood up, and marvelling why he said so, asked him if he would be content to stand to the judgment of the doctors.

Green then said, that he was content to stand to the doctors' judgment.

I will then propound unto you (said Fecknam) the doctors, and interpret them yourself. So he alledged a place place of Chrysostom, Ad popul. Antioch. which was this: Elias ascendens melotam suam post se reliquit: Christus vero ascendens carnem suam assumpsit & eandem post se reliquit. "Elias going up, left his cloak behind him: but Christ ascending up took his flesh, and also left it behind him." And he demanded of Green how he understood the place.

Then Green desired him that he would confer the doctor's sayings together, and therefore alledged the same doctor again, writing upon 1 Cor. x. "Is not the bread which we bless the communication of the Lord's body?" Whereby he proved that this doctor called this sacrament but a sign of the Lord's body. Many other words of probation and trial were between them.

At last Fecknam demanded of him, how long he had been of this opinion. For, Mr. Green, said he, you confessed once to me, that when you were at Oxford at school, you were called the rankest papist in that house, and being compelled to go to the lecture of Peter Martyr, you were converted from your old doctrine.

And Green confessed the same.

Then Fecknam said, that Green told him the said Peter Martyr was a papist at his first coming to Oxford. Whereupon he made an exclamation, and prayed the people to consider how vain his doctrine was that he professed, which was grounded upon one man, and that upon so inconstant a man as Peter Martyr, who perceiving the wicked intent of the council, was content to please them, and forsake the true and catholic faith.

Green said, that he grounded not his faith upon Peter Martyr nor any other, nor did believe so because Peter Martyr believed the same; but because he had heard the scriptures, and the doctors of the church, truly and wholesomely expounded by him; neither had he any regard of the man, but of the word which he spake. And further he said, that he heard the said Peter Martyr say often, that he had not, while he was a papist, read Chrysostom upon the tenth to the Corinthians, nor many other places of the doctors: but when he had read them, and well considered them, he was content to yield to the doctors, having first humbled himself in prayer, desiring God to illuminate him, and bring him to the true understanding of the scripture. Which thing (said Green) if you, my lord, would do, I do not doubt but God would open your eyes, and shew you his truth, no more than I do doubt his words to be true that faith, "Ask, and it shall be given to you; knock, and it shall be opened unto you," &c.

Then Fecknam asked him what he thought of this article, The holy catholic church.

And Green answered, that he did believe one holy and universal church throughout all the world.

Then Fecknam said, that he would fain have a sure mark and token, whereby he might know this church: and therefore he prayed Green to define unto him this church.

Green answered, that this church did agree in verity with the true doctrine of Christ, and was known by the true administration of his sacraments.

Whereupon Fecknam said, that he would prove the church whereof he was to be never agreeing in doctrine, but always to have been in controversy in their religion. For, said he, Luther and Zuinglius could never agree in their writings or sayings, nor Oecolampadius with Cirolostadius, nor Carlostadius with either Zuinglius or Luther, &c. for Luther, writing upon the sacrament of the altar, said, that in this bread, or under this bread we receive the body of the Lord. Zuinglius controuling him, said, Under the sign of the bread we receive the body of the Lord. And the other controuled him in like case.

Then Mr. Green proved their opinions of the sacrament to be one in effect, being rightly weighed, and though their words did not sound all one, yet they meant one thing; and their opinions were all one, as he proved by divers other examples.

Then Fecknam desired him that he would not so wilfully cast himself away, but to be rather conformable to reason, and that my lord bishop there present would be good unto him, and grant him respite for a fortnight or three weeks, and that he should chuse any learned man whom he would, and should go with him home to his house.

Then bishop Bonner said, that he was a proud and an obstinate boy; and therefore he desired Fecknam to hold his peace, and to call him no more Mr. Green: for (said he) you ought not to call an heretic master.

After this Dr. Pendleton alledged to him this text out of the xxii of Luke, "I will eat no more of this, until it be fulfilled in my Father's kingdom." Here, said he, you must confess your opinion to be false, else you must say that Christ was a liar: for Christ said, "I will eat no more of this, until it be fulfilled in my Father's kingdom." If Christ did eat no more the bread when he spake these words, then must you say that he was a liar: for he did eat bread after with his disciples, before he ascended. But if you say he did eat his body then, and after but bread, it will not agree with the scriptures, nor with good reason.

Then Green answered, and said, that this was spoken by an anticipation, as one of their own bishops (who is now dead) did say.

Then Dr. Pendleton said, that that was no sufficient discharge, nor no sufficient answer for him in this case: for, said he, it is well known that that bishop was of a contrary opinion to you, and that he died a good christian man.

To which words Green said, I do not call him to witness in this case, as though he were a sufficient man to prove my saying to be true in this matter: but I do alledge him against you, as Paul did the scripture, which he found graven in the altar of the Athenians, against themselves, To the unknown God.

These, with many other words, were between them, which I pass over, because it were too long to stand upon recital of every thing. Last of all the bishop asked him if he would recant. He said nay, he would not. But, my lord, said he, in old time there were no men put to death for their conscience, until such times as bishops found the means to make it death to believe contrary to them; but excommunication, my lord, was the greatest penalty which men had for their conscience; yea, insomuch that St. Augustine wrote, and commanded that no man should be put to death for his opinion.

Then Bonner said, that when Augustine saw what inconveniences followed that commandment, he wrote again to the temporal rulers, commanding them to punish their bodies.

But, said Green, he ordered not to put them to death.

He said, punish them, quoth Bonner.

Yea, said Green, but not put them to death.

That they should be punished, quoth Bonner, again.

This talk ended, he asked Green if he would recant, and return to his Romish mother. Which when he denied, the bishop pronounced the sentence definitive against him, and so committed him to the sheriffs of London, who caused him to be carried to Newgate.

And as he was going thither, he met two gentlemen, his special friends, minding alike to comfort this their persecuted brother: but at their meeting, their loving and friendly hearts were manifested by the abundance of their pitiful tears. To whom, when Green saw them, he said, Ah, my dear friends, is this the comfort you are come to give me, in this my occasion of heaviness? Must I, who needed to have comfort ministered to me, become now a comforter of you? And thus declaring his most quiet peaceable mind and conscience, he cheerfully spake to them and others, until he came to the prison door, into which he joyfully entered, and there remained always much in godly meditations, until the 28th day of January, when he with his other before-mentioned brethren, endured cheerfully the torments of the fire.

There were divers letters and other works of this servant of God, particularly notes and extracts in Latin out of the doctors and other authors, for for his memory, whereby is declared how studious he was in the searching and knowledge of the law of God, although his profession was the temporal law. Where I would to God he were not among the lawyers such a phenix, that he had very few or no fellows to fly with him, or to follow his steps. But God is to be praised, that although we read of few or none among that sort that died as he did, yet good witnesses do daily spring up of the same profession, to such forwardness and godly zeal, that some hope already appeareth shortly to come to pass, that this godly phenix shall not fly alone. These aforesaid notes and gatherings of his out of the doctors, were taken from him by bishop Bonner, being found about him, which was to him no little grief. He among the rest was first apprehended, but the last of them condemned, which was the fifteenth day of January, and afterwards burned with other martyrs the 27th of the same month.

Of the other five martyrs, who suffered with Whittle and Green, we have only to add to what has been said on the nine articles, that Thomas Brown, a native of Histon parish in Ely diocese, was a married man, and then lived in St. Bride's parish in Fleet-street, London, aged 37, who was presented for not coming to his parish church. On his final examination, Jan. 15, he avowed his assertion that bishop Bonner was a blood-sucker; and on being interrogated again about the articles and forsaking heresy, he called on the bishop to prove that his opinions were heresies, and that done, he would relinquish them. But this impossibility was not even attempted; and when promises and allurements of pardon had no better effect, sentence of condemnation was passed, and he was committed to the sheriffs.

John Tudson also was condemned on the same day. He was a native of Ipswich in Suffolk, but then resided in London in the parish of St. Mary Botolph; and before his condemnation, was interrogated in a similar manner, and similar alluring promises made, but to no purpose.

John Went, aged 27 years, a native of Langham in Essex, within the diocese of London, was consigned by Dr. Story to the bishop, after being examined on the sacrament of the altar. He was treated exactly in the same way, and the same allurements held out, with no better effect; on which he was condemned to suffer with the rest, and committed to the custody of the sheriffs.

Isabel Foster, the wife of John Foster, cutler in St. Bride's parish, Fleet Street, London, but a native of Grafestock in Carlisle diocese, aged 55, was imprisoned for absenting herself from their church, after various examinations, was brought to her final one on the same 15th of Jan. To the usual interrogatories she resolutely answered, that she would not go from her former answers; and, on her persisting therein, was in like manner condemned.

Joan Lashford, alias Warne, a native of Little St. Allhallows in Thames Street, London, who had ministered to the wants of her father and mother in prison, being then about 20 years of age, was first imprisoned, on suspicion of her religion, in the Poultry Compter for five weeks, and afterwards in Newgate for some months. On her examinations she was very pointed against the popish doctrines of the sacrament of the altar, confession, and absolution; and was sentenced to suffer with the rest.

The History of five Martyrs who were burnt at Canterbury, at two Stakes in one Fire.

THESE five martyrs suffered for the truth of the gospel at Canterbury on the 31st day of January, being one man, and four women, whose names and examinations here follow:

John Lomas, of the parish of Tenderden, a young man; Anne Albright; Joan Catmer, of the parish of Hith, wife of George Catmer, burned before; Agnes Snoth, widow, of the parish of Smarden; Joan Sole, wife, of the parish of Horton.

They were all interrogated in the same way as the seven whom we have just noted; on confession and the sacrament, on the 17th of January, but persisting in their doctrines, with many severe remarks on the doctrines and practices of the papists, they were all condemned the next day.

These five persons were burnt at two stakes in one fire, together at Canterbury, on the 31st of January following; who, when the fire was flaming about their ears, did sing psalms. Whereat the good knight, sir John Norton, being there present, wept bitterly at the sight.

The judges and other assistants which sat upon her and the other four before mentioned, were Richard Faucet, John Warren, John Mills, Robert Collins, and John Baker, the notary.

CONCERNING the life and estate of that most reverend father in God, and worthy prelate of godly memory, Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, and of the original cause and occasion of his preferment unto his archiepiscopal dignity, who by many hath been thought to have procured the same by friendship only, and by some others esteemed unworthy of so high a vocation: it is first therefore to be noted and considered, that the same Thomas Cranmer, coming of an ancient parentage, from the conquest to be deduced, and continuing since in the name and family of a gentleman, was born in a village called Arselacton, in Northamptonshire; of whose said name and family there remaineth at this day the manor and mansion-house in Lincolnshire, called Cranmer-hall, &c. sometime the heritage of the said stock and family. He being from his infancy kept at school, and carefully brought up, from school he was sent unto the university of Cambridge, and there prospering in good knowledge among the better sort of students, was chosen fellow of Jesus-college in Cambridge. And so being master of arts, and fellow of the same college, he married a gentleman's daughter, by which he lost and gave over his fellowship, and became a reader in Buckingham-college; and because he would with more diligence apply himself to his office of reading, he placed his said wife in an inn, called the Dolphin, in Cambridge, the woman of the house being a relation of her's. By reason whereof, and his often going to see his wife in that inn, he was much noticed by some popish merchants: on this arose the slanderous noise and report against him, after he was preferred to the archbishopric of Canterbury, raised up by the malicious disdain of certain malignant adversaries to Christ and his truth, reporting abroad every where, that he was but an ostler, and therefore deficient in all good learning. Of whose malicious reports, one of their practices in that behalf shall hereafter be declared, as place and time shall serve.

But in the mean time to return to the matter present: while Mr. Cranmer continued as a reader in Buckingham-college, his wife died in child-bed. After whose death the masters and fellows of Jesus-college, desirous again of their old companion, namely, for his eminent learning, chose him again fellow of the same college. Where he remaining at his study, became in a few years after the reader of the divinity lecture in the same college, and in such universal estimation and reputation with the whole university, that when doctor of divinity, he was commonly appointed one of the heads (which are two or three of the most learned men) to examine such as yearly proceed in commencement, either bachelors or doctors of divinity, by whose approbation the whole university licensed them to proceed unto their degree, and again by whose non-approbation the university university also rejected them for a time to proceed, until they were better furnished with knowledge.

Now, Dr. Cranmer, ever favouring the knowledge of the scripture, would never permit any to proceed in divinity, unless they were substantially versed in the history of the bible; by means whereof certain friars and other religious persons, who were principally brought up in the study of school authors, without regard had to the authority of the scriptures, were commonly rejected by him; so that he was greatly, for that his severe examination, by the religious sort much hated, and had in great indignation; and yet it came to pass in the end, that divers of them thus compelled to study the scriptures, became afterwards very well learned and well affected; insomuch that when they became doctors of divinity, they could not too much extol and commend Dr. Cranmer's goodness towards them, who for a time had put them back, to initiate themselves in better knowledge and perfection. Among whom Dr. Barret, a white friar, who afterwards dwelt at Norwich, was handled after that manner, giving him no less commendation for his happy rejecting of him for a better amendment. Thus much I repeat, that our apish and popish sort of ignorant priests may well understand, that this his exercise, kind of life, and vocation, was not altogether ostler-like.

Well, to proceed; as he was neither in fame unknown, nor in knowledge obscure, he was very much solicited by Dr. Capon, to be one of the fellows in the foundation of cardinal Wolsey's college in Oxford, which he utterly refused, not without danger of indignation. Notwithstanding he foresaw that which after happened, to the utter confusion of many well-affected learned men there, without consideration (because man's glory was there more sought for than God's), he stood the danger of the said indignation, which turned out more prosperously unto him within a few years after than he expected. While he thus continued in Cambridge, the great and weighty cause of king Henry the Eighth's divorce with the lady Katherine Dowager of Spain, came into question; which being many ways for the space of two or three years amongst the canonists, civilians, and other learned men, diversly disputed and debated, it came to pass that the said Dr. Cranmer, on account of the plague being in Cambridge, resorted to Waltham-Abbey, to one Mr. Cressley's house there, whose wife was a relation of the said Dr. Cranmer. He had two sons of the said Mr. Cressley with him at Cambridge as his pupils; he continued at Waltham-Cross, at the house of the said Mr. Cressley, with the said two children, during the summer-time while the plague reigned.

During this summer cardinal Campeius and cardinal Wolsey, being in commission from the pope, to hear and determine that great cause in controversy between the king and the queen, his pretended wife, dallied and delayed all the summer-time until the month of August in hearing the said cause in controversy debated. When August was come, the said cardinals little minding to proceed to give sentence, took occasion to finish their commission, and to determine no further therein, pretending that it was not permitted by the laws to keep courts of ecclesiastical matters in harvest time: which sudden stoppage and giving up of the said commission by both the cardinals, unknown to the king, so much enraged him, that he taking it as a mock at the cardinals hands, commanded the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to dispatch immediately home to Rome cardinal Campeius: and in haste removed himself to Waltham for a night or two, while his household removed to Greenwich: by this means it happened that the harbingers, Dr. Stephen Gardiner, secretary, and Dr. Foxe, almoner, (who were the chief furtherers, preferers, and defenders on the king's behalf in the said cause) to lodge in the house of the said Mr. Cressley, where Dr. Cranmer also lodged and resided. When supper-time came, the three doctors met together; Dr. Stephen Gardiner, and Dr. Foxe were very much surprised at Dr. Cranmer's being there. He declared the cause, namely, because the plague was in Cambridge: as they were old acquaint-tance, the secretary and the almoner very well entertained Dr. Cranmer, intending to understand his opinion concerning the great business they had in hand. And as this good occasion served, while they were at supper, they conferred with Dr. Cranmer concerning the king's cause, requesting him to give his judgment and opinion of what he thought therein.

Wherefore Dr. Cranmer answered, That he could say little to the matter, as he had not studied or looked for it. Notwithstanding he said, that in his opinion they made more ado in prosecuting the ecclesiastical law than needed. It were better, as I think, said Dr. Cranmer, that the question, Whether a man may marry his brother's wife, or no? were discussed by the divines, and by the authority of the word of God, whereby the conscience of the prince might be better satisfied and quieted, than thus from year to year by unnecessary delays to prolong the time, leaving the very truth of the matter unsettled by the word of God. There is but one truth in it, which the scripture will soon declare, make open and manifest, being by learned men well handled, and that may be as well done in England in the universities here, as at Rome, or elsewhere in any foreign nation, the authority whereof will soon compel any judge to come to a definitive sentence: and therefore, as I take it, you might that way have made an end of this matter long since. When Dr. Cranmer had thus ended his tale, the other two liked well his device, and wished they had proceeded so before, and thereupon conceived some matter of council to instruct the king with, who was then thinking to send to Rome again for a new commission.

Now the next day, when the king removed to Greenwich, recollecting in himself how he had been used by the cardinals, in thus deferring his cause, his mind was very uneasy, and desirous to see an end of this long and tedious suit, he called unto him the two principal managers of his cause, namely, Dr. Gardiner, and Dr. Foxe. What now, my masters, said the king, shall we do in this infinite cause of mine? I see there must be a new commission procured from Rome, and when we shall have an end, God knoweth, and not I.

When the king had declared somewhat of his mind herein, Dr. Foxe, the almoner, said to the king, we trust that there shall be better ways devised for your majesty than to send any more to Rome in your highness's cause, which by chance was put into our heads last night at Waltham. The king being very desirous to understand his meaning, said, Who hath taken in hand to instruct you by a better or more expeditious method of proceeding in our said cause? Then said Dr. Foxe, We happened to lodge last night at one Mr. Cressley's house in Waltham, your highness being there, where we met with an old acquaintance of our's, named Dr. Cranmer, with whom having conference concerning your highness's cause, he thought that the best way was, first to instruct and quiet your majesty's conscience by trying your majesty's question by the word of God, and thereupon to proceed to a final sentence. With this report the secretary was displeased with the almoner, because they did not take the glory of this invention to themselves. And when the secretary endeavoured by colourable words to make it appear to the king that it was a project of their own devising, the king immediately cried out, Where is this Dr. Cranmer, is he still at Waltham? They answered, that they left him there. Then, said the king, I will surely speak with him, and therefore let him be sent for immediately. I perceive (said the king) that that man hath found out the true mode of proceeding. And if I had known this device but two years ago, it had been a great saving of money to me, and extricated me out of much disquietude.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer was sent for, but having removed from Waltham to Cambridge, was going to see his friends in Nottinghamshire, when the post overtook him. But when he came to London, he began to quarrel with his two acquaintances, that he through their means was thus troubled, and brought thither to be encumbered in a matter which he had not studied, but was intirely unacquainted with: and therefore intreated they would instantly go and make his excuse in such a manner that he might be dispatched home again, and not be required to come into the king's presence. They promised; and took the matter upon themselves to do, if by any means they could accomplish it. But all was in vain; for the more they excused Dr. Cranmer's absence, the king insisted to have him brought into his presence out of hand, so that no excuse serving, he was obliged immediately to wait on the king at court, whom the gentle prince benignly received, demanded his name, and said unto him, Were you not at Waltham at such a time, in the company of my secretary and my almoner? Dr. Cranmer confessing the same, the king said again, Had you not conference with them concerning our matter of divorce now in question after this sort? repeating the manner and order thereof. That is right true, if it please your highness, quoth Dr. Cranmer. Well, (said the king) I well perceive that you have the right sense of this matter. You must understand that I have been long troubled in conscience, and now I perceive that by this means I might have been long ago relieved one way or other from the same, if we had this way proceeded. And therefore, Mr. Doctor, I pray you, and nevertheless because you are a subject, I charge and command you (all your other business and affairs set apart) to take some pains to see this my cause furthered according to your device, as much as it may lie in you, so that I may shortly understand whereunto I may trust. For this I protest before God and the world, that I seek not to be divorced from the queen, if by any means I might justly be persuaded that this our matrimony were inviolable, and not against the laws of God: for otherwise there never was any other cause to move me to seek any such extremity. Never was there a prince had a more gentle, a more obedient loving companion and wife than the queen is, nor did I ever fancy a woman in all respects better, if this doubt had not risen; assuring you that for the singular virtues wherewith she is indued, besides the consideration of her noble family, I would be right well contented still to remain with her, if so be it would stand with the will and pleasure of Almighty God. And thus highly commending her many and amiable qualities, the king further said, I therefore pray you with an indifferent eye, and with as much dexterity as in you lieth, that you will for your part forward this matter for the discharging of both our consciences.

Dr. Cranmer unwilling by himself to meddle in so weighty an affair, besought the king's highness to commit the trial and examining of this matter by the word of God, unto the best learned men of both his universities, Cambridge and Oxford. You speak well, said the king, and I am content therewith. But nevertheless, I will have you particularly to write your mind thereon. And so calling the earl of Wiltshire to him, said, I pray you, my lord, let Dr. Cranmer have entertainment in your house at Durham-Place for a time, to the intent he may be there quiet to accomplish my request, and let him want neither books, nor any thing requisite for his study. And thus after the king's departure, Dr. Cranmer went with my lord of Wiltshire unto his house, wherein he incontinently wrote his mind concerning the king's question: adding to the same, besides the authorities of the scriptures, of general councils, and of ancient writers, but also his own opinion, which was this, That the bishop of Rome had no such authority, whereby he might dispense with the word of God and the scripture. When Dr. Cranmer had written this book, and committed it unto the king, the king said unto him, Will you stand to this that you have here written before the bishop of Rome? That I will do, by God's grace, quoth Dr. Cranmer, if your majesty will send me thither. Indeed, said the king, I will send you unto him in a sure ambassage.

And thus by means of Dr. Cranmer's handling of this matter with the king, not only certain learned men were sent abroad to the most part of the universities in Christendom, to dispute the question, but also the same being by commission disputed by the divines in both the universities of Cambridge and Oxford, it was there concluded, That no such matrimony was by the word of God lawful.

Whereupon a solemn ambassage was then prepared and sent to the bishop of Rome, then being at Bonony, wherein went the earl of Wiltshire, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Stokesley, Dr. Carne, Dr. Bennet, and divers other learned men and gentlemen.

And when the time came that they should come before the bishop of Rome to declare the cause of their ambassage, the bishop sitting on high in his cloth of state, and in his rich apparel, with his sandals on his feet, offering, as it were, his foot to be kissed by the ambassadors; the earl of Wiltshire disdainig thereat, stood still, and shewed no countenance thereunto, so that all the rest kept themselves from this wicked idolatry.

However, one thing is not to be omitted here, as a prognosticate of our separation from the see of Rome, which then happened through a spaniel which belonged to the earl of Wiltshire. For he having there a great spaniel which he brought with him out of England, it stood between the earl and the bishop of Rome. And when the said bishop, that servant of the servants of God (as he in great humility stiled himself), offered his foot to be kissed, and while they stood still and declined it, the said spaniel seeing the foot shining with gold and jewels, caught hold of it, taking it to be some kind of repast, and bit it. The pope disdainig the affront, in haste pulled in that glorious foot, and kicked the dog with the other, while the Englishmen smiled in their sleeves at the omen. The pontifical bishop, knitting his brows, demanded the cause of their embassy. Which being declared, the earl of Wiltshire delivered Cranmer's book to the pope; telling him withal, That there were learned men come along with him from England, who were ready to defend what was contained in that book, by the holy scriptures, the councils, and the writings of the orthodox fathers, against all who should contradict it.

The pope often promised the ambassador to appoint a day for the disputation: but it was a promise which he never performed; by affected delays spinning out the time, as his cardinals had before done in England. So giving the ambassadors most honourable and court-like entertainment, and having made Cranmer (whom he either knew or supposed to be the author of that book concerning the king's marriage with Katharine) his penitentiary in England, Ireland, and Wales; being mighty timorous, and equally afraid of the emperor, the French king, and our's, he durst not come to any resolution in a matter of such moment, but dismissed the assembly, without determining, or even proposing any thing about it.

From hence, while the rest returned home, Cranmer by the king's private order, made the emperor and the princes of Germany in his way. At that time the emperor was engaged in an expedition against the Turks, who were engaged in the siege of Vienna, the capital of Austria. Whom when Cranmer attended, and asked him in the king's name, which of his domestics or others that he knew would contradict him? Cornelius Agrippa was mentioned; a man better versed in the secrets of philosophy than divinity. But he being easily brought over to Cranmer's side of the question, did readily join in persuading the other learned men of the emperor's retinue, not to oppose Cranmer; who, he said, had brought the truth along with him. Therefore meeting with no opposition, he took his leave of the emperor. From whence taking a tour throughout Germany, he brought home with him to the king the opinions and judgment of the most learned men there, as well in the universities; as in the courts of princes, all agreeing with his own.

This matter thus prospering on Dr. Cranmer's behalf, as well touching the king's question, as concerning the invalidity of the pope's authority, bishop Warham, then archbishop of Canterbury, departed this transitory life, whereby that dignity then being in the king's gift, was immediately given to Dr. Cranmer, as worthy, for his good services, of such a promotion. Thus much concerning the preferment of Dr. Cranmer, and by what means he arrived at this dignity: not by flattery, nor by bribes, nor by any other unlawful means; which thing I more at large discoursed, to stop the railing mouths of such, who being themselves obscure and unlearned, are not ashamed most scurrilously to attack so learned a man with the nickname of ostler, whom, for his godly zeal to sincere religion, they ought with humility to have had in regard and reputation.

Now as concerning his behaviour and method of living towards God and the world, being now entered into his said dignity, and forasmuch as the apostle St. Paul writing to two bishops, Timothy and Titus, setteth out unto us a perfect description of a true bishop, with all the other properties and conditions belonging to the same, unto which pattern it is rare in these strange days to find the image of any bishop correspondent; yet, for example's sake, let us take this archbishop of Canterbury, and try him by the rule thereof, to see either how near he cometh to the description of St. Paul, or else how far off he swerveth from the common course of others in his time, of his calling. The rule of St. Paul is found, 1 Tim. iii. also in his epistle to Titus, chap. i. in these words:

"A bishop must be faultless, as becometh the minister of God, not stubborn, nor angry, no drunkard, no fighter, nor given to filthy lucre; but a lover of hospitality, one that loveth goodness, sober-minded, righteous, holy, temperate, and such as cleaveth unto the true word and doctrine, that he may be able to exhort," &c.

Unto this rule and touch-stone, to lay now the life and conversation of this archbishop, we will first begin with that which is thus written.

As no man is without sin, and as every man carrieth about him his peculiar vice or failings; yet nevertheless the apostle meaneth, that the bishop and minister must be faultless in comparison of the common conversation of men in the world, who seem to live more licentious at their own liberties and pleasures, than a bishop or minister ought to do, having small regard to the giving of good example; which a bishop and minister most carefully ought to consider, lest by his dissolute life the word of God be slandered and evil spoken of; to avoid which, and the better to accomplish this precept of the apostle, this worthy man gave himself to continual study, strictly observing the order that he in the university commonly used, that is, to be by five o'clock in the morning at his book, and so continuing in prayer and study till nine: he then applied himself (if the prince's affairs did not call him away) until dinner-time to hear suiters, and to dispatch such matters as appertained to his special cure and charge, committing his temporal affairs, both of his household and other foreign business, to his officers: so that such things were never impediments either to his study, or to his pastoral charge, which principally consisted in reformation of corrupt religion, and in setting forth of true and sincere doctrine. For the most part always being in communion, he associated himself with learned men for sifting or bolting something or other for the advantage and profit of the church of England. By means whereof, and what for his private study, he was never idle; besides that, he accounted it no idle point to bestow an hour or two of the day in reading over such works and books as daily came from beyond the seas.

After dinner, if any suiters were attendant, he would very diligently hear them, and dispatch them in such an obliging manner, that every one admired and commended his lenity and gentleness, although the case required that sometimes divers of them were committed by him to prison. And having no suiters after dinner, for an hour, or thereabouts, he would play at chess, or behold such as were at play. That done, then again to his ordinary study, where he commonly stood (seldom sat down) till five of the clock, which hour he bestowed in hearing the Common Prayer, and walking, or using some innocent recreation till supper-time. At supper, if he had no appetite (as many times he would not sup), yet he would sit down at table, having his ordinary provision of his mess furnished with expedient company, he wearing his gloves on his hands, because he would, as it were, thereby wean himself from eating of meat, but yet entertaining the company with such edifying discourse as did much delight the hearers; so that by this means hospitality was well furnished, and the alms-chest well maintained for relief of the poor. After supper he would spend, at least, one hour in walking, or some other harmless pastime, and then again till nine of the clock at his study: so that no hour of the day was spent in vain, but the same was so bestowed, as tended to the glory of God, the service of the prince, or the advantage of the church. By all which he gained a good report amongst men, so that his conversation, in comparison with other men, seemed to be faultless, as the minister of God.

Secondly, It is required, "That a bishop ought not to be stubborn." With which kind of vice, without great wrong, this archbishop in no wise ought to be charged; whose nature was such, as none more gentle, or sooner won to an honest suit or purpose, especially such things, wherein by his word, writing, counsel, or deed, he might gratify either gentleman or nobleman, or do good to any mean person, or else relieve the needy and poor. Only in causes pertaining to God or his prince, no man more stout, more constant, or more hard to be won; as in that part his earnest defence in the parliament-house above three days together, in disputing against the six articles of Gardiner's device, can testify. And though the king would needs have them upon some politic consideration to go forward, yet he so handled himself, as well in the parliament-house, as afterwards by writing, so obediently, and with such humble behaviour towards his prince, protesting the cause not to be his, but Almighty God's, who was the author of all truth, that the king did not only well like his defence (willing him to depart out of the parliament-house into the council whilst the act should pass and be granted, for safeguard of his conscience; which he with humble protestation refused, hoping that his majesty, in process of time, would revoke them again); but also after the parliament was finished, the king perceiving the zealous affection that the archbishop bare towards the defence of his cause, which many ways, by scriptures and manifold authorities and reasons, he had substantially confirmed and defended, sent the lord Cromwell, then vicegerent, with the two dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and all the lords of the parliament, to dine with him at Lambeth; where it was declared by the vicegerent, and the two dukes, that it was the king's pleasure, that they all should, in his highness's behalf, cherish, comfort, and animate him, as one that for his trouble in that parliament, had shewed himself both greatly learned, and also discreet and wise, and therefore they willed him not to be discouraged for any thing that was passed contrary to his allegations. He most humbly thanked the king's majesty for his great goodness towards him, and them for all their pains, saying, I hope in God, that hereafter my allegations and authorities shall take place to the glory of God and the advantage of the realm; in the mean time I will satisfy myself with the honourable consent of your honours, and the whole parliament.

Here it is to be noted, that this man's stout and godly defence of the truth herein so bound the prince's conscience, that he would not permit the truth in that man to be clean overthrown with authority and power; and therefore this way God working in the prince's mind, a plain token was declared hereby, that all things were not so sincerely handled in the confirmation of the said six articles as they ought to have been, for else the prince might might have had a just cause to have borne his great indignation towards the archbishop. Let us pray that the like stoutness may be perceived in all ecclesiastical and learned men, where the truth ought to be defended, and also the like relenting and flexibility may take place in princes and noblemen, when they shall have occasion offered to manifest the same, so that they utterly overwhelm not the truth by self-will, power, and authority. Now in the end this archbishop's constancy was such towards God's cause, that he confirmed all his doings by bitter death in the fire, without respect of any worldly treasure or pleasure. And as concerning his stoutness in his prince's cause, the contrary resistance of the duke of Northumberland against him proved right well his good mind that way; which chanced by reason that he would not consent unto the dissolving of chantries, until the king came of age, to the intent that they might then better serve to furnish his royal estate, than to have so great treasure consumed in his nonage. Which stoutness, joined with such simplicity, surely was thought by divers of the council a thing incredible, especially in such sort to contend with him, who was so accounted in this realm, as few or none would or durst withstand him.

So dear to him was the cause of God, and of his prince, that for the one he would not keep his conscience clogged, nor for the other lurk or hide his head. Otherwise (as it is said) his very enemies might easily intreat him in any cause reasonable; so that he was altogether free from the vice of stubbornness, and rather culpable of over-much facility and gentleness.

Then followeth, Not angry. Surely, if over-much patience may be a vice, this man may seem to offend rather on this side than on the contrary. Albeit for all his doings I cannot say: for the most part such was his mortification that way, that few we shall find in whom the saying of our Saviour Christ so much prevailed as with him, who would not only have a man to forgive his enemies, but also to pray for them; that lesson never went out of his memory. It was known that he had many cruel enemies, not for his own defects, but only for the sake of his religion: and yet whosoever he was that fought his hindrance, either in goods, estimation, and life, or upon conference would seem ever so slenderly to relent and excuse himself, he would both forget the offence, and ever afterwards familiarly entertain the offender: insomuch that it became a common proverb, "Do unto my lord of Canterbury a displeasure, or a shrewd turn, and then you may be sure to have him your friend whilst he liveth." Of which his gentle disposition in abstaining from revenge, amongst many examples thereof, I shall repeat one.

It happened, an ignorant priest and parson in the north parts, (the town is not now in remembrance, but he was kinsman to one Chersey, a grocer in London; being one of those priests that used more to study at the alehouse, than in his chamber) to sit on a time with his honest neighbours at the alehouse in his own parish, where they were talking in the praise of my lord Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury: and this priest envying his name only for religion's sake, said to his neighbours, "What make you of him, he was but an ostler, and hath no more learning than the gossins that go yonder on the green," with such like slanderous and uncomely words. His honest neighbours not much liking his irreverent speech, articulated against him, and sent their complaint to the lord Cromwel, then vicegerent in causes ecclesiastical, who sent for the priest, and committed him to the Fleet, intending to have made him recant those slanderous words publicly at Paul's Cross. However the lord Cromwell, having great affairs of the prince then in hand, forgot his prisoner in the Fleet: so that the said Chersey, the grocer, understanding that his kinsman was in confinement, only for speaking words against my lord of Canterbury, consulted with the priest, and between them devised to apply rather to the archbishop for his deliverance, than to the lord Cromwel, before whom he was accused: well knowing the difference of their tempers, the one gentle and full of clemency, the other somewhat more severe and rigid, especially against a papist; so that Chersey took upon him first to try my lord of Canterbury's benignity, inasmuch as his cousin's offence was only against him, and none other. Whereupon the said Chersey came to one of the archbishop's gentlemen (whose father bought all his spices and fruit of the said Chersey, and so thereby of familiar acquaintance with the gentleman), and acquainted him with the trouble his kinsman was in, desiring him to be a means to my lord his master, to hear his suit in the behalf of his kinsman.

The matter was moved. The archbishop, like a good-natured man, would never shew himself strange to the meanest petitioner: he immediately sent for the said Chersey, who appearing before him, declared, that there was a kinsman of his in the Fleet, a priest of the north country, and as I may tell your grace the truth (quoth Chersey) a man of small civility and of less learning: and yet he hath a parsonage there, which now (by reason that my lord Cromwell hath laid him in prison) being in his cure, is unserved, and he hath continued in durance above two months, and is called to no answer, and knows not when he shall come to any end; so that this imprisonment consumeth his substance, and will utterly undo him, unless your grace be his good lord.

I know not the man, said the archbishop, nor what he hath done why he should be thus in trouble.

Said Chersey again, He only hath offended against your grace, and against no man else, as may well be perceived by the articles objected against him; the copy whereof the said Chersey then exhibited to the said archbishop of Canterbury; who well perusing the said articles, said, This is the common talk of all the ignorant popish priests in England against me. Surely, said he, I was never made privy to this accusation, and of his confinement I never heard before this time. Notwithstanding, if there be nothing else to charge him withal against the prince or any of the council, I will, at your request, take order with him, and send him again to his cure to do his duty; and so thereupon sent his ring to the warden of the Fleet, desiring him to send the prisoner unto him, with his keeper, in the afternoon.

When the keeper had brought the prisoner at the hour appointed, and Chersey had well instructed his cousin in any wise to submit to the archbishop, confessing his fault, whereby that way he should most easily have an end, and win his favour: the parson was carried into the garden at Lambeth, and there the archbishop sitting under the vine, demanded of the parson what was the cause of his confinement, and who committed him to the Fleet. The parson answered and said, that the lord Cromwell sent him thither, for that certain malicious parishioners of his parish had wrongfully accused him of words which he never spake nor meant. Chersey hearing his foolish cousin so far out of the way from his former instruction, said, Thou dastardly dolt and varlet, is this thy promise thou madest to me? Are there not a great number of thy honest neighbours' hands against thee, to prove thee a liar? Surely, my lord, (quoth Chersey) it is a pity to do him good. I am sorry I have troubled your grace thus far with him.

Well, said the archbishop unto the parson, if you have not offended me, I can do you no good: for I am intreated to help one out of trouble that hath offended against me. If my lord Cromwell hath committed you to prison wrongfully, that lieth in himself to amend, and not in me. If your offence only hath touched me, I will be bold to do somewhat for your friend's sake here. If you have not offended against me, then have I nothing to do with you, but that you may go and remain from whence you came.

Hereupon his kinsman Chersey made a great ado with him, calling him all kinds of opprobrious names! In the end my lord of Canterbury seeming to rise and go his his ways, the priest fell on his knees, and said, I beseech your grace to forgive me this offence, assuring your grace that I spake those words being drunk and not well advised.

Ah, said my lord, this is somewhat, and yet it is no good excuse: for drunkenness always uttereth that which lieth hid in the heart of man when he is sober, alledging a text or two out of the scriptures concerning the vice of drunkenness, which cometh not now to remembrance.

Now therefore (said the archbishop) that you acknowledge somewhat your fault, I am content to commune with you, hoping that you are at this present of an indifferent sobriety. Tell me then, quoth he, did you ever see me, or were you ever acquainted with me before this day?

The priest answered and said, that he never saw his grace in his life. Why then, said the archbishop, what occasion had you to call me an ostler, and that I had not so much learning as the gossins which then went upon the green before your face? If I have no learning, you may now try it, and be out of doubt thereof: therefore, I pray you, examine me, either in grammar, or in other liberal sciences, for I have at one time or other tasted partly of them. Or else if you are a divine, say somewhat that way.

The priest being amazed at my lord's familiar talk, answered and said, I beseech your grace to pardon me. I am altogether unlearned, and understand not the Latin tongue, but very simply. My only study hath been to say my service and mass, fair and deliberate, which I can do as well as any priest in the county where I dwell, I thank God.

Well, said my lord, if you will not examine me, I will make bold to try you, and yet as easily as I can devise, and that only in the story of the Bible now in English, in which I suppose you are daily exercised. Tell me therefore who was king David's father, said my lord. The priest stood still pausing a while, and said, In good faith, my lord, I have forgotten his name. Then said my lord again to him, If you cannot tell that, I pray you tell me then, who was Solomon's father? The foolish priest, without all consideration of what was demanded of him before, made answer, Good my lord, bear with me, I am no further seen in the Bible, than is daily read in our service in the church.

Then the archbishop said, This my question may be found well answered in your service. But I now well perceive, howsoever you have judged heretofore of my learning, sure I am that you have none at all. But this is the common practice of all you that be ignorant and superstitious priests, to slander, back-bite, and hate all such as are learned and well affected towards God's word and sincere religion. Common reason might have taught you what an unlikely thing it was, and contrary to all manner of reason, that a prince having two universities within his realm of well learned men, and desirous to be resolved of as doubtful a question as in these many years the like was not moved within Christendom, should be driven to that necessity for the defence of his cause to send out of his realm an ostler, being a man of no better knowledge than a gossin, in an embassy to answer all learned men, both in the court of Rome, and the emperor's court, in so difficult a question as touching the king's matrimony, and the divorce thereof. I say, if you were men of any reasonable consideration, you might think it both unseemly and uncomely for a prince so to do. But look, where malice reigneth in man, there reason can take no place: and therefore I see by it, that you all are at a point, that no reason or authority can persuade you to favour my name, who never meant evil to you, but both your advantage and profit. Howbeit, God amend you all, forgive you, and send you better minds.

With these words the priest seemed to weep, and desired his grace to pardon his fault and frailty, so that by this means he might return to his cure again, and he would certainly recant those foolish words before his parishioners, as soon as he came home, and would become a new man. Well, said the archbishop, so had you need: and giving him a godly admonition to forbear haunting the alehouse, and to bestow his time better in the continual reading the scriptures, he dismissed him from the Fleet.

The lord Cromwell, perceiving within a fortnight after that his prisoner was sent home without any open punishment, came to Lambeth to the archbishop, and, in a great heat, said to him, My lord, I understand that you have dispatched the northern priest home again, that I of late sent to the Fleet for railing against you, and calling you an ostler.

Indeed I have done so, said the archbishop, for that in his absence the people of his cure wanted their divine service. It is very devout divine service that he saith, quoth the lord Cromwell: it were more meet for him to be an ostler than a curate, who stuck not to call you an ostler. But I thought so much what you would do; and therefore I would not tell you of his knavery when I sent him to prison. Howbeit, henceforth, they shall cut your throat before that I say any thing more to them on your behalf. Why, what would you have done with him? quoth the archbishop; there was nothing laid to his charge, other than words spoken against me, and now the man hath repented, and is well reconciled, and hath been at great charges in prison: it is time therefore that he were rid out of his trouble. Well, said my lord Cromwell, I meant that he should have preached a recantation at Paul's cross, before he had gone home. That had been well done, quoth the archbishop, for then you would have all the world to wonder at me as well as at him. Well, well, said lord Cromwell, we shall bear so long with these popish knaves, that at length they will bring us indeed to be wondered at of all the world.

This example among others serveth to declare, that there remained small desire of revenge in the said archbishop. But what should I say more? His quietness and mortification this way was such, that it is reported by all that knew him, that he never raged so far with any of his household servants as once to call the meanest of them varlet or knave in anger, much less to reprove a stranger with any reproachful words. Much unlike, in this part to the property (as it seemeth), of some other inferior bishops of this realm, which have not spared to fly in the faces, to pluck off the beards, to burn the hands, to beat and scourge with rods the bodies of gentlemen, both married men and others, having almost nothing else in their mouths, but fools and knaves, &c. and yet after all this, think themselves good perfect bishops, after the rule which followeth, and faith,

From which kind of vice, the nature of this archbishop was so far off, as was his doctrine which he professed, and death which he suffered, far from all condition and example of blind popery. After the prohibition of these foresaid vices, succeedeth the mother of all good virtues necessarily required of all christians, but chiefly of spiritual prelate; which is,

Not given to filthy Lucre.

The contrary whereof was so odious unto St. Paul, that he esteemed the same no less than a kind of idolatry, in that it maketh men forget their duty to God so far, and instead of him to worship their treasure. How little this prelate we speak of was infected by this vice, and how he was no niggard, all kind of people that knew him, as well learned beyond the seas and on this side, to whom yearly he gave in exhibition great sums of money, as others, both gentlemen, mean men, and poor men, who had in their necessity that which he could conveniently spare, lend, or make, can well testify. And albeit such was his liberality to all sorts of men, that no man did lack whom he could do for, either in giving or lending; yet, nevertheless, such was again his circumspection, that when he was apprehended and committed to the Tower by queen Mary, he owed no man living a penny, that could or would demand any of of him, but satisfied every man to the uttermost; whereas several sums were owing him by divers persons, which by breaking their bills and obligations he freely forgave them, and suppressed before his attainder.

Touching his hospitality, so little was this property lacking in him, that some men disliking the same, thought it rather a house of too much lavishing and unprofitable expence. But as nothing can be so well done, which by others shall not be maligned and detracted; so neither did this man want his accusers, some finding fault with his great prodigality, some on the contrary complaining of his scanty house-keeping, and strict order, much beneath his revenues and calling. It should be considered, the time wherein he served; which was when reformation of religion first began to be advanced. Then the whole weight and care of the same chiefly depended upon him. During which season almost for the space of sixteen years together, he entertained a number both of learned men and commissioners, from time to time appointed for deciding ecclesiastical affairs.

For the relief of the poor, impotent, sick, and such as came from the wars at Bullen, and other parts beyond the seas, he provided, besides his mansion-house at Beckisborn, in Kent, the parsonage barn well furnished with certain lodgings for the sick and wounded soldiers. To whom were also appointed the almoner, a physician, and a surgeon to attend upon them, and to dress and cure such as were not able to go home to their own countries, having daily from the bishop's kitchen hot broth and meat; for otherwise the common alms of the household was bestowed upon the poor neighbours of the shire. And when any of the impotent did recover and were able to travel, they had convenient money to bear their charges, according to the number of miles from that place distant. And this good example of mercy and liberal benignity, I thought here fit not in silence to be suppressed, whereby others may be moved, according to their vocation, to walk in the steps of no less liberality, than in him in this behalf appeared.

As concerning these qualities, the business of his life before joined with his benign and gentle disposition, do testify that he could not be void of these virtues reigning in him, which was so abundantly adorned with the other, as we have before declared.

To cleave fast unto the true Word of Doctrine, that he may be able to exhort with wholesome Learning, and to reprove them that say against it.

Then concludeth St. Paul with the most excellent virtue of all others to be wished in a prelate of the church. For if he be void of these gifts and graces, he is worthy of no commendation, neither shall he deserve the name of a bishop, if either for dread or reward, affection or favour, he swerve from the truth. The constancy of this worthy archbishop never shrunk from any storm; but was so many ways tried, that neither the fear nor favour of his prince, nor any other respect could alienate or change his purpose, grounded upon that infallible doctrine of the gospel.

At the time of setting forth the six articles, this archbishop was the man, and the only man that opposed them, and disputed with the whole parliament three days together against them. Insomuch that the king, who could not dislike his reasons, and yet would needs have the articles pass, required him to absent himself for a time out of the chamber while the act should pass, and so he did; and soon after the king sent all the lords to Lambeth to comfort and cheer up his heart, that he might not be discouraged.

After the apprehension of the lord Cromwell, the adversaries of the gospel thought all things sure on their own side, and appointed ten or twelve bishops, and other learned men, to come to the archbishop of Canterbury for the establishing of certain articles, which the papists then thought to enforce against the said archbishop, who stood alone against them all in defence of the truth; consequently certain of the council, by the enticement and provocation of his old enemy the bishop of Winchester, and others of the same sect, attempted the king against him, declaring plainly, that the realm was so infected with heresies and heretics, that it was dangerous for his highness farther to permit it unreformed, lest peradventure by long suffering, such contention should arise, as might incur horrible commotions and uproars, as was the case in some parts of Germany not long ago. The enormity whereof they could not impute to any so much as to the archbishop of Canterbury, who by his own preaching, and his chaplains, had filled the realm with divers and pernicious heresies. The king would needs know his accusers. They answered, forasmuch as he was a counsellor no man durst take upon him to accuse him: but if it would please his highness to commit him to the tower for a time, there would be accusations and proofs enough against him: for otherwise, just testimony and witness against him would not appear, and therefore your highness (said they) must needs give us the counsel, liberty and leave to commit him to prison.

The king perceiving the importunate suit against the archbishop, (but yet meaning not to have him wronged and utterly given over into their hands) granted unto them that they should the next day commit him to the Tower for his trial. When night came the king sent sir Anthony Deny about midnight to Lambeth to the archbishop, willing him forthwith to resort unto him at the court. The message done, the archbishop speedily addressed himself at the court, and coming into the gallery where the king walked and tarried for him, his highness said, Ah, my lord of Canterbury, I can tell you news. For divers weighty considerations it is determined by me and the council, that you to-morrow, by nine of the clock, should be committed to the Tower, for that you and your chaplains (as information is given us) have taught and preached, and thereby sown within the realm, such a number of execrable heresies, that it is feared, the whole realm being infected with them, no small contentions and commotions will arise thereby among my subjects, as of late days the like was in divers parts of Germany: and therefore the council have requested me, for the trial of the matter, to suffer them to commit you to the Tower, or else no man dare come forth, as witness in these matters, you being a counsellor.

When the king had spoke his mind, the archbishop kneeled down, and said, I am content, if it please your grace, with all my heart, to go thither at your highness's commandment, and I most humbly thank your majesty that I may come to my trial; for there be those that have many ways slandered me, and now by this way I hope to clear myself of such report.

The king perceiving the man's uprightness, joined with such simplicity, said, O Lord! what manner of man be you! what simplicity is in you! I thought that you would rather have sued to us to have taken the pains to have heard you and your accusers together for your trial, without any such imprisonment. Do you not know what state you be in with the whole world, and how many enemies you have? Yet notwithstanding, to-morrow when the council shall sit, and send for you, resort unto them, and if, in charging you with this matter, they do commit you to the Tower, require of them, (because you are one of them, a counsellor) that you may have your accusers brought before them without any further confinement, and use for yourself as good arguments that way as you may devise; and if no intreaty or reasonable request will serve, then deliver unto them this my ring (which then the king delivered unto the archbishop), and say unto them, If there be no remedy, my lords, but that I must needs go to the Tower, then I revoke my cause from you, and appeal to the king's own person, by this his token unto you all; for

(said the king to the archbishop) as soon as they shall see this my ring, they will know it so well, that they shall understand that I have resumed the whole cause into mine own hands and determination, and that I have discharged them thereof.

The archbishop perceiving the king's benignity so much towards him, had much ado to forbear tears, and humbling himself with thanks, took his leave of his majesty for that night.

On the morrow about nine of the clock before noon, the council sent a gentleman-usher for the archbishop, who, when he came to the council-chamber door, could not be let in, but was compelled there to wait among the pages, lacquies, and serving men. Dr. Butts, the king's physician, resorting that way, and seeing how my lord of Canterbury was used, went immediately to the king's highness, and said, May it please your grace, my lord of Canterbury is well promoted: for he is now become a footman: yonder he hath stood this half hour at the council-chamber door amongst them. Sure it is not so! (quoth the king) the council hath not so little discretion as to use the metropolitan of all the realm in that manner, especially being one of their own number. But let him alone (said the king), you shall hear more by and by.

At last the archbishop was called into the council-chamber, to whom was alledged, as before is rehearsed. The archbishop answered as the king had before advised him; and in the end, when he perceived that no manner of persuasion or intreaty could serve, he delivered the king's ring, revoking his cause into the king's hands. At this the whole council were much amazed; they all arose, and carried the king his ring, surrendering the matter, as the order and custom was, into his own hands.

Now when the king's highness had thus benignly and mercifully dispatched the said archbishop from this fore accusation by the council laid against him, all wise men would have thought that it had been mere folly afterwards to have attempted any matter against him: but yet look where malice reigneth, there neither reason nor honesty can take place. Such therefore as had conceived deep rancour and displeasure against him, ceased not to persecute him by all possible means. Then brought they against him a new kind of accusation, and caused sir John Gostwike, knight, a man of a contrary religion, to accuse the archbishop openly in the parliament-house, laying to his charge his sermons preached at Sandwich, and his lectures read at Canterbury, wherein should be contained manifest heresies against the sacrament of the altar, &c.

After further vain attempts, his enemies devised that not only the prebendaries of his cathedral church in Canterbury, but also the most famous justices of the peace in the shire should accuse him and article against him; which in very deed was most substantially brought to pass, and the articles both well written and subscribed, were delivered to the king's highness, who, when he had perused the book, wrapt it up, and put it in his sleeve; and finding occasion to solace himself upon the Thames, came with his barge, furnished with his musicians, along by Lambeth-bridge towards Chelsea. The noise of the musicians brought the archbishop to the bridge to do his duty, and salute his prince. Ah, my chaplain (said the king to the archbishop), come into the barge to me. The archbishop told his highness that he would take his own barge, and wait on his majesty. No, said the king, you must come into my barge, for I want to talk with you.

When the king and the archbishop were both together alone in the barge, the king said to the archbishop, I have news out of Kent for you, my lord. The archbishop answered, Good, I hope, if it please your highness. Marry, quoth the king, it is so good that I now know the greatest heretic in Kent, and with that pulled the book of articles out of his sleeve against both the archbishop and his preachers, and gave the book to him, desiring him to peruse the same. When the archbishop had read the articles, and saw himself so uncourteously handled of his own church whereof he was head, I mean the prebendaries of his cathedral, and of such his neighbours as he had many ways gratified, I mean the justices of the peace, it much grieved him. Notwithstanding he kneeled down to the king, and besought his majesty to grant out a commission to whomsoever it pleased his highness, for them to try out the truth of this accusation. In very deed, said the king, I do mean so to do, and you yourself shall be chief commissioner, to adjoin to you such two or three more as you shall think good yourself. Then it will be thought, quoth the archbishop, that it is not fair and impartial that I should be my own judge and my chaplains also. Well, said the king, I will have none other but yourself, and such as you will appoint: for I am sure that you will not halt with me in any thing, although you be driven to accuse yourself, and I know partly how this affair proceedeth, and if you handle the matter wisely, you shall find a pretty conspiracy devised against you. Whom will you have with you, said the king? Whomsoever it shall please your grace to name, quoth the archbishop. I will appoint Dr. Belhouse for one, name you the other, said the king, meet for that purpose. My chancellor, Dr. Cox, and Hufley, my register, said the archbishop, are men expert to examine such troublesome matters. Well, said the king, let there be a commission made forth, and out of hand get you into Kent, and advertise me of your doings.

They came into Kent, and there they sat about three weeks to find out who was the first occasion of this accusation, for thereof the king would chiefly be informed. Now the inquisition being begun by the commissioners, every man shrunk in his horns, and no man would confess any thing to the purpose. For Dr. Cox and Hufley, being friendly to the papists, handled the matter so, that they would permit nothing material to come to light. This thing being well perceived by the archbishop's secretary, he wrote immediately to Dr. Butts and Mr. Deny, declaring, that if the king did not send some other to assist my lord, than those that then were there with him, it were impossible that any thing should come to light: and therefore wished that Dr. Lee, or some other spirited man that had been exercised in the king's ecclesiastical affairs in his visitations, might be sent to the archbishop. Upon these letters, Dr. Lee was sent for to court by the king, and having the king's mind farther declared unto him when he came to court, he departed immediately into Kent, so that on All-hallow-eve he delivered to the archbishop the king's ring, with a declaration of his highness's farther displeasure: and after his message was delivered, he advised the archbishop to name him a dozen or sixteen of his officers and gentlemen, such as had both discretion, wit, and penetration, to whom he gave in commission from the king, to search both the purses, chests, and chambers of all those that were deemed or suspected to be of this confederacy, both within the cathedral church and without, and such letters and writings as they could find about them, to bring them to the archbishop and him.

These men thus appointed, went in one hour and instant to all the houses and places they were appointed to; and within four hours afterwards the whole conspiracy was disclosed by finding of letters, some from the bishop of Winchester, some from Dr. London, at Oxford, and from justices of the shire, with others; so that the first beginning, the proceeding, and what should have been the end of their conspiracy, was now made manifest. Certain chambers and chests of gentlemen of the shire were also searched, where likewise letters were found tending to this purpose. Amongst others, two letters came to my lord's hands, the one wrote by the suffragan of Dover, and the other by Dr. Barber, a civilian, whom the archbishop continually retained in his house for the expedition of matters in suit before him, as a counsellor in the law, when need required. These two men being well promoted by the archbishop, he used ever in such familiarity, that when the suffragan, being prebendary of Canterbury, came to him, he always had him at his own mess, and the other other never from his table, as men in whom he had much delight and comfort, in any case of care and penitiveness. But that which they did was altogether counterfeit, for they were both of this confederacy.

When my lord had gotten these their letters into his hands, he one day, when the suffragan happened to come to him at his house at Bekisburn, called him into his study along with Dr. Barber, saying, Come your ways with me, for I must have your advice in a matter. When they were both with him in his study, he said to them, You two are men in whom I have had much confidence and trust; you must now give me some good counsel, for I am shamefully abused by one or two, to whom I have trusted all my secrets from time to time, and did trust them as myself. I require you, therefore, with your good advice to instruct me how I shall behave myself towards them. You are both my friends, and such as I have always used when I needed counsel. What say you to the matter? said the archbishop.

Marry, quoth Dr. Barber, such villains and knaves (saving your honour) are not worthy to live, but ought to be hanged out of hand without any other law. Hanging were too good, quoth the suffragan; and if there lacked one to do execution, I would be hangman myself.

At these words, the archbishop, being astonished, cast up his hands to heaven, and said, O Lord most merciful God, whom may a man trust now-a-days! It is most true which is said, "Curst is he who putteth his trust in man, and in his own strength." There was never man used as I am: but, O Lord, thou hast evermore defended me, and lent me one great friend and master (meaning the king) without whose protection I were not able to stand upright one day without being overthrown, I praise thy holy name therefore: and with that he pulled out of his bosom their two letters, and said, Know ye these letters, my masters? Then they fell upon their knees, and desired forgiveness, declaring, how they a year before were tempted to do the same; and so, very lamentably weeping and bewailing their doings, besought his grace to pardon and forgive them. Well, said the gentle archbishop, God make you both good men; I never deserved this at your hands: but ask God forgiveness, against whom you have highly offended. If such men as you are not to be trusted, what should I do alive? I perceive now, that there is no fidelity or trust amongst men.

Now, when all these letters and accusations were found, they were put into a chest, the king's majesty minding to have perused some of them, and to have punished the principals of them. The chest and writings were brought to Lambeth; at which time began the parliament; and much ado there was to procure the king a subsidy, that thereupon might ensue a pardon, which indeed followed, and so nothing was done, other than their falsehood known. This was the last push that was attempted against the archbishop during king Henry the Eighth's days; for never after durst any man alledge any matter against him while he lived.

Other endeavours were also used to inflame the king's mind against preachers in Kent, especially against Richard Turner, of Chatham, who was curate to Mr. Morrice, the archbishop's secretary; the said Mr. Morrice wrote a letter of apology concerning him to Sir William Buts and Sir Anthony Deny, to be shewed unto the king. In this letter are set forth Mr. Turner's assiduity in accusing the bishop of Rome's usurped power and authority on one hand, and advancing the king's majesty's supremacy on the other: by which he had procured the hatred of all those who were inimical to the latter, and by secret and open means caused him and other preachers to be hardly dealt with, and bribes and other artifices were not neglected to prejudice the magistracy of the county and other persons of note against him. But he defended himself before the commissioners at Lambeth with such honesty and zeal, that he was discharged freely, and without any imposition or restraint: which was highly displeasing to the popish clergy, who forged a malicious tale of his pompous return, with a retinue of 500 persons, who had collected on the road to welcome him home, which they caused to be reported to the king.

On his being again sent for by the archbishop, at the king's command, who desired that he might be whipped out of the country, Mr. Morrice then states the malicious report, and Mr. Turner's returning privately from London, to avoid uproar and commotion, faint and weary from travelling on foot through the woods; and the archbishop again pacified the king's resentment, and Turner again, without the smallest blemish of character, returned to his cure. Twice delivered from the hands of his enemies, they despaired of success in Kent; and now devised means of accusation before he came into Canterbury diocese, on which he was again seized and bound, brought up to London, and for some time imprisoned, but was at last ordered into Kent to the archbishop to recant his former doctrines. And then follows an appeal to the king's clemency, not to suffer a man to be thus daily insulted for maintaining his majesty's supremacy, by those malicious papists who deny it; that it now remained with the king to release him from prison, the archbishop having released him so often already, besides having been accused to the king of maintaining and supporting all the heretics in the realm.

It then proceeds to state that if the king should not discharge Turner of recantation, on account of his teaching the supremacy, the very act of requiring it would be in effect a dereliction of that authority, which was sanctioned by parliament. And in the next place that he had been indicted for offending against the six articles, seven or eight months before, by persons who were absent at the very time, and could know nothing of the charges exhibited against him. Finally, that they would use their influence with his majesty for Mr. Turner's release, as a matter of importance for the maintenance of the king's supremacy, for which he was a most zealous advocate, which at this crisis was of the greatest magnitude.

Dr. Buts, who was a friend to Mr. Turner's principles, had soon an opportunity of bringing forward this letter for the king's notice; by whose order it was twice deliberately read, on which the king gave orders for his being retained within the kingdom as a faithful subject, and the enemies of this worthy man were once more disappointed.

As for Dr. Cranmer, he constantly experienced the king's protection, by which he defeated the conspiracies of his enemies; though it seems doubtful, whether he had then so thoroughly persuaded himself in the right knowledge of the sacrament, as he was soon after his conference with bishop Ridley. In king Edward's time he more openly opposed the doctrines of transubstantiation and the corporal presence, and all the other papistical doctrines of the mass; and in conclusion wrote five books for the public instruction of the church of England, which instruction to this day standeth, and is received in the church. He had some controversy with bishop Gardiner, who was then in the Tower: to whose cavilling sophistry he replied openly, and was followed on the same side by Peter Martyr.

Afterward, this king Edward, a prince of most worthy qualifications, falling sick, when he perceived that his death was at hand, and the force of his painful disease would not suffer him to live longer, and knowing that his sister Mary was wholly wedded to the popish religion, bequeathed the succession of this realm to the lady Jane (a lady of great birth, but of greater learning, being niece to king Henry the Eighth by his sister) by consent of the council and lawyers of the realm. To this testament of the king's, when all the nobles of the realm, estates, and judges had subscribed, they sent for the archbishop, and required him that he also would subscribe. But he excusing himself in this manner, said, That it was otherwise in the testament of king Henry his father, and that he had sworn to the succession of Mary, as then the next heir; by which oath he was so bound, that without manifest perjury he could not go from it.

The council answered, that they were not ignorant of that, and that they had conscience as well as he; and moreover, that they were sworn to that testament, and therefore he should not think there was any danger therein, or that he should be in more peril of perjury than the rest.

To this the archbishop answered, that he was judge of no man's conscience but his own: and therefore as he would not be prejudicial to others, so he would not commit his conscience unto other men's facts, or cast himself into danger, seeing that every man should give account of his own conscience, and not of other men's. And as concerning the subscription, before he had spoken with the king himself, he utterly refused to do it.

The king therefore being demanded of the archbishop concerning this matter, said, that the nobles and lawyers of this realm counselled him unto it, and persuaded him that the bond of the first testament could nothing hinder, but that this lady Jane might succeed him as heir, and the people without danger acknowledge her as their queen. Who then demanding leave of the king that he might first talk with certain lawyers that were in the court; when they all agreed that by law of the realm it might be so, returning to the king, with much ado he subscribed.

Well, not long after this king Edward died, being almost sixteen years old, to the great sorrow, but greater calamity of the whole realm. After whose decease, immediately it was commanded that the lady Jane (who was unwilling thereunto) should be proclaimed queen. Which thing the common people much disliked, not that they did so much favour the lady Mary, before whom they saw the lady Jane preferred, as for the hatred conceived against some whom they could not favour.

Besides this, there happened also other of discord between the nobles and common time: for what injuries of commons and inordinately held, with other inordinate pollings and charitable dealings between the landlords and tenants, I cannot tell. But in fine, thus the matter fell out, that the lady Mary hearing of the death of her brother, and shifting for herself, was so assisted by the commons, that she soon prevailed. Who being established in the possession of the realm, not long after came to London: and after she had first caused the two fathers, the duke of Northumberland, and the duke of Suffolk, to be beheaded (as has been already related,) she likewise caused the lady Jane, being both in age tender, and innocent of this crime, after she could by no means be turned from the constancy of her faith, together with her husband, to be beheaded.

The rest of the nobles, paying fines, were forgiven, the archbishop of Canterbury only excepted: who though he desired pardon (by means of his friends) could obtain none: insomuch that the queen would not once vouchsafe to see him. For as yet the old grudge against the archbishop for the divorcement of her mother, remained hid in the bottom of her heart. Besides this divorce, she remembered the state of religion changed; all which was imputed to the archbishop as the cause thereof.

While these things were doing, a rumour was in all men's mouths, that the archbishop, to gain favour with the queen, had promised to say a dirge mass after the old custom, for the funeral of king Edward, her brother. Neither wanted there some who reported that he had already said mass at Canterbury; which mass indeed was said by Dr. Thornton. This rumour Cranmer thinking speedily to stop, gave forth a writing of his purgation: the tenor whereof being before expressed, I need not here again recite.

This bill being thus written, and lying openly in a window in his chamber, cometh in by chance Mr. Story, then bishop of Rochester, who after he had read and perused the same, required the archbishop to have a copy of the bill. The archbishop granting the same, and by Mr. Story's lending it to another friend, there were divers copies taken, and the thing published abroad among the common people, insomuch that almost every scrivener's shop was occupied in copying out the same: and so at length some of these copies coming to the bishop's hands, and so brought to the council, and they sending it to the commissioners, the matter was known, and so he commanded to appear.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer appeared at the day prefixed, before the said commissioners, bringing a true inventory, as he was commanded, of all his goods. That done, a bishop of the queen's privy council, being one of the said commissioners, after the inventory was received, made mention of the bill; My lord, said he, there is a bill put forth in your name, wherein you seem to be aggrieved with setting up the mass again; we doubt not but you are sorry that it is gone abroad.

To whom the archbishop answered, As I do not deny myself to be the author of that bill or letter, so must I confess here unto you, concerning the same bill, that I am sorry that the said bill went from me in such sort as it did. For when I had written it, Mr. Story got the copy from me, and it is now come abroad, and as I understand, the city is full of it. For which I am sorry that it so passed my hands: for I intended otherwise to have made it in a more large and ample manner, and minded to have set it on St. Paul's-church door, and on the doors of all the churches in London, with mine own seal joined thereunto.

At which words, when they saw the constancy of the man, they dismissed him, affirming they had no more at present to say unto him, but that shortly he should hear farther. The said bishop declared afterwards to one of Dr. Cranmer's friends, that notwithstanding his attainder of treason, the queen's determination at that time was, that Cranmer should only have been deprived of his archbishopric, and have had a sufficient living assigned him, upon his exhibiting of a true inventory, with commandment to keep his house without meddling in matters of religion. But how true that was I have not to say. This is certain, that not long after this, he was sent to the Tower, and soon after condemned for treason. Notwithstanding the queen, when she could not honestly deny him his pardon, seeing all the rest were discharged, and especially, seeing he last (of all others) subscribed to king's Edward's request, and that against his own will, released to him his action of treason, and accused him only of heresy, which the archbishop liked well, and came to pass as he wished, because the cause was not his own, but Christ's; not the queen's, but the church's. Thus stood the cause of Cranmer, till at length it was determined by the queen and the council, that he should be removed from the Tower where he was prisoner, to Oxford, there to dispute with the doctors and divines. And privily word was sent before to them of Oxford to prepare themselves, and make them ready to dispute. And although the queen and the bishops had concluded before what should become of him, yet it pleased them that the matter should be debated with arguments, that under some honest shew of disputation the murder of the man might be covered. Neither could their hasty speed of revenge abide any long delay; and therefore in all haste he was carried to Oxford.

What this disputation was, and how it was handled, what were the questions and reasons on both sides, and also touching his condemnation by the university and the prolocutor, because it hath been sufficiently declared, we intend now therefore to proceed to his final judgment and order of condemnation, which was the 12th day of September, 1555, and seven days before the condemnation of bishop Ridley and Mr. Latimer, as is before-mentioned. The story whereof here followeth, faithfully corrected by the report and narration (coming by chance to our hands) of one who being both present thereat, and also a devout favourer of the see and faction of Rome, can lack no credit (I think) with such who seek what they can to discredit whatsoever maketh not with their fancied religion of Rome.

After the disputations done and finished in Oxford between the doctors of both universities, and the three worthy bishops, Drs. Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, ye heard then how sentence condemnatory, immediately upon the same, was administered against them by Dr. Weston and others of the university; whereby they were judged to be heretics, and so committed to the mayor and sheriffs of Oxford. But forasmuch as the sentence given against them was void in law, (for at that time the authority of the pope was not yet received into the land) therefore a new commission was sent from Rome, and a new process framed for the conviction of these reverend and godly learned men aforesaid. In which commission, first was Dr. James Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, the pope's sub-delegate, with Dr. Martin and Dr. Story, commissioners in the king and queen's behalf for the execution of the same.

Here is to be understood, that at the coming down of the aforesaid commissioners, which was upon Thursday the 12th of September, 1555, in the church of St. Mary, and in the east end of the said church, at the high altar, was erected a solemn scaffold for bishop Brooks aforesaid, representing the pope's person, ten feet high. The seat was made that he might sit under the sacrament of the altar. And on the right hand of the pope's delegate, beneath him sat Dr. Martin, and on the left hand sat Dr. Story, the king and queen's commissioners, who were both doctors of the civil law, and underneath them other doctors, scribes and pharisees also, with the pope's collector, and a number of such others.

And thus these bishops being placed in their pontificals, the archbishop of Canterbury was sent for to come before them. He having intelligence of them that were there, thus ordered himself. He came forth of the prison to the church of St. Mary, set forth with bills and spears for fear he should start away, being clothed in a fair black gown, with his hood on both shoulders, such as doctors of divinity used to wear in the university. Who, after he came into the church, and did see them sit in their pontificals, he did not put off his cap to any of them, but stood still till he was called.

Then one of the proctors for the pope, called Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, appear here and make answer to what shall be laid to thy charge; that is to say, for blasphemy, incontinence, and heresy; and make answer here to the bishop of Gloucester, representing the pope's person.

Upon this he being brought nearer unto the scaffold, where the aforesaid bishop sat, he first well viewed the place of judgment, and espying where the king and queen's majesties' proctors were, putting off his cap, he first humbly bowing his knee to the ground, made reverence to the one, and after to the other. That done, beholding the bishop in the face, he put on his bonnet again, making no manner of token of obedience towards him at all. Whereat the bishop being offended, said unto him, that it might beseem him right well, weighing the authority he represented, to do his duty unto him.

Dr. Cranmer answered, That he had once taken a solemn oath, never to consent to the admitting of the bishop of Rome's authority into this realm of England again; and that he had done it advisedly, and meant by God's grace to keep it; and therefore would commit nothing either by sign or token, which might argue his consent to the receiving of the same; and so he desired the said bishop to judge of him, and that he did it not for any contempt to his person, which he could willingly have honoured as well as any of the others, if his commission had come from as good an authority as their's. This he answered both modestly, wisely, and patiently, with his cap on his head, not once bowing or making any reverence to him that represented the pope's person.

MY lord, at this present we are come to you as commissioners, and for you, not intruding ourselves by our own authority, but sent by commission, partly from the pope's holiness, partly from the king and queen's most excellent majesties, not to your utter discomfort, but to your comfort if you will yourself. We come, not to judge you, but to put you in remembrance of what you have been, and may be. Neither come we to dispute with you; but to examine you in certain matters; which being done, to make relation thereof to him that hath power to judge you.

And first, as charity doth move us, I would think good somewhat to exhort you, and that by the second chapter of St. John in the Revelations, "Remember from whence thou art fallen, and do the first works, or if not,"—and you know what followeth. Remember yourself from whence you have fallen. You have fallen from the universal and catholic church of Christ, from the very true and received faith of all Christendom, and that by open heresy. You have fallen from your promise to God, from your fidelity and allegiance, and that by open preaching, marriage, and adultery. You have fallen from your sovereign prince and queen by open treason. Remember therefore from whence you are fallen. Your fall is great, the danger cannot be seen. Wherefore, when I say, Remember from whence you are fallen, I put you in mind, not only of your fall, but also of the state you were in before your fall. You were some time, as I and other poor men, in a mean estate; God take to witness, I speak it to no reproach or abasement of you, but to put you in memory, how God hath called you from a low to an high degree, from one degree to another, from better to better, and never gave you over, till he had appointed you an ambassador, metropolitan of all England, and pastor of his own flock: such great trust did he put you in, in his church; what could he do more? for even as he ordained Moses to be a ruler over his church of Israel, and gave him full authority of the same; so did he make you over his church of England. For who was thought as then more devout? who was more religious in the face of the world? who was thought to have more conscience of a vow-making, and observing the order of the church, more earnest in the defence of the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar than you were? and then all things prospered with you; your prince favoured you; yea, God himself favoured you, your candlestick was set up in the highest place of the church, and the light of your candle was over all the church. I would God it had so continued still.

But after you began to fall by schism, and would not acknowledge the pope's holiness and supreme head, but would stoutly uphold the unlawful requests of king Henry the Eighth, then began you to fancy unlawful liberty; and when you had exiled a good conscience, then ensued great shipwreck in the sea, which was out of the true and catholic church into the sea of desperation. When you had forsaken God, God forsook you, and gave you over to your own will, and suffered you to fall from schism to apostacy, from apostacy to heresy, and from heresy to perjury, from perjury to treason, and so in conclusion, into the full indignation of our sovereign prince. Cast not yourself away, spare your body, spare your soul, spare them also whom you have seduced, spare the shedding of Christ's blood for you in vain. Harden not your heart, acknowledge the truth, yield to the prescript word of God, to the catholic church of Rome, to the received verity of all Christendom. Wed not yourself to your own self-will. Stand not too much in your own conceit. Think not yourself wiser than all Christendom is besides you. Leave off this unjust cavil. Believe as the catholic church doth believe and teach you. Persuade with yourself, that without the church there is no salvation. And thus much have I said of charity. If this poor simple exhortation of mine may sink into your head, and take effect with you, then have I said as I would have said, otherwise not as I would, but as I could for this present.

And thus bishop Brooks finishing his oration, sat down. After whom, Dr. Martin taking the matter in hand, began thus:

ALTHOUGH there are two governments, the one spiritual, and the other temporal, the one having the keys, and the other the sword, yet in all ages we read, that for the honour and glory of God both these powers have been adjoined together. For if we read the Old Testament, we shall find that so did Josias and Ezekias. So did the king of the Ninevites compel a general fast through all the whole city. So did Darius in breaking the great idol Bell, and delivering godly Daniel out of the den of lions. So did Nebuchadonofor make and institute laws against the blasphemers of God. But to let pass these examples, with a great number more, and to come to Christ's time, it is not unknown what great pains they took to set forth God's honour: and although the rule and government of the church did only appertain to the spirituality, yet for the suppression of heresies and schisms, kings were admitted as aiders thereunto. First, Constantine the Great called a council at Nice for the suppression of the Arian sect, where the same time was raised a great contention among them. And after long disputation had, when the fathers could not agree upon the putting down the Arians, they referred their judgment to Constantine. God forbid, said Constantine: you ought to rule me, and not I you. And as Constantine did, so did Theodosius against the Nestorians, so did Marcianus against Manicheus. Jovinian made a law, that no man should marry with a nun, that had wedded herself to the church.

So had king Henry the Eighth the title of Defender of the Faith, because he wrote against Luther and his accomplices. So these nine hundred years the king of Spain had the title of Catholic, for the expulsion of the Arians; and, to say the truth, the king and queen's majesties do nothing degenerate from their ancestors, taking upon them to restore again the title to be Defender of the Faith, to the right heir hereof, the pope's holiness.

Therefore these two princes, perceiving this noble realm, how it hath been brought from the unity of the true and catholic church, which you and your confederates do and have renounced; perceiving also that you do persist in your detestable errors, and will by no means be revoked from the same, have made their humble request and petition to the pope's holiness, Paul the Fourth, as supreme head of the church of Christ, declaring to him, that whereas you were archbishop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of England, and at your consecration took two solemn oaths for your due obedience to be given to the see of Rome, to become a true preacher or pastor of his flock, yet contrary to your oath and allegiance, for unity have sowed discord; for chastity, marriage and adultery; for obedience, contention; and for faith, you have been the author of all mischief. The pope's holiness, considering their request and petition, hath granted them, that according to the censure of this realm process should be made against you.

And whereas in this late time you both excluded charity and justice, yet hath his holiness decreed, that you shall have both charity and justice shewed unto you. He willeth you should have the laws in most ample manner to answer in your behalf, and that you shall here come before my lord of Gloucester, as high commissioner from his holiness, to the examination of such articles as shall be proposed against you, and that we should require the examination of you in the king and queen's majesties' behalf. The king and queen as touching themselves, because by the law they cannot appear personally, [quia sunt illustres personæ] have appointed as their attornies, Dr. Story, and me. Wherefore here I offer to your good lordship our proxy, sealed with the broad seal of England, and offer myself to be proctor in the king's majesty's behalf. I exhibit here also certain articles, containing the manifest adultery and perjury: also books of heresy made partly by him, and partly set forth by his authority. And here I produce him as party principal to answer to your good lordship.

Crammer. Shall I then make my answer?

Martin. As you think good, no man shall hinder you.

And here the archbishop kneeling down on both knees towards the west, said the Lord's prayer. Then rising up, he recited the articles of the creed. Which done, he entered his protestation in form as follows.

The Faith and Profession of Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, before the Commissioners.

THIS I do profess as touching my faith, and make my protestation, which I desire you to note. I will never consent that the bishop of Rome shall have any jurisdiction within this realm, for I have made an oath to the king, and I must obey the king by God's laws. By the scripture the king is chief, and no foreign person in his own realm above him. There is no subject but to a king. I am a subject, I owe my fidelity to the crown. The pope is contrary to the crown. I cannot obey both; for no man can serve two masters at once, as you in the beginning of your oration declared by the sword and keys, attributing the keys to the pope, and the sword to the king. But I say the king hath both. Therefore he that is subject to Rome, and the laws of Rome, he is perjured; for the pope's and the judge's laws are contrary.

A priest indebted, by the laws of the realm shall be sued before a temporal judge; by the pope's laws contrary.

The bishop of Rome is contrary to God, and injurious to his laws; for God commanded all men to be diligent in the knowledge of his law; and therefore hath appointed one holy day in the week at the least, for the people to come to the church and hear the word of God expounded unto them, and that they might the better understand it, to hear it in their mother tongue which they know. The pope doth contrary; for he willeth the service to be had in the Latin tongue, which they do not understand. God would have it to be perceived; the pope will not. When the priest giveth thanks, God would that the people should do so too, and God will have them to confess altogether; the pope will not.

Now as concerning the sacrament, I have taught no false doctrine of the sacrament of the altar: for if it can be proved by any doctor, above a thousand years after Christ, that Christ's body is there really, I will give over. My book was made seven years ago, and no man hath brought any authors against it. I believe that whoso eateth and drinketh that sacrament, Christ is within them, whole Christ, his nativity, passion, resurrection, and ascension; but not that corporally that sitteth in heaven.

Now Christ commanded all to drink of the cup: the pope taketh it away from the laymen: and yet one saith that if Christ had died for the devil, that he should drink thereof. Christ biddeth us to obey the king, but the bishop of Rome biddeth us to obey him; therefore unless he be Antichrist, I cannot tell what to make of him. Wherefore if I should obey him, I cannot obey Christ.

He is like the devil in his doings; for the devil said to Christ, If thou wilt fall down and worship me, I will give thee all the kingdoms of the world. Thus he took upon him to give that which was not his own. Even so the bishop of Rome giveth princes their crowns, being none of his own; for where princes either by election, or by succession, or by inheritance obtain their crown, he saith that they should have it of him.

Christ saith, that Antichrist shall be. And who shall he be? Forsooth, he that advanceth himself above all other creatures. Now if there be none already that hath advanced himself after such sort beside the pope, then in the mean time let him be Antichrist.

Story. Pleaseth it you to make an end?

Crammer. For he will be the vicar of Christ, he will dispense dispense with the Old and New Testament also, yea and with apostasy.

The pope would give bishoprics, so would the king. But at last the king got the upper hand, and so are all bishops perjured, first to the pope, and then to the king.

The crown hath nothing to do with the clergy. For if a clerk come before a judge, the judge shall make process against him, but not to execute any laws. For if the judge should put him to execution, then is the king accursed in maintaining his own laws. And therefore say I, that he is neither true to God, nor to the king, that first received the pope.

Martin. As you understand, then if they maintain the supremacy of Rome, they cannot maintain England too.

Cranmer. I require you to declare to the king and queen what I have said, and how their oaths do stand with the realm and the pope. St. Gregory saith, he that taketh upon him to be head of the universal church, is worse than the Antichrist. If any man can shew me, that it is not against God's word to hold his stirrup when he taketh his horse, and kifs his feet (as kings do), then will I kifs his feet also.

And you for your part, my lord, are perjured; for now you sit judge for the pope, and yet you did receive your bishopric of the king. You have taken an oath to be adversary to the realm; for the pope's laws are contrary to the laws of the realm.

Gloucester. You were the cause that I did forsake the pope, and did swear that he ought not to be supreme head, and gave to king Henry the Eighth, that he ought to be; and this you made me do.

Cranmer. To this I answer: You report me ill, and say not the truth, and I will prove it here before you all. The truth is, that my predecessor, archbishop Warham, gave the supremacy to king Henry the Eighth, and said, that he ought to have it before the bishop of Rome, and that God's word would agree therewith. And upon the same was there sent to both the universities, Oxford and Cambridge, to know what the word of God would do touching the supremacy, and it was reasoned upon, and argued at length. So at the last both the universities agreed, and set to their seals, and sent it to king Henry the Eighth to the court, that he ought to be supreme head, and not the pope. Whereupon you were at that time doctor of divinity, and your consent was thereunto, as by your hand doth appear. Therefore you mis-report me, that I was the cause of your falling away from the pope, but it was yourself. All this was in archbishop Warham's time, and while he was alive, so that it was three quarters of a year ere ever I had the archbishopric of Canterbury in my hands, and before I might do any thing. So that here you have reported of me that which you cannot prove, which is ill done.—All this while his cap was on his head.

Gloucester. We come to examine you, and you, methinks, examine us.

Dr. STORY's Oration.

PLEASETH it your good lordship, because it hath pleased the king and queen's majesties to appoint my companion and me to hear the examination of this man before your good lordship, to give me somewhat to talk in that behalf. Although I know that in talk with heretics there cometh hurt to all men; for it wearieth the stedfast, troubleth the doubtful, and taketh in snare the weak and simple: yet because he saith, he is not bound to answer your lordship sitting for the pope's holiness, because of a premunire, and the word of God as he termeth it; I think good somewhat to say, that all may see how he runneth out of his race of reason into the rage of common talk, such as here I trust hath done much good. And as the king and queen's majesties will be glad to hear of your most charitable dealing with him: so will they be weary to hear the blundering of this stubborn heretic. And where he alledgeth divinity, mingling right and wrong together, he should not have been heard. For shall it be sufficient for him to alledge, the judge is not competent? Do we not see that in the common law it is not lawful for a man in Westminster-hall to refuse his judge? and shall we dispute against one that denies principal? Although there be here a great company of learned men, that know it unmeet so to do, ye have, I hear, a plain canon wherein he declareth himself convicted, ipso facto. The canon [as we have translated it into English] is this: "Let it be to their own destruction whosoever acts contrary to the apostolic decrees, let them have no place among the priests, but be put out from the holy ministry, neither be capable of holding any cure, seeing they are condemned by the holy apostolic church for their disobedience and presumption; but let them be cast out by the greater excommunication, to whom the discipline of the holy church being committed, not only ought to obey themselves, but also teach others to do so, yet will resist her divine and pontifical services, and so disobey the apostolical precepts."

He hath alledged many matters against the supremacy, but maliciously. You say the king in his realm is supreme head of the church. Well, sir, you will grant me that there was a perfect catholic church before any king was christened. Then if it were a perfect church, it must needs have a head, which must needs be before any king was member thereof; for you know Constantinus the emperor was the first christened king that ever was. And although you are (as St. Paul saith) to obey your rulers, and kings have the rule of the people, yet doth it not follow that they have the cure of souls: for if you argue from the more powerful, the head may do that which the minister cannot do; but the priest may consecrate, and the king cannot; therefore the king is not head.

It was licensed by Christ to every man to bring into the sheepfold, and to augment the flock, but not to rule, for that was only given to Peter.

And where the apostles call upon men to obey their princes, to pay tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom; they perceiving that men were bent to a kind of liberty and disobedience, were enforced to exhort them to obedience and payment of their tribute, which exhortation extendeth only to temporal matters.

And again, where you say the bishop of Rome maketh laws contrary to the laws of the realm; that is not true: for this is a maxim in the law, That which is true in a part, cannot be false in the whole.

Now as touching that monstrous talk of your conscience, that is no conscience that you profess; it is but private judgment, choice, and opinion. And as yet for all your glorious babble, you have not proved by God's laws that you ought not to answer to the pope's holiness.

The canons which be received of all Christendom compel you to answer, therefore you are bound so to do. And although this realm of late time, through such schismatics as you were, hath exiled and banished the canons, yet that cannot make for you; for you know yourself, that equal things produce equal things, nor can a part oblige the whole. Wherefore this island, being indeed but a member of the whole, could not determine against the whole. That notwithstanding the same laws, being put away by parliament, are now received again by a parliament, and have as full authority now as they had then, and they will now that you answer to the pope's holiness; therefore by the laws of this realm you are bound to answer him. Wherefore, my lord, all that this Thomas Cranmer hath brought for his defence, shall nothing prevail with you, nor take any effect. Take witness here of his stubborn contempt against the king and queen's majesties, and compel him to answer directly to such articles as we shall lay against him, and on refusal your lordship is to excommunicate him.

IINTERROG. First was objected, That Thomas Cranmer, before he entered into holy orders, married one Joan, surnamed Black, or Brown, dwelling at the sign of the Dolphin in Cambridge.

Answer. Whereunto he answered, that whether she was called Black, or Brown, he knew not, but that he married there one Joan, that he granted.

2. Interrog. That after the death of the aforesaid wife, he entered into holy orders, and after that was made archbishop by the pope.

Answer. He received (he said) a certain bull of the pope, which he delivered unto the king, and was made archbishop by him.

3. Interrog. Item, That he being in holy orders, married another woman as his second wife, named Anne.

Answer. To this he granted.

4. Interrog. Item, In the time of king Henry the Eighth, he kept the said wife secretly, and had children by her.

Answer. Hereunto he also granted, affirming that it was better for him to have his own, than to do like other priests, holding and keeping other men's wives.

5. Interrog. Item, In the time of king Edward, he brought out the said wife openly, affirming and professing publicly the same to be his wife.

Answer. He denied not but he so did, and lawfully might do the same, forasmuch as the laws of this realm did so permit him.

6. Interrog. Item, That he shamed not openly to glory himself to have had his wife in secret many years.

Answer. And though he so did (he said), there was no cause why he should be ashamed thereof.

7. Interrog. Item, That the said Thomas Cranmer falling afterward into the deep bottom of errors, did fly and refuse the authority of the church, did hold and follow the heresy concerning the sacrament of the altar, and also did compile, and cause to be set abroad divers books.

Answer. Whereunto when the names of the books were recited to him, he denied not such books which he was the author of. As touching the treatise of Peter Martyr upon the sacrament, he denied that he ever saw it before it was abroad, yet he did approve and well like the same. As for the catechism, the book of articles, with the other book against Winchester, he granted the same to be his doings.

8. Interrog. Item, That he compelled many against their wills to subscribe to the same articles.

Answer. He exhorted, such as were willing to subscribe; but against their wills he compelled none.

9. Interrog. Item, Forasmuch as he ceased not to perpetrate enormous and inordinate crimes, he was therefore cast into the Tower, and from thence was brought to Oxford, at what time it was commonly thought that the parliament should there be held.

Answer. To this he said, that he knew no such enormous and inordinate crimes that ever he committed.

10. Interrog. Item, That in the said city of Oxford he did openly maintain his heresy, and was there convicted for the same.

Answer. He defended (he said) there the cause of the sacrament; but that he was convicted of the same, that he denied.

11. Interrog. Item, When he persevered still in the same, he was by the public censure of the university pronounced an heretic, and his book heretical.

Answer. That he was so denounced he denied not, but that he was an heretic, or his books heretical, that he denied.

12. Interrog. Item, That he was and is notoriously infamed with the note of schism, as one who not only receded himself from the catholic church and see of Rome, but also moved the king and subjects of this realm to the same.

Answer. As touching the receding, that he well granted; but that receding or departing (said he) was only from the see of Rome, and had in it no manner of any schism.

13. Interrog. Item, That he had been twice sworn to the pope; and with that Dr. Martin brought out the instrument of the public notary, wherein was contained his protestation made when he should be consecrated, asking if he had any thing else protested.

Answer. Whereunto he answered, that he did nothing but by the laws of the realm.

14. Interrog. Item, That he, the said archbishop of Canterbury, did not only offend in the premises, but also in taking upon him the authority of the see of Rome, in that without leave or licence from the said see, he consecrated bishops and priests.

Answer. He granted that he did execute such things as were wont to be referred to the pope, at whatever time it was permitted him by the public laws and determination of the realm.

15. Interrog. Item, That when the whole realm had subscribed to the authority of the pope, he only persisted in his error.

Answer. That he did not admit the pope's authority, he confessed to be true. But that he erred in the same, that he denied.

16. Interrog. Item, That all and singular the premises be true.

Answer. That likewise he granted, excepting those things whereunto he had objected.

The Oration of Bishop Brooks, in closing up his Examinations against Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury.

MR. Cranmer, (I cannot otherwise term you, considering your obstinacy) I am right sorry, I am right heartily sorry to hear such words escape your mouth so unadvisedly. I had conceived a right good hope of your amendment. I supposed that this obstinacy of your's came not of a vain-glory, but rather of a corrupt conscience, which was the occasion that I hoped so well of your return. But now I perceive by your foolish babble that it is far otherwise. You are so puffed up with vain-glory, there is such a notorious mark of heresy crept into your conscience, that I am clean void of hope, and my hope is turned into perdition. Who can save what will be lost? God would have you to be saved, and you refuse it. Thy perdition is only upon thyself, O Israel; only in me is thy salvation, saith the Lord by the prophet. You have uttered such erroneous talk, with such open malice against the pope's holiness, with such open lying against the church of Rome, with such open blasphemy against the sacrament of the altar, that no mouth could have expressed more maliciously, more lyingly, more blasphemously.

To reason with you, although I would of myself to satisfy this audience, yet may I not by our commission, neither can I find how I may do it with the scriptures: for the apostle doth command, that such a one should not only not be talked with, but also shunned and avoided; saying, An heretical person after once or twice conferring, shun, knowing that he is perverse and firmeth, being of his own judgment condemned. You have been conferred with not once nor twice, but oftentimes; you have often been lovingly admonished, you have often been secretly disputed with. And the last year in the open school, in open disputations, you have been openly convicted, you have been openly driven out of the school with hisses: your book which you brag you wrote seven years ago, and no man answered it, Marcus Antonius hath sufficiently detected and confuted, and yet you still persist in your wonted heresy.

Wherefore being so often admonished, conferred with, and convicted, if you deny you are the man whom the apostle noteth, hear then what Origen saith, who wrote above 1300 years ago, and interpreteth the saying of the apostle in this wise, in Apologia Pamphili: "All those ought to be esteemed heretics, who professing to believe in Christ, judge otherwise of his truth, than the ecclesiastical tradition." Even now you have professed a kind of christianity and holiness unto us, for at your beginning you fell down upon your knees, and said the Lord's prayer (God knows like an hypocrite), and then standing upon your feet, you rehearsed the articles of your faith, but to what end I pray you, but to cloak that inward heresy rooted in you, that you might blind the poor, simple, and unlearned people's eyes? For what will they say or think, if they do not thus say? Good Lord, what mean these men to say that he is an heretic, heretic, they are deceived, this is a good christian, he believeth as we believe.

But is this sufficient to escape the name of an heretic? To the simple and unlearned it is sufficient, but for you that have professed a greater knowledge and higher doctrine, it is not enough to recite your belief.

Nevertheless, although I do not intend to reason with you, but to give you up as an object and an out-cast from God's favour, yet because you have uttered, to the annoying of the people, such pestilent heresies as may do harm among the rude and unlearned, I think proper to say something herein.

And first (as it becometh every man to purge himself first before he enter with any other) where you accuse me of an oath made against the bishop of Rome, I confess it, and deny it not; and therefore do say with the rest of this realm, good and catholic men, the saying of the prophet, "We have sinned with our fathers, we have done unjustly and wickedly. The sins of my youth, and my ignorances, O Lord, do not remember." I was then a young man, and as young a scholar here in the university.

I knew not then what an oath did mean, and yet to say the truth, I did it compelled, compelled I say by you, Mr. Cranmer; and here were you the author and cause of my perjury, and are to be blamed, and not I. Now where you say I made two oaths, the one contrary to the other, it is not so, for the oath I made to the pope's holiness appertaineth only to spiritual things; the other oath that I made to the king pertaineth only to temporal things; that is to say, that I do acknowledge all my temporal livings to proceed only from the king, and from none else. But all men may see, as you agree in this, so you agree in the rest of your opinions.

Now, sir, as concerning the supremacy which is only due to the see of Rome, a word or two. Although there be a number of places which do confirm that Christ appointed Peter head of the church, yet this is a most evident place. When Christ demanded of his apostles whom men called him, they answered, some Elias, some a prophet, &c. But Christ replied unto Peter and said, Whom sayest thou, Peter, that I am? Peter answered, Thou art Christ the Son of God: and Christ replied, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church. The doctors interpreting this place, Upon this rock, expound it thus, Not only on the faith of Peter, but upon Peter himself.

Again, where Christ demanded of Peter, being amongst the rest of his apostles, three times over, Peter, lovest thou me? he gave him charge over his sheep, Feed my sheep, feed my lambs. For as in the old law were appointed two heads over the people of Israel, Moses and Aaron; Moses as chief, and Aaron next head under him; so in the new law there were two heads of the church, which were Christ and Peter.

Now as touching the pope's laws, where you say they are contrary, because the service which should be (as you say) in English, is in Latin; I answer, Whosoever will take the pains to peruse the fourteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, shall find, that his meaning is concerning preaching, and by the way only of praying.

Again, where you say, that the pope's holiness doth take away one part of the sacrament from the lay-men, and Christ would have it under both, you can say no more but this, Drink ye all of this. And what followeth, And all drank thereof. Now if a man would be so froward with you, he might say that Christ gave it only to his disciples, in whose places succeeded priests, and not lay-men.

And admit that Christ commanded it to be received under both kinds, yet the church hath authority to change that, as well as others. It was a precept that the sacrament should be administered after supper, the church hath altered it, and commanded it to be received fasting. And where Christ did break the bread, we receive the whole host. Christ administered sitting at the table, we standing at the altar.

If then the church may change things that are so expressed in the scriptures, she may also change the form of receiving of lay-men under both kinds.

But why would you have it under both kinds, I pray you else, but only to pervert and contradict the commandment of the church? For when you had it under both kinds, you believed in neither. And we having but one, believe both kinds.

And thus the prelate ended his worshipful tale, After whom Dr. Story took the matter, and thus inferred in words, as followeth.

Mr. Cranmer, you have made a goodly process concerning your heretical oath made to the king, but you forget your oath made to the see apostolic. As concerning your oath made to the king, if you made it to him only, it took an end by his death, and so it is released; if you made it to his successors, well, sir, the true successors have the empire, and they will you to dissolve the same, and become a member of Christ's church again, and it standeth well with charity.

To this the archbishop answered again, but that answer was suppressed; he then returns to the words of Dr. Story, who imperiously turning his speech again to the archbishop, said as follows:

Hold your peace, sir, and so it shall right well become you, considering that I gave you licence before to say your fancy. Your oath was no oath: for it lacked the three points of an oath, that is to say, judgment, righteousness, and truth.

Then Dr. Story immediately called for witnesses to be produced, who should be sworn upon the book, to utter and declare the next day what they knew, or could remember to be inferred against Dr. Cranmer's heresy. The names of the witnesses are these following:

Dr. Marshall, commissary, and dean of Christ-church.

Dr. Smith, under commissary,

Dr. Tresham.

Mr. Curtop,

After the depositions of which witnesses being taken, Dr. Story admonished the archbishop, permitting him to make his exceptions, if he thought any of the said witnesses were to be refused. The archbishop refused them all, as being men perjured, and not in christian religion. For if to swear, said he, against the pope, were unlawful, they should rather have given their lives, than their oath. But if it were lawful, then they are perjured, to defend him whom they forswore before. Nevertheless, this answer of the archbishop being lightly regarded, as little to the purpose appertaining, he was commanded again to the place from whence he came. Who at his departing out, like as at his first coming in, paid low obedience to Dr. Martin and Dr. Story, the queen's commissioners, but took no notice of the bishop of Gloucester, the pope's delegate; upon which all the others rose up, and departed every one to his own.

The answers being recited by report of a papist, seem to be partially handled, we shall now more amply declare what speech the archbishop used for himself, by the faithful relation of others, who were present.

MY lord, you have very learnedly and eloquently, in your oration, put me in remembrance of many things touching myself, wherein I do not mean to spend the time in answering of them. I acknowledge God's goodness to me in all his gifts, and thank him as heartily for this state wherein I find myself now, as ever I did for the time of my prosperity; and it is not the loss of my promotions that grieveth me. The greatest grief I have ever had in all my life is to see the king and queen's majesties, by their proctors, here to become my accusers, and that in their own realm and country, before a foreign power.

Alas! what hath the pope to do in England; whose jurisdiction is so far different from the jurisdiction of this realm, that it is impossible to be true to the one, and true to the other. The laws also are so diverse, that whosoever sweareth to both, must needs incur perjury to the one. On the day of the coronation, the queen took a solemn oath to observe all the laws and liberties of this realm of England, and also took an oath to the bishop of Rome, promising to maintain that see. The state of England being so repugnant to the supremacy of the pope, it is impossible but she must needs be forsworn in the one. Wherein if her grace had been faithfully advertised by her counsel, then surely she would never have done it.

The laws of this realm are, that the king of England is supreme governor of all his countries and dominions; and that he holdeth his crown and sceptre of himself, by the ancient laws, customs, and descents of the kings of the realm, and of none other; that all bishops and priests offending in cases of felony or treason, are to be judged and tried by the laws and customs of the realm; that whosoever hindereth the execution or proceeding of the laws of England for any other foreign laws ecclesiastical or temporal, incurreth the danger of a premunire.

These things and many more examples he alledged, which (he said) stirred him, that he could not give his consent to the receiving of such an enemy into the realm, subverting its dignity and ancient liberties.

And as for heresy and schism, wherewith he was charged, he protested, that he knew none that he maintained. But if that were an heresy to deny the pope's authority, and the religion which the see of Rome hath published to the world these latter years, then all the ancient fathers of the primitive church, the apostles, and Christ himself taught heresy; and he desired all then present to bear him witness, that he took the traditions and religion of that usurping prelate to be most erroneous, false, and against the doctrine of the whole scripture.

For it was most evident that he had advanced himself above all emperors and kings of the world, whom he affirmeth to hold their estates and empires of him, as of their chief, and to be at his commandment to depose and erect at his good will and pleasure; setting his feet on the emperor's neck, having others to hold his stirrup; others he had displaced and removed from their empires and seats royal: and not content herewithal, more insolent than Lucifer, he hath occupied the highest place in this world, above kings and princes, and hath further presumed to sit in the seat of Almighty God, which is the conscience of man.

He hath brought in gods of his own framing, and invented a new religion, full of gain and lucre, contrary to the doctrine of the holy scripture, only for the maintaining of his kingdom,

This enemy of God and of our redemption, is so evidently pointed out in the scriptures by such manifest signs and tokens, which all so clearly appear in him, that except a man will shut his eyes and heart against the light, he cannot but know him: and therefore, for my part, I will never give my consent to the receiving of him into this church of England. While he thus made his answer, ye heard before how Dr. Martin and Dr. Story interrupted him divers times with blasphemous talk, and would fain have had the bishop of Gloucester to put him to silence: who notwithstanding did not, but suffered him to end his tale at full. After this you heard also how they proceeded to examine him of divers articles, whereof the chief was, that at the time of being created archbishop of Canterbury, he was sworn to the pope, and had his institution and induction from him, and then promised to maintain the authority of that see, and therefore was perjured: wherefore he should rather stick to his first oath, and return to his old fold again, than to continue obstinate in an oath forced in time of schism.

To that he answered, saving his protestation, (which term he used before all his answers,) That at such time archbishop Warham died, he was ambassador in Germany for the king.

He then stated what measures he had taken to avoid the promotion intended for him, and delayed his return home for half a year; that he interested his friends, after that return, to request some smaller living for him, and by every proper means he could devise, to shift off the appointment to so weighty a charge. And when the king would have no denial, he declared that he neither could or would ever receive it at the pope's hands; on which it was answered, that he might do it by way of protestation and so one to be sent to Rome, who might take the oath, and do every thing in his name. The archbishop then said, that whoever did this, should do it super animam suam, and that he himself did not acknowledge the pope's authority any further than as it agreed with the express word of God; and that it might at all times be lawful for him to controvert his errors. This protestation he had caused to be enrolled.

They objected to him also that he was married, which he confessed. Whereunto Dr. Martin said, that his children were bondmen to the see of Canterbury. At which saying the archbishop smiled, and asked him, if a priest at his benefice kept a concubine, and had by her bastards, whether they were bondmen to the benefice or no, saying, I trust you will make my children's causes no worse.

A number of other trifling and foolish objections were made, with a repetition whereof I thought not to trouble the reader. Thus after they had received his answers to all their objections, they cited him (as is aforesaid) to appear at Rome within fourscore days, to make there his personal answers.

On Dr. Martin's quibbling objections about the supreme head of the church, the archbishop observed that Christ was supreme head of the universal church, but the king of the people of England, ecclesiastical as well as civil. He was afterwards cited to appear at Rome within fourscore days, there to make his personal answers; but, instead of being sent there by the king and queen, to which he assented, he was carried back to prison, and there confined, and within twenty days after a letter executory was sent from the pope to degrade and deprive him, contrary to all law and justice, and at the end of the fourscore years he was declared contumacious, and for such absence condemned to die.

A definitive letter or sentence from the pope of the 1st of January, was received in England, appointing Dr. Thirlby, bishop of Ely, and Dr. Bonner, bishop of London, commissioners to deprive and degrade him; and afterwards to excommunicate him; for which purpose the archbishop was ordered to appear on the 14th of February. Of the character of the former, it ought to be remarked, that the archbishop had ever been his principal supporter, and most liberal benefactor; with the latter, the reader has been too well acquainted already. On the day appointed, they read their commission, reciting the causes which had produced it, falsely and unblushingly asserting that witnesses had been heard on his behalf, and that he wanted nothing to his necessary defence; after which they invested him in canvas robes, with a mitre and pall, in solemn mockery, when Bonner thought fit in these taunting words to address him:

This is the man that hath ever despised the pope's holiness, and now is to be judged by him. This is the man that hath pulled down so many churches, and now is come to be judged in a church. This is the man that contemned the blessed sacrament of the altar, and now is come to be condemned before that blessed sacrament hanging over the altar. This is the man that like Lucifer sat in the place of Christ upon an altar to judge others, and now is come before an altar to be judged himself.

Thus Bonner went on in his rhetorical repetition, lying and railing against the archbishop, beginning every sentence with, This is the man, this is the man, till at length every man grew tired of his unmannerly usage of him in that time and place; insomuch that the bishop of of divers times pulled him by the sleeve to make an end, and said to him afterward when they went to dinner, that he had broken promise with him; for he had intreated him earnestly to use him with reverence.

After all this done and finished, they began then to bustle toward his degrading, and first to take from him his crozier-staff out of his hands, which he held fast, and refused to deliver, and withal imitating the example of Martin Luther, pulled an appeal out of his left sleeve under the wrist, which he there and then delivered unto them, saying, I appeal to the next general council; and herein I have comprehended my cause and the form of it, which I desire may be admitted; and prayed divers of the standers-by, by name, to be witnesses, and especially Mr. Curtop, to whom he spake twice.

The copy of which appellation, because it was not printed before, I thought here to exhibit, ad rei memoriam, as in form here followeth.

The TENOR of the APPEAL of the Archbishop of CANTERBURY from the POPE to the next GENERAL COUNCIL.

IN the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

First, my plain protestation made, that I intend to speak nothing against one holy catholic and apostolical church, or the authority thereof, (which authority I have in great reverence, and to whom my mind is in all things to obey) and if any thing peradventure, either by slipperiness of tongue, or by indignation of abuses, or else by the provocation of mine adversaries, be spoken or done otherwise than well, or not with such reverence as becometh me, I am most ready to amend it.

Although the bishop of Rome (whom they call pope) beareth the room of Christ in earth, and hath authority of God, yet by that power or authority he is not become unfinnable, neither hath he received that power to destroy, but to edify the congregation. Therefore if he shall command any thing that is not right to be done, he ought to take it patiently, and in good part, in case he be not therein obeyed. And he must not be obeyed, if he command any thing against the precepts of God: no, rather he may lawfully be resisted, even as Paul withstood Peter. And if he, being aided by the help of princes, deceived perchance by false suggestion, or with evil counsel, cannot be resisted, but the remedies of withstanding him be taken away, there is nevertheless one remedy of appealing, (which no prince can take away) uttered by the law of nature: forasmuch as it is a certain defence, which is meet for every body by the law of God, of nature, and of man.

And whereas the laws do permit a man to appeal, not only from the griefs and injuries done, but also from such as shall be done hereafter, or threatened to be done, insomuch that the inferior cannot make laws of not appealing to a superior power; and since it is openly enough confessed, that a holy general council, lawfully gathered together in the Holy Ghost, and representing the holy catholic church, is above the pope, especially in matters concerning faith; that he cannot make decrees that men shall not appeal from him to a general council: therefore I, Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, or in time past ruler of the metropolitical church of Canterbury, doctor in divinity, do say and publish before you the public notary, and witnesses here present, with mind and intent to challenge and appeal from the persons and griefs underneath written, and to proffer myself in place and time convenient and meet, to prove the articles that follow. And I openly confess, that I would lawfully have published them before this day, if I might have had either liberty to come abroad myself, or license of a notary and witnesses. But further than I am able to do, I know well is not required of the laws.

1. First, I say and publish, that James by the mercy of God, priest, called Cardinal of the Pir, and of the title of our lady in the church of Rome, judge and commissary specially deputed of our most holy lord the pope, (as he affirmed) caused me to be cited to Rome, there to appear fourscore days after the citation served on me, to make answer to certain articles touching the peril of my state and life: and whereas I was kept in prison with most strait ward, so that I could in no wise be suffered to go to Rome, nor to come out of prison (and in so grievous causes concerning state and life, no man is bound to send a proctor); and though I would ever so fain send my proctor, yet by reason of poverty I am not able (for all that ever I had, wherewith I should bear my proctor's costs and charges, is quite taken from me); nevertheless the most reverend cardinal aforesaid doth sore threaten me, that whether I shall appear or not, he will nevertheless yet proceed in judgment against me; wherein I feel myself so grieved, that nothing can be imagined more mischievous or further from reason.

2. Secondly, The reverend father James Brooks, by the mercy of God, bishop of Gloucester, judge and under-deputy (as he affirmeth) of the most reverend cardinal, caused me to be cited at Oxford, (where I was then kept in prison) to answer to certain articles, concerning the danger of my state and life. And when I being unlearned and ignorant in the laws, desired counsel of the learned in the laws, that thing was most unrighteously denied me, contrary to the equity of all laws both of God and man. Wherein again I feel myself most wrongfully grieved.

3. And when I refused the said bishop of Gloucester to be my judge, for most just causes, which I then declared, he nevertheless went on still, and made process against me, contrary to the rule of the laws of appealing, which say, A judge that is refused ought not to proceed in the cause, but to leave off. And when he had required of me answers to certain articles, I refused to make him any answer: I said I would gladly make answer to the most renowned king and queen's deputies or attornies then present, with this condition notwithstanding, that mine should be extrajudicial, and that was permitted me. And with this my protestation made and admitted, I made answer; but my answer was sudden and unprovided for: and therefore I desired to have a copy of mine answers, that I might add to, take away, change, and amend them; and this was also permitted me. Nevertheless, contrary to his promise made unto me, no respect had to my protestation, nor licence given to amend mine answer, the said reverend father bishop of Gloucester (as I hear) commanded mine answers to be enacted contrary to the equity of the law. In which thing again I feel myself much grieved.

4. Furthermore, I could not, for many causes, admit the bishop of Rome's usurped authority in this realm, nor consent to it: for my solemn oath hindering me, which I made in the time of king Henry the Eighth, of most famous memory, according to the laws of England. Secondly, because I knew the authority of the bishop of Rome, which he usurpeth, to be against the crown, customs, and laws of this realm of England, insomuch, that neither the king can be crowned in this realm, without the most grievous crime of perjury, nor may bishops enjoy their bishoprics, nor judgments to be used according to the laws and customs of this realm, except by the bishop of Rome's authority, be accursed both the king and queen, the judges, writers, and executors of the laws and customs, with all that consent to them. Finally, the whole realm shall be accursed.

5. Moreover, that heinous and usurped authority of the bishop of Rome, through reservations of the bishoprics, provisions, annuities, dispensations, pardons, appellations, bulls, and other merchandize of Rome, was wont exceedingly to spoil and consume the riches and substance of this realm, all which things should follow again by recognizing and receiving of that usurped authority unto the infinite loss of this realm.

6. Finally, it is most evident by that usurped authority, not only the crown of England to be under the yoke, the laws and customs of this realm to be thrown down, and trodden under foot, but also the most holy decrees of councils, together with the precepts both of the gospel and of God.

When in times past the Sun of righteousness being risen in the world, christian religion, by the preaching of of the apostles, began to be spread very far abroad, and to flourish, insomuch that their sound went out into all the world; innumerable people, which walked in darkness, saw a great light, God's glory every where published did flourish, the only care and care of the ministers of the church was purely and sincerely to preach Christ; the people to embrace and follow Christ's doctrine. Then the church of Rome, as it were lady of the world, both was, and also was counted worthily the mother of other churches, forasmuch as then she first begat to Christ, nourished with the food of pure doctrine, did help them with their riches, succoured the oppressed, and was a sanctuary for the miserable, she rejoiced with them that rejoiced, and wept with them that wept. Then by the examples of the bishops of Rome, riches were despised, worldly glory and pomp was trodden under foot, pleasures and riot nothing regarded. Then this frail and uncertain life, being full of miseries, was laughed to scorn, whilst thro' the examples of Romish martyrs, men did every where press forward to the life to come. But afterward, when the ungraciousness of damnable ambition, never-satisfied avarice, and the horrible enormity of vices, had corrupted and taken the see of Rome, there followed every where almost the deformities of all churches, growing out of kind into the manners of the church their mother, leaving their former innocency and purity, and slipping into foul and heinous usages.

For the aforefaid and many other griefs and abuses, (which I intend to prove, and to proffer myself in time convenient to prove hereafter) since reformation of the above-mentioned abuses is not to be looked for of the bishop of Rome, neither can I hope, by reason of his wicked abuses and usurped authority, to have him an equal judge in his own cause: therefore I do challenge and appeal in these writings from the pope, having no good council, and from the above named pretences, commissions, and judges, from their citations, processses, and from all other things that have or shall follow thereupon, and from every one of them, and from all their sentences, censures, pains, and punishments of cursing, suspension, and interdicting, and from all others whatsoever their denouncings and declarations (as they pretend) of schism, of heresy, adultery, deprivation, degrading by them, or by any of them, in any manner or way attempted, done, and set forward to be attempted, to be done and to be set forward hereafter (saving always their honours and reverences) as unequal and unrighteous, most tyrannical, and violent, and from every grief to come, which shall happen to me, as well for myself as for all and every one that cleaveth to me, or will hereafter be on my side; unto a free general council, that shall hereafter lawfully be, and in a sure place, where I, or a proctor deputed by me, may freely and with safety come, and to him or them, to whom a man may by the law, privilege, custom, or otherwise, challenge and appeal.

And I desire the first, the second, and third time, instantly, more instantly, and most instantly, that I may have messengers, if there be any man that will and can give me them. And I make open promise of prosecuting this mine appellation, by the way of disannulling, abuse, inequality, and unrighteousness, or otherwise as I shall be better able: choice and liberty reserved to me, to put to, diminish, change, correct, and interpret my sayings, and to reform all things after a better fashion; saving always to me every other benefit of the law, and to them that either be, or will be on my part.

And touching my doctrine of the sacrament, and other my doctrine, of what kind soever it be, I protest that it was never my mind to write, speak, or understand any thing contrary to the most holy word of God, or else against the holy catholic church of Christ, but purely and simply to imitate and teach those things only, which I had learned of the sacred scripture, and of the holy catholic church of Christ from the beginning, and also according to the exposition of the most learned fathers and martyrs of the church.

And if any thing hath peradventure chanced other-

wife than I thought, I may err, but heretic I cannot be, forasmuch as I am ready in all things to follow the judgment of the most sacred word of God, and of the holy catholic church, desiring none other thing, than meekly and gently to be taught if any where (which God forbid) I have swerved from the truth.

And I protest and openly confess, that in all my doctrine and preaching, both of the sacrament, and of my other doctrine whatsoever it be, not only I mean and judge of those things, as the catholic church, and the most holy fathers of old, with one accord, have meant and judged, but also I would gladly use the same words that they used, and not use any other words, but to set my hand to all and singular their speeches, phrases, ways, and forms of speech, which they do use in their treatises upon the sacrament, and to keep still their interpretation. But in this thing I am only accused for an heretic, because I allow not the doctrine lately brought in of the sacrament, and because I consent not to words not accustomed in scripture, and unknown to the ancient fathers, but newly invented and brought in by men, and belonging to the destruction of souls, and overthrowing of pure and old religion. Yea, even, &c.

This appeal being put up to the bishop of Ely, he said to the archbishop, My lord, our commission is to proceed against you, omni appellatione remota, and therefore we cannot admit it.

Why (quoth the archbishop) then you do me the more wrong; for my case is not as every private man's case. The matter is immediately between the pope and me, and none otherwise: and I think no man ought to be a judge in his own cause.

Well, quoth Ely, if it may be admitted, it shall, and so received it of him. And then he began earnestly to persuade the archbishop to consider his state, and to weigh it well, while there was time to do him good, promising to become a suitor to the king and queen for him; and so protested his great love and friendship that had been between them, heartily weeping, so that for a time he could not go on with his tale. After going forward, he earnestly affirmed, that if it had not been the king and queen's commandment, whom he could not deny, else on worldly advantages should have made him to have done it; concluding that to be one of the sorrowfullest things that ever happened unto him. The archbishop gently seeming to comfort him, said, he was very well content withal: and so they proceeded to his degradation; the perfect form whereof, with all the rites and ceremonies thereunto appertaining, taken out of the pope's pontifical, we have already described.

To be short, when they came to take off his pall, (which is a solemn vesture only belonging to an archbishop) then said he, Which of you hath a pall, to take off my pall? which imported as much as they being his inferiors, could not degrade him. Whereunto one of them answered, confessing that as they were but bishops they were inferior to him, and therefore not competent judges; but, as being the pope's delegates, they had authority to take his pall, which accordingly they did; and, so proceeding, took every thing in order from him, as it was put on. Then a barber clipped his hair round about, and the bishop scraped the tops of his fingers where he had been anointed, wherein bishop Bonner behaved himself as roughly and unmannerly as the other bishop was to him soft and gentle. Whilst they were thus doing, All this, quoth the archbishop, needed not; I had myself done with this gear long ago. Last of all they stripped him out of his gown into a jacket, and put upon him a poor yeoman beadle's gown, full bare and nearly worn, and as ill-shaped as one might probably see, and a townsman's cap on his head, and so delivered him to the secular power.

After this pageant of degradation, and all was finished, then spake lord Bonner, saying to him, Now are you no lord any more: and so whenever he spake to the people of him, (as he was continually barking against him) he ever used this term, This gentleman here, &c.

And thus, with great compassion and pity of every man, man, in this evil favoured gown was he carried to prison. Whom there followed a gentleman of Gloucestershire, with the archbishop's own gown, who standing by, and being thought to be toward one of the bishops, had it delivered unto him; who by the way talking with him, said, the bishop of Ely protested his friendship with tears. Yet (said he) he might have used a great deal more friendship towards me, and never have been worse thought on, for I have well deserved it: and going up into the prison with him, asked him if he would drink. He answered him, saying, if he had a piece of salt fish, that he had a better will to eat: for he had been that day somewhat troubled with this matter, and had eaten little, but now that it is past, my heart (said he) is well quieted. Whereupon the gentleman said, he would give him money with all his heart, for he was able to do it. But he being doubtful of the law, and fearing Mr. Farmer's case, durst therefore give him nothing, but gave money to the bailiffs that stood by, and said that if they were good men they would bestow it on him (for my lord of Canterbury had not one penny in his purse to help him), and so left him, my lord bidding him earnestly farewell, commending himself to his prayers and all his friends. That night this gentleman was detained by Bonner and Ely, for giving him this money: and but for the help of his friends, he had been sent up to the council. Such was the cruelty and iniquity of the time; that men could not do good without punishment.

Mean time, while the archbishop was thus remaining in durance (whom they had kept now in prison almost the space of three years), the doctors and divines of Oxford busied themselves all that ever they could about Dr. Cranmer, to persuade him to recant, endeavouring by all the crafty practices and allurements they could invent to bring their purpose to pass. And to the intent they might win him the more easily, they entertained him in the dean of Christ-church's house, in the said university, where he lacked no delicate fare, played at bowls, had his pleasure for walking, and all other things that might bring him from Christ. And besides all this, they secretly suborned certain men, who when they could not prevail by arguments and disputation, should by intreaty and fair promises, or any other means, allure him to a recantation, perceiving otherwise what a great wound they should receive, if the archbishop had stood steadfast in this sentence; and again on the other side, what great profit they should get, if he, as the principal standard-bearer, should be overthrown. By reason whereof the wily priests flocked about him, with threatening, flattering, intreating and promising, and all other means; especially Henry Sydal, and Friar John de Villa Garcina, a Spaniard, to the end to drive him, to the uttermost of their possibility, from his former sentence to recantation.

First, they set forth how acceptable it would be both to the king and queen, and especially how gainful to him, and for his soul's health the same should be. They added moreover, how the council and the noblemen bare him good will. They put him in hope, that he should not only have his life, but also be restored to his ancient dignity, saying, it was but a small matter, and so easy that they required him to do, only that he would subscribe to a few words with his own hand; which if he did, there should be nothing in the realm that the queen would not easily grant him, whether he would have riches or dignity, or else if he had rather live a private life in quiet rest, in whatsoever place he liked, without all public ministry, only that he would set his name in two words to a little leaf of paper; but if he refused, there was no hope of health and pardon: for the queen was so purposed that she should have Cranmer a catholic, or else no Cranmer. Therefore he should chuse whether he thought it better to end his life shortly in the flames and fire-brands now ready to be kindled, than with much honour to prolong his life until the course of nature did call him: for there was no middle way.

Moreover, they exhorted him that he would look to his wealth, his estimation and quietness, saying, that he was not so old, but that many years yet remained in this his so lusty age; and if he would not do it in respect of the queen, yet he should do it for respect of his life, and not suffer that other men should be more careful for his health than he was himself; saying, that this was agreeable to his learning and notable virtues: which being adjoined with his life would be profitable both to himself and to many others: but being extinct by death, should be fruitful to no man: that he should take heed that he went not too far; yet there was time enough to restore all things safe, and nothing wanted, if he wanted not to himself. Therefore they would have him lay hold upon the occasion of his health while it was offered, lest if he would not refuse it, he might hereafter seek it when he could not have it.

Finally, if the desire of life did nothing move him, yet he should remember that to die is grievous in all ages, and especially in these his years and flower of dignity it were more grievous: but to die in the fire and such torments is most grievous of all. With these and like provocations these fair flatterers ceased not to solicit and urge him, using all possible means they could to draw him to their side; whose force his manly constancy did a great while resist. But at last when they made no end of calling and crying upon him, the archbishop being overcome, whether through their importunity, or by his own imbecility, or of what mind I cannot tell, at length gave his hand.

It might be supposed that it was done for the hope of life, and better days to come. But as we may since perceive by a letter of his sent to a lawyer, the greatest cause why he desired his time to be delayed, was that he would make an end of Marcus Antonius, which he had already begun: but howsoever it was plain to be against his conscience. The form of which recantation, made by the friars and doctors, whereto he subscribed, was this:

The COPY and WORDS of Dr. CRANMER's RECONTATION.

I THOMAS CRANMER, late archbishop of Canterbury, do renounce, abhor, and detest, all manner of heresies and errors of Luther and Zuinglius, and all other teachings which are contrary to sound and true doctrine. And I believe most constantly in my heart, and with my mouth I confess one holy and catholic church visible, without which there is no salvation; and thereof I acknowledge the bishop of Rome to be supreme head in earth, whom I acknowledge to be the highest bishop and pope, and Christ's vicar, unto whom all christian people ought to be subject.

And as concerning the sacraments, I believe and worship in the sacrament of the altar the very body and blood of Christ, being contained most truly under the forms of bread and wine; the bread through the mighty power of God being turned into the body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and the wine into his blood.

And in the other six sacraments, also (like as in this) I believe and hold as the universal church holdeth, and the church of Rome judgeth and determineth.

Furthermore, I believe that there is a place of purgatory, where souls departed be punished for a time, for whom the church doth godly and wholesomely pray, like as it doth honour saints and make prayers to them.

Finally, in all things I profess, that I do not otherwise believe, than the catholic church and church of Rome holdeth and teacheth. I am sorry that ever I held or thought otherwise. And I beseech Almighty God, that of his mercy he will vouchsafe to forgive me, whatsoever I have offended against God or his church, and also I desire and beseech all christian people to pray for me.

And all such as have been deceived either by mine example or doctrine, I require them by the blood of Jesus

Jesus Christ, that they will return to the unity of the church, that we may be all of one mind, without schism or division.

And to conclude, as I submit myself to the catholic church of Christ, and to the supreme head thereof, so I submit myself unto the most excellent majesties of Philip and Mary, king and queen of this realm of England, &c. and to all other their laws and ordinances, being ready always as a faithful subject ever to obey them. And God is my witness, that I have not done this for favour or fear of any person, but willingly and of mine own conscience, as to the instruction of others.

This recantation of the archbishop was not so soon conceived, but the doctors and prelates without delay caused the same to be imprinted, and set abroad in all men's hands. Whereunto for better credit, first was added the name of Thomas Cranmer, with a solemn subscription, then followed the witnesses of his recantation, Henry Sydal, and friar John de Villa Garcina. All this time Cranmer had no certain assurance of his life, although the same was faithfully promised to him by the doctors: but after they had their purpose, the rest they committed to all adventure, as became men of that religion to do. The queen, having now gotten a time to revenge her old grief, received his recantation very gladly: but of her purpose to put him to death she would nothing relent.

Now was Dr. Cranmer in a miserable case, having neither inwardly any quietness in his own conscience, nor yet outwardly any help in his adversaries.

Besides this, on the one side was praise, on the other side scorn, on both sides danger, so that he could neither die honestly, nor yet honestly live. And whereas he sought profit, he fell into double disprofit, that neither with good men he could avoid secret shame, nor yet with evil men the note of dissimulation.

In the mean time while these things were doing (as I said) in the prison amongst the doctors, the queen taking secret council how to dispatch Cranmer out of the way (who as yet knew not of her secret hate, and not expecting death) appointed Dr. Cole, and secretly gave him in commandment, that against the 21st of March he should prepare a funeral sermon for Cranmer's burning, and so instructing him orderly and diligently of her will and pleasure in that behalf, sent him away.

Soon after the lord Williams, of Tame, and the lord Shandois, sir Thomas Bridges, and sir John Brown, were sent for, with other worshipful men and justices, commanded in the queen's name to be at Oxford on the same day, with their servants and retinue, lest Cranmer's death should raise there any tumult.

Dr. Cole having this lesson given him before, and charged by her commandment, returned to Oxford, ready to play his part; who as the day of execution drew near, even the day before, came into the prison to Dr. Cranmer, to try whether he abode in the catholic faith wherein before he had left him. To whom, when Cranmer had answered, that by God's grace he would be daily more confirm'd in the catholic faith; Cole departing for that time, the next day following repaired to the archbishop again, giving no signification as yet of his death that was prepared. And therefore in the morning, which was the 21st day of March, appointed for Cranmer's execution, the said Cole coming to him, asked him if he had any money, to whom when he had answered that he had none, he delivered fifteen crowns to give to the poor to whom he would: and so exhorting him as much as he could to constancy in faith, departed thence about his business, as to his sermon appertained.

By this partly, and other like arguments, the archbishop began more and more to surmise what they were about. Then because the day was not far spent, and the lords and knights that were looked for were not yet come, there came to him the Spanish friar, witness of his recantation, bringing a paper with articles, which Cranmer should openly profess in his recantation before the people, earnestly desiring him that he would write the said instrument with the articles with his own hand, and sign it with his name: which when he had done, the said friar desired that he would write another copy thereof which should remain with him, and that he did also. But yet the archbishop being not ignorant whereunto their secret devices tended, and thinking that the time was at hand in which he could no longer dissemble the profession of his faith with Christ's people, he put his prayer and his exhortation written in another paper secretly into his bosom, which he intended to recite to the people before he should make the last profession of his faith, fearing lest if they heard the confession of his faith first, they would not afterwards have suffered him to exhort the people.

Soon after, about nine o'clock, the lord Williams, sir Thomas Bridges, sir John Brown, and the other justices, with certain other noblemen, that were sent of the queen's council, came to Oxford with a great train of waiting men. Also of the other multitude on every side (as is wont in such a matter) was made a great concourse, and greater expectation: for first of all, they that were of the pope's side were in great hope that day to hear something of Cranmer that should establish the vanity of their opinion: the other part, who were endued with a better mind, could not yet doubt, that he who by continued study and labour for so many years, had set forth the doctrine of the gospel, either would or could now in the last act of his life forsake his part. Briefly, as every man's will inclined, either to this part or to that, so according to the diversity of the desires, every man wished and hoped for. And yet because in an uncertain thing the certainty could be known of none what would be the end; all their minds were hanging between hope and doubt. So that the greater the expectation was in so doubtful a matter, the more was the multitude that was gathered thither to hear and behold.

During this great expectation, Dr. Cranmer at length came from the prison of Bocardo unto St. Mary's church, because it was a foul and rainy day, the chief church in the university, in this order. The mayor went before, next him the aldermen in their place and degree; after them was Cranmer brought between two friars, which mumbling to and fro certain psalms in the streets, answered one another until they came to the church door, and there they began the song of Simeon, Nunc dimittis; and entering into the church, the psalm-singing friars brought him to his standing, and there left him. There was a stage set over-against the pulpit, of a mean height from the ground, where Cranmer had his standing, waiting until Dr. Cole made ready for his sermon.

The lamentable case and sight of that man was a sorrowful spectacle to all christian eyes that beheld him. He that lately was archbishop, metropolitan, and primate of all England, and the king's privy counsellor, being now in a bare and ragged gown, and ill favouredly clothed, with an old square cap, exposed to the contempt of all men, did admonish men not only of his own calamity, but also of their state and fortune. For who would not pity his case, and might not fear his own chance, to see such a prelate, so grave a counsellor, and of so long continued honour, after so many dignities, in his old years to be deprived of his estate, adjudged to die, and in so painful a death to end his life, and now presently from such fresh ornaments, to descend to such vile and ragged apparel?

In this habit, when he had stood a good space upon the stage, turning to a pillar near adjoining thereunto, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and prayed unto God once or twice, till at length Dr. Cole coming into the pulpit, and beginning his sermon, entered first into mention of Tobias and Zachary; whom after he had praised in the beginning of his sermon for their perseverance in the true worshipping of God, he then divided his whole sermon into three parts (according to the solemn custom of the schools), intending to speak first of the mercy of God: secondly, of his justice to be shewed: and last of all, how the prince's secrets are not to be opened. And proceeding a little from the begin-beginning, he took occasion by and by to turn his tale to Cranmer, and with many hot words reprov'd him, that he being one endued with the favour and feeling of wholesome and catholic doctrine, fell into a contrary opinion of pernicious error; which he had not only defended by writings, and all his power, but also allured other men to do the like, with great liberality of gifts, as it were appointing rewards for error; and after he had allured them, by all means did cherish them.

It were too long to repeat all things, that in long order were pronounced. The sum of his tripartite declamation was, that he said God's mercy was so tempered with his justice, that he did not altogether require punishment according to the merits of offenders, nor yet sometimes suffered the same to go altogether unpunished, yea, though they had repented. As in David, who when he was bidden to chuse of three kinds of punishment which he would, and he had chosen pestilence for three days; the Lord forgave him half the time, but did not release all: and that the same thing came to pass in him also, to whom although pardon and reconciliation was due according to the canons, seeing he repented of his errors, yet there were causes why the queen and the council at this time judged him to death; of which, lest he should marvel too much, he should hear some.

First, That being a traitor, he had dissolved the lawful matrimony between the king and queen, her father and mother: besides the driving out of the pope's authority, while he was metropolitan.

Secondly, That he had been an heretic, from whom as from an author and only fountain, all heretical doctrine and schismatical opinion, that so many years have prevailed in England, did first rise and spring; of which he had not been a secret favourer only, but also a most earnest defender even to the end of his life, sowing them abroad by writings and arguments, privately and openly, not without great ruin and decay of the catholic church.

And further, it seemed meet, according to the law of equality, that as the death of the late duke of Northumberland, made even with Thomas More, chancellor, that died for the church, so there should be one that should make even with Fisher, of Rochester: and because that Ridley, Hooper, and Farrar, were not able to make even with that man, it seemed that Cranmer should be joined to them to fill up their part of equality.

Besides these, there were other just and weighty causes, which appeared to the queen and council, which was not meet at that time to be opened to the common people.

After this, turning his tale to the hearers, he bid all men beware by this man's example, that among men nothing is so high that can promise itself safety on the earth, and that God's vengeance is equally stretched against all men and spareth none: therefore they should beware and learn to fear their prince. And seeing the queen's majesty would not spare so notable a man as this, much less in the like cause would she spare other men, that no man should think to make thereby any defence of his error, either in riches or any kind of authority. They had now an example to teach them all, by whose calamity every man might consider his own fortune; who from the top of dignity, none being more honourable than he in the whole realm, and next the king, was fallen into such great misery, as they might see, being a person of such high degree, sometime one of the chief prelates of the church, and an archbishop, the chief of the council, the second person in the realm a long time, a man thought in great assurance, having a king on his side; notwithstanding all his authority and defence, to be debased from high estate to a low degree, of a counsellor to become a caitiff, and to be set in so wretched a state, that the poorest wretch would not change condition with him; briefly so heaped with misery on all sides, that neither was left in him any hope of better fortune, nor place for worse.

The latter part of his sermon he converted to the archbishop, whom he comforted and encouraged to take his death well, by many places of scripture, as with these and such like; bidding him not to mistrust, but he should incontinently receive what the thief did, to whom Christ said, "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise:" and out of St. Paul he armed him against the terror of fire by this, "The Lord is faithful, which will not suffer you to be tempted above your strength:" by the example of the three children, to whom God made the flame to seem like a pleasant dew; adding also the rejoicing of St. Andrew on his cross, the patience of St. Laurence in the fire, assuring him, that God, if he called on him, and to such as die in his faith, either would abate the fury of the flame, or give him strength to abide it.

He glorified God much in his conversion, because it appeared to be only his work, declaring what travail and conference had been with him to convert him, and all prevailed not, till that it pleased God of his mercy to reclaim him, and call him home. In discoursing of which place, he much commended Cranmer, and qualified his former doings, thus tempering his judgment and talk of him, that all the time (said he) he flowed in riches and honour, he was unworthy of his life; and now that he might not live, he was unworthy of death. But lest he should carry with him no comfort, he would diligently labour (he said), and also did promise in the name of all the priests that were present, that immediately after his death there should be dirges, masses, and funerals executed for him in all the churches of Oxford, for the succour of his soul.

All this time with what great grief of mind Cranmer stood hearing this sermon, the outward shews of his body and countenance did better express, than any man can declare; one while lifting up his hands and eyes unto heaven, and then again for shame letting them down to the earth. A man might have seen the very image and shape of perfect sorrow lively in him expressed. More than twenty several times the tears gushed out abundantly, dropping down marvellously from his fatherly face. They that were present do testify, that they never saw in any child more tears than came from him at that time, during the whole sermon; but especially when they recited his prayer before the people. It is marvellous what commiseration and pity moved all men's hearts, that beheld so heavy a countenance, and such abundance of tears in an old man of so reverend dignity.

After Cole had ended his sermon, he called back the people to prayers that were ready to depart. Brethren (said he) lest any man should doubt of this man's earnest conversion and repentance, you shall hear him speak before you; and therefore I pray you, Mr. Cranmer, to perform that now which you promised not long ago; namely, that you would openly express the true and undoubted profession of your faith, that you may take away all suspicion from men, and that all men may understand that you are a catholic indeed. I will do it (said the archbishop), and that with a good-will; who, by rising up, and putting off his cap, began to speak thus unto the people.

Good christian people, my dearly beloved brethren and sisters in Christ, I beseech you most heartily to pray for me to Almighty God, that he will forgive me all my sins and offences, which be many without number, and great above measure. But yet one thing grieveth my conscience more than all the rest, whereof, God willing, I intend to speak more hereafter. But how great and how many forever my sins be, I beseech you to pray to God of his mercy to pardon and forgive them all. And here kneeling down he said the following prayer.

The PRAYER of Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of CANTERBURY.

“ O Father of heaven, O Son of God, Redeemer of the world, O Holy Ghost, three persons and one God, have mercy upon me, most wretched caitiff and miserable sinner. I have offended both against heaven and earth, more than my tongue can express. Whither then may I go, or whither shall I flee? To heaven I may be ashamed to lift up mine eyes, and in earth I find no place of refuge or succour. To thee therefore, O Lord, do I run; to thee do I humble myself, saying, O Lord my God, my sins be great. but yet have mercy upon me for thy great mercy. The great mystery that God became man, was not wrought for little or few offences. Thou didst not give thy Son (O Heavenly Father) unto death for small sins only, but for all the greatest sins of the world, so that the sinner return to thee with his whole heart, as I do at this present. Wherefore have mercy on me, O God, whose property is always to have mercy, have mercy upon me, O Lord, for thy great mercy. I crave nothing for mine own merits, but for thy name's sake, that it may be hallowed thereby, and for thy dear Son Jesus Christ's sake. And now therefore, O Father of heaven, hallowed be thy name," &c. And then he rising, said:

Every man (good people) desireth at the time of his death to give some good exhortation, that others may remember the same before their death, and be the better thereby: so I beseech God grant me grace, that I may speak something at this my departing, whereby God may be glorified, and you edified.

First, It is a heavy cause to see that so many folk so much dote upon the love of this false world, and be so careful for it, that of the love of God, or the world to come, they seem to care very little or nothing. Therefore this shall be my first exhortation: That you set not your minds overmuch upon this deceitful world, but upon God, and upon the world to come, and to learn to know what this lesson meaneth which St. John teacheth, "That the love of this world is hatred against God."

The second exhortation is, That next under God you obey your king and queen willingly and gladly, without murmuring or grudging; not for fear of them only, but much more for the fear of God; knowing that they be God's ministers, appointed by God to rule and govern you: and therefore whosoever resisteth them, resisteth the ordinance of God.

The third exhortation is, That you love altogether like brethren and sisters. For alas! pity it is to see what contention and hatred one christian man beareth to another, not taking each other as brother and sister, but rather as strangers and mortal enemies. But I pray you learn and bear well away this one lesson, To do good unto all men, as much as in you lieth, and to hurt no man, no more than you would hurt your own natural loving brother or sister. For this you may be sure of, that whosoever hateth any person, and goeth about maliciously to hinder or hurt him, surely, and without all doubt, God is not with that man, although he think himself ever so much in God's favour.

The fourth exhortation shall be to them that have great substance and riches of this world, That they will well consider and weigh three sayings of the scripture: one is of our Saviour himself, who saith, Luke xviii. "It is hard for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven." A fore saying, and yet spoken by him who knoweth the truth.

The second is of St. John, 1 John iii. whose saying is this, "He that hath the substance of this world, and seeth his brother in necessity, and shutteth up his mercy from him, how can he say that he loveth God?"

The third is of St. James, who speaketh to the covetous rich man, after this manner, "Weep you and howl for the misery that shall come upon you: your riches do rot, your clothes be moth-eaten, your gold and silver doth canker and rust, and their rust shall bear witness against you, and consume you like fire: you gather a hoard or treasure of God's indignation against the last day." Let them that be rich ponder well these three sentences: for if they ever had occasion to shew their charity, they have it now at this present, the poor people being so many, and victuals so dear.

And now forasmuch as I am come to the last end of my life, whereupon hangeth all my life past, and all my life to come, either to live with my master Christ for ever in joy, or else to be in pain for ever with wicked devils in hell, and I see before mine eyes presently either heaven ready to receive me, or else hell ready to swallow me up: I shall therefore declare unto you my very faith how I believe, without any colour of dissimulation: for now is no time to dissemble, whatsoever I have said or written in times past.

First, I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, &c. And I believe every article of the catholic faith, every word and sentence taught by our Saviour Jesus Christ, his apostles and prophets, in the New and Old Testament.

And now I come to the great thing which so much troubleth my conscience, more than any thing that ever I did or said in my whole life, and that is the setting abroad of a writing contrary to the truth; which now here I renounce and refuse, as things written with my hand contrary to the truth which I thought in my heart, and written for fear of death, and to save my life, if it might be; and that is, all such bills and papers which I have written or signed with my hand since my degradation, wherein I have written many things untrue. And forasmuch as my hand hath offended, writing contrary to my heart, therefore my hand shall first be punished; for when I come to the fire, it shall be first burned.

And as for the pope, I refuse him, as Christ's enemy and Antichrist, with all his false doctrine.

And as for the sacrament, I believe as I have taught in my book against the bishop of Winchester, which my book teacheth so true a doctrine of the sacrament, that it shall stand at the last day before the judgment of God, where the papistical doctrine contrary thereto shall be ashamed to shew her face.

Here the standers-by were all astonished, marvelled, and amazed, and looked upon one another, whose expectation he had so notably deceived. Some began to admonish him of his recantation, and to accuse him of falshood.

Briefly, it was strange to see the doctors beguiled of so great an hope. I think there was never cruelty more notably or better in time deluded and deceived. For it is not to be doubted, but they looked for a glorious victory, and a perpetual triumph by this man's retractation.

As soon as they heard these things, they began to let down their ears, to rage, fret, and fume; and so much the more, because they could not revenge their grief: for they could now no longer threaten or hurt him. For the most miserable man in the world can die but once: and whereas of necessity he must needs die that day, though the papists had been ever so well pleased; being ever so much offended with him, yet could he not be twice killed by them. And so when they could do nothing else unto him, yet lest they should say nothing, they ceased not to object unto him his falshood and dissimulation.

Unto which accusation he answered, Ah, my masters (quoth he), do you not take it so. Always since I lived hitherto, I have been a hater of falshood, and a lover of simplicity, and never before this time have I dissembled; and in saying this, all the tears that remained in his body appeared in his eyes. And when he began to speak more of the sacrament and of the papacy, some of them began to cry out, yelp, and bawl, and especially Cole cried out upon him, Stop the heretic's mouth, and take him away.

And then Cranmer being pulled down from the stage, was led to the fire, accompanied with those friars, vexing, troubling, and threatening him most cruelly. What madness (say they) hath brought thee again into this error, by which thou wilt draw innumerable souls with thee into hell? To whom he answered nothing, but directed all his talk to the people, saying that to one troubling him in the way he spake, and exhorted him to get him home to his study, and apply to his book diligently; saying, if he did diligently call upon God, by reading more he should get knowledge.

But the other Spanish barker, raging and foaming, was almost out of his wits, always having this in his mouth, Non fecisti? Didst thou it not?

But when he came to the place where the holy bishops and martyrs of God, bishop Latimer and bishop Ridley, were burnt before him for the confession of the truth, kneeling down he prayed to God, and not long tarrying in his prayers, putting off his garment to his shirt, he prepared himself to death. His shirt was made long, down to his feet. His feet were bare; likewise his head, when both his caps were off, was so bare that one hair could not be seen upon it. His beard was so long and thick, that it covered his face with marvellous gravity; and his reverend countenance moved the hearts both of his friends and enemies.

Then the Spanish friars, John and Richard, of whom mention was made before, began to exhort him, and play their parts with him afresh, but with vain and lost labour. Cranmer with stedfast purpose abiding in the profession of his doctrine, gave his hand to certain old men, and others that stood by, bidding them farewell.

And when he had thought to have done so likewise to Mr. Ely, the said Ely drew back his hand and refused, saying, it was not lawful to salute heretics, and especially such a one as falsely returned unto the opinions that he had forsworn. And if he had known before that he would have done so, he would never have used his company so familiarly, and chid those sergeants and citizens, who had not refused to give him their hands. This Mr. Ely was a student in divinity, and lately made a priest, being then one of the fellows in Brazen-nose college.

Then was an iron chain tied about Cranmer, and they commanded the fire to be set unto him.

And when the wood was kindled, and the fire began to burn near him, he stretched forth his right hand, which had signed his recantation, into the flames, and there held it so stedfast that all the people might see it burnt to a coal before his body was touched. In short, he was so patient and constant in the midst of these extreme tortures, that he seemed to move no more than the stake to which he was bound; his eyes were lifted up to heaven, and often he repeated his unworthy right hand, so long as his voice would suffer him; and as often using the words of the blessed martyr St. Stephen, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," till the fury of the flames putting him to silence, he gave up the ghost.

This fortitude of mind, which perchance is rare and not found among the Spaniards, when friar John saw, thinking it came not of fortitude, but of desperation, although such manner of examples which are of like constancy, have been common here in England, he ran to the lord Williams of Tame, crying that the archbishop was vexed in mind, and died in great desperation. But he, who was not ignorant of the archbishop's constancy, being unknown to the Spaniards, smiled only, and as it were by silence rebuked the friar's folly. And this was the end of this learned archbishop, whom, lest by evil subscribing he should have perished, by well recanting, God preserved; and lest he should have lived longer with shame and reproof, it pleased God rather to take him away, to the glory of his name and profit of his church. So good was the Lord both to his church, in fortifying the same with the testimony and blood of such a martyr; and so good also to the man with this cross of tribulation, to purge his offences in this world, not only of his recantation, but also of his standing against John Lambert and Mr. Allen, or if there were any other, with whose burning or blood his hand had been any thing before polluted. But especially he had to rejoice, that dying in such a cause, he was numbered amongst the martyrs of Christ, and much more worthy of the name of St. Thomas of Canterbury, than he whom the pope falsely before did canonize.

And thus you have the full story concerning the life and death of this reverend archbishop and martyr of God, Thomas Cranmer, and also of divers others, of whom this archbishop was the last that suffered in the middle of the reign of queen Mary, and almost the middle man that was burnt in her time.

Now we proceed to exhibit the letters which this worthy martyr left behind him, beginning first with his famous letter to queen Mary, which he wrote immediately after he was cited up to Rome by bishop Brooks and his fellows, the tenor whereof is as followeth.

L E T T E R I.

MAY it please your majesty to pardon my presumption that I dare be so bold to write to your highness. But very necessity constraineth me, that your majesty may know my mind, rather by mine own writing than by other men's reports. So it is, that upon Wednesday, being the 12th day of this month, I was cited to appear at Rome the eightieth day after, there to make answer to such matters as should be objected against me upon the behalf of the king and your most excellent majesty, which matters the Thursday following were objected against me by Dr. Martin and Dr. Story, your majesty's proctors before the bishop of Gloucester, sitting in judgment by commission from Rome. But (alas) it cannot but grieve the heart of a natural subject to be accused of the king and queen of his own realm; and especially before an outward judge, or by authority coming from any person out of this realm: where the king and queen, as if they were subjects within their own realm, shall complain and require justice at a stranger's hands against their own subject, being already condemned to death by their own laws. As though the king and queen could not do or have justice within their own realms against their own subjects; but they must seek it at strangers hands in a strange land, the like whereof (I think) was never seen. I would have wished to have had some meaner adversaries: and, I think, that death shall not grieve me much more, than to have my most dread and most gracious sovereign lord and lady, to whom, under God, I do own all obedience, to be mine accusers in judgment within their own realm, before any stranger and outward power. But forasmuch as in the time of the prince of most famous memory, King Henry the Eighth, your grace's father, I was sworn never to consent, that the bishop of Rome should have or exercise any authority or jurisdiction in this realm of England, therefore lest I should allow his authority contrary to mine own oath, I refused to make answer to the bishop of Gloucester sitting here in judgment by the pope's authority, lest I should run into perjury.

Another cause why I refused the pope's authority, is this, that his authority, as he claimeth it, is repugnant to the crown imperial of this realm, and to the laws of the same: which every true subject is bound to defend. First, for that the pope saith, that all manner of power, as well temporal as spiritual, is given first to him of God; and that the temporal power he giveth unto emperors and kings, to use it under him, but so as to be always at his commandment and beck.

But contrary to this claim, the imperial crown and jurisdiction temporal of this realm is taken immediately from God, to be used under him only, and is subject to none but God alone.

Moreover, to the imperial laws and customs of this realm the king in his coronation, and all justices when they receive their offices, be sworn, and all the whole realm is bound to defend and maintain. But contrary hereunto, the pope by his authority maketh void, and commandeth to blot out of our books, all laws and customs being repugnant to his laws, and declareth accursed all rulers and governors, all the makers, writers, and executors of all such laws or customs, as it appeareth by many of the pope's laws, whereof one or two I shall rehearse. In the decrees, Dict. 10. it is written thus, "The constitution or statutes enacted against the canons and decrees of the bishops of Rome or their good customs, are of none effect." Also, "We excommunicate all heretics of both sexes, what name soever they be called by, and their favourers, receptors, and defenders; and also them that shall hereafter cause to be be observed the statutes and customs made against the liberty of the church, except they cause the same to be put out of their records and chapters within two months after the publication thereof. Also we excommunicate the statute-makers and writers of those statutes, and all the potestates, powers, consuls, governors, and counsellors of places, where such statutes or customs shall be made or kept; and also that shall presume to give judgment according to them, or shall notify in public form the matter so adjudged."

Now by these laws, if the bishop of Rome's authority which he claimeth by God, be lawful, all your grace's laws and customs of your realm, being contrary to the pope's laws, be naught, and as well your majesty, as your judges, justices, and all other executors of the same, stand accursed amongst heretics, which God forbid. And yet this curse can never be avoided (if the pope hath such power as he claimeth) until such times as the laws and customs of this realm (being contrary to his laws) be taken away and blotted out of the law-books. And although there be many laws of this realm contrary to the laws of Rome, yet I named but a few; as to convict a clerk before any temporal judge of this realm for debt, felony, murder, or for any other crime; which clerks by the pope's laws are so exempt from the king's laws, that they can be no where sued, but before their ordinary.

Also the pope by his laws may give all bishoprics and benefices spiritual; which by the laws of this realm can be given but only by the king and other patrons of the same, except they fall into lapse.

By the pope's laws, jus patronatus shall be sued only before the ecclesiastical judge; but by the laws of the realm it shall be sued before the temporal judge.

And to be short, the laws of this realm do agree with the pope's, like fire and water. And yet the kings of this realm have provided for their laws by the præmunire; so that if any man have let the execution of the laws of this realm by any authority from the see of Rome, he falleth into the præmunire.

But to meet with this, the popes have provided for their laws by cursing. For whosoever hindereth the pope's laws to have full course within this realm, by the pope's power standeth accursed: so that the pope's power treadeth all the laws and customs of this realm under his feet, cursing all that execute them, until such time as they do give place unto his laws.

But it may be said, that notwithstanding all the pope's decrees, yet we do still execute the laws and customs of this realm. Nay, not all quietly without interruption of the pope. And where we do execute them, yet we do it unjustly, if the pope's power be of force, and for the same we stand excommunicate, and shall do until we leave the execution of our own laws and customs. Thus we be well reconciled to Rome, allowing such authority, whereby the realm standeth accursed before God, if the pope have any such authority.

These things (as I suppose) were not fully opened in the parliament-house when the pope's authority was received again within this realm; for if they had, I do not believe that either the king or queen's majesty, or the nobles of this realm, or the commons of the same, would ever have consented to receive again such a foreign authority, so injurious, hurtful, and prejudicial, as well to the crown as to the laws and customs and state of this realm, as whereby they must needs acknowledge themselves to be accursed. But none could open this matter well but the clergy, and such of them as had read the pope's laws, whereby the pope had made himself as it were a god. These seek to maintain the pope whom they desired to have their chief head, to the intent they might have, as it were, a kingdom and laws within themselves, distinct from the laws of the crown, and wherewith the crown may not meddle; and so being exempted from the laws of the realm, might live in this realm like lords and kings, without damage or fear of any man, so that they please their high and supreme head at Rome. For this consideration (I think), some that knew the truth, held their peace in the parliament, whereas if they had done their duties to the crown and whole realm, they should have opened their mouths, declared the truth, and shewed the perils and dangers that might ensue to the crown and realm.

And if I should agree to allow such authority within this realm, whereby I must needs confess, that your most gracious highness, and also your realm should ever continue accursed, until ye shall cease from the execution of your own laws and customs of your realm; I could not think myself true either to your highness, or to this my natural country, knowing that I do know. Ignorance, I know, may excuse other men; but he that knoweth how prejudicial and injurious the power and authority which he challengeth every where, is to the crown-laws and customs of this realm, and yet will allow the same, I cannot see in any wise how he can keep his due allegiance, fidelity, and truth to the crown and state of this realm.

Another cause I alledged, why I could not allow the authority of the pope, which is this: That by his authority he subverteth not only the laws of this realm, but also the laws of God: so that whosoever be under his authority, he suffereth them not to be under Christ's religion purely, as Christ did command.

And for one example I brought forth, that whereas by God's laws all christian people be bounden diligently to learn his word, that they may know how to believe and live accordingly, for that purpose he ordained holydays, when they ought, leaving apart all other business, to give themselves wholly to know and serve God. Therefore God's will and commandment is, that when the people be gathered together, ministers should use such language as the people may understand and take profit thereby, or else hold their peace. For as an harp or lute, if it give no certain sound that men may know what is played, who can dance after it? for all the sound is vain. So it is in vain, and profiteth nothing, saith Almighty God by the mouth of St. Paul, if the priest speak to the people in a language which they know not; "For else he may profit himself, but profiteth not the people," saith St. Paul. But herein I was answered thus; that St. Paul spake only of preaching, that the preacher should preach in a tongue which the people did know, or else his preaching availeth nothing: but if the preaching availeth nothing, being spoke in a language which the people understand not, how should any other service avail them, being spoken in the same language? And yet that St. Paul meant not only of preaching, it appeareth plainly by his own words. For he speaketh by name expressly of praying, singing, and thanking of God, and of all other things which the priests say in the churches, whereunto the people say Amen; which they use not in preaching, but in other divine service; that whether the priests rehearse the wonderful works of God, or the great benefits of God unto mankind above all other creatures, or give thanks unto God, or make open profession of their faith, or humble confession of their sins, with earnest request of mercy and forgiveness, or make suit and request unto God for any thing; then all the people understanding what the priests say, might give their minds and voices with them, and say, Amen, that is to say, allow what the priests say; that the rehearsal of God's universal works and benefits, the giving of thanks, the profession of faith, the confession of sins, and the requests and petitions of the priests and of the people, might ascend up into the ears of God altogether, and be as a sweet favour, odour, and incense in his nose: and thus was it used many hundred years after Christ's ascension.

But the foresaid things cannot be done when the priests speak to the people in a language not known, and so they (or their clerk in their name) say Amen, but they cannot tell whereunto. Whereas St. Paul saith, "How can the people say Amen to thy well saying, when they understand not what thou sayest?" And thus was St. Paul understood by all interpreters, both the Greeks and Latins, old and new, school authors and others that I have read, until above thirty years past. At which time one Eckius, with others of his sort, began to devise a new exposition, understanding St. Paul of preaching only.

But when a good number of the best learned men reputed within this realm, some favouring the old, some the new learning, as they term it, (where indeed that which they call the old is the new, and that which they call the new is indeed the old) but when a great number of such learned men of both sorts, were gathered together at Windsor for the reformation of the service of the church, it was agreed by both, without controversy (not one saying contrary) that the service of the church ought to be in the mother tongue; and that St. Paul in the fourteenth chapter to the Corinthians was so to be understood. And so St. Paul was understood in the civil law, more than a thousand years past, where Justinian, a most godly emperor, in a synod writeth in this manner: "We command that all bishops and priests celebrate the holy oblation and prayer used in holy baptism, not after a still and close manner, but with a clear loud voice, that they may be plainly heard by the faithful people, so as the hearers' minds may be lifted up thereby with the greater devotion, in uttering the praises of the Lord God. For so St. Paul teacheth also in the epistle to the Corinthians, If the Spirit do only bless (or say well) how shall he that occupieth the place of a private person say Amen, to thy thanksgiving? for he perceiveth not what thou sayest: thou dost give thanks well, but the other is not edified." And not only the civil law, and all other writers a thousand and five hundred years continually together, have expounded St. Paul not of preaching only, but of other service said in the church; but also reason saith the same, that if men be commanded to hear any thing, it must be spoken in a language which the hearers understand, or else (as St. Paul saith) what availeth it to hear? So that the pope giving a contrary commandment, that the people coming to the church shall hear they know not what, and shall answer they know not whereto; taketh upon him to command, not only against reason, but also directly against God.

And again I said; whereas our Saviour Christ ordained the sacrament of his most precious body and blood to be received by all christian people under the forms of bread and wine, and said of the cup, "Drink ye all of this:" the pope giveth a clean contrary commandment, that no layman shall drink of the cup of their salvation; as though the cup of salvation by the blood of Christ pertaineth not to laymen. And whereas Theophilus Alexandrinus (whose works St. Jerome did translate about eleven hundred years past) saith, That if Christ had been crucified for the devils, his cup should not be denied them; yet the pope denieth the cup of Christ to christian people, for whom Christ was crucified. So that if I should obey the pope in these things, I must needs disobey my Saviour Christ.

But I was answered hereunto (as they commonly answer), that under the form of bread is both Christ's flesh and blood: so that whosoever receiveth the bread, receiveth as well Christ's blood as his flesh. Let it be so, yet in the form of bread only, Christ's blood is not drank, but eaten; nor is it received in the cup in the form of wine, as Christ commanded, but eaten with the flesh under the form of bread. And moreover, the bread is not the sacrament of his blood but of his flesh only; nor is the cup the sacrament of his flesh; but of his blood only. And so the pope keepeth from all lay-persons the sacrament of their redemption by Christ's blood, which Christ commandeth to be given unto them.

And furthermore, Christ ordained the sacrament in two kinds, the one separated from the other, to be a representation of his death, where his blood was separated from his flesh, which is not represented in one kind alone: so that the lay-people receive not the whole sacrament whereby Christ's death is represented as he commanded.

Moreover, as the pope taketh upon him to give the temporal sword; by royal and imperial power, to kings and princes; so doth he likewise take upon him to depose them from their imperial states, if they be disobedient to him, and commandeth the subjects to disobey their princes, affailing the subjects as well of their obedience, as of their lawful oaths made unto their true kings and princes, directly contrary to God's commandment, who commandeth all subjects to obey their kings, or their rulers under them.

One John, patriarch of Constantinople, in the time of St. Gregory, claimed superiority above all other bishops. To whom St. Gregory writeth, that therein he did injury to his three brethren, which were equal with him; that is to say, the bishop of Rome, the bishop of Alexandria, and of Antioch: which three were patriarchal sees, as well as Constantinople, and were brethren one to another. But (saith St. Gregory) if any one shall exalt himself above all the rest, to be the universal bishop, the same passeth in pride. But now the bishop of Rome exalteth himself not only above all kings and emperors, and above all the whole world, but takes upon him to give and take away, to set up and pull down as he shall think good. And as the devil, having no such authority, yet took upon him to give unto Christ all the kingdoms of the world, if he would fall down and worship him; in like manner the pope taketh upon him to give empires and kingdoms, being none of his, to such as will fall down and worship him, and kiss his feet.

And moreover, his lawyers and glossers so flatter him, that they feign he may command emperors and kings to hold his stirrup when he lighteth from his horse, and to be his footmen: and that if any emperor or king give him any thing, they give him nothing but what is his own, and that he may dispense against God's word, against both the Old and New Testament, against St. Paul's epistles, and against the gospel. And furthermore, whatsoever he doth, although he draw innumerable people by heaps with himself into hell, yet may not mortal man reprove him, because he being judge of all men, may be judged of no man. And thus he sitteth in the temple of God as if he were a god, and nameth himself God's vicar, and yet he dispenseth against God. If this be not to play Antichrist's part, I cannot tell what Antichrist is, which is no more to say, but Christ's enemy and adversary? who shall sit in the temple of God advancing himself above all other, yet by hypocrisy and feigned religion, shall subvert the true religion of Christ, and under pretence and colour of Christ's religion shall work against Christ, and therefore hath the name of Antichrist. Now if any man list himself higher than the pope hath done, who listeth himself above all the world; or can be a greater adversary to Christ, than to dispense against God's laws; and where Christ hath given any commandment, to command directly the contrary, that man must needs be taken for Antichrist. But until the time that such a person may be found, men may very easily conjecture where to find Antichrist.

Wherefore seeing the pope thus to overthrow both God's laws, and man's laws, taking upon him to make emperors and kings to be vassals and subjects unto him, especially the crown of this realm, with the laws and customs of the same; I see no reason how I may consent to admit his usurped power within this realm, contrary to mine oath, mine obedience to God's laws, mine allegiance and duty to your majesty, and my love and affection to this realm.

This that I have spoken against the power and authority of the pope, I have not spoken (I take God to record and judge) for any malice I owe to the pope's person, whom I know not, but I shall pray to God to give him grace, that he may seek above all things to promote God's honour and glory, and not to follow the trade of his predecessors in these latter days.

Nor have I spoken it for fear of punishment, and to avoid the same, thinking it rather an occasion to aggravate than to diminish my trouble; but I have spoken it for my most bounded duty to the crown, liberties, laws, and customs of this realm of England, but most especially to discharge my conscience in uttering the truth to God's glory, casting away all fear by the comfort which I have in Christ, who said, "Fear not them that kill the body, and cannot kill the soul, but fear him that can cast both body and soul into hell-fire." He that for fear of losing this life will forsake the truth, shall lose the life everlasting: and he that for the truth's sake will spend his life, will find everlasting life. And Christ promiseth to stand fast with them before his Father, which will stand fast with him here; which comfort is so great, that whosoever hath his eyes fixed upon Christ, cannot greatly set his heart on this life, knowing that he may be sure to have Christ stand by him in the presence of his Father in heaven.

And as touching the sacrament, I said; Forasmuch as the whole matter standeth in the understanding of these words of Christ, "This is my body, this is my blood;" then surely Christ in these words made demonstration of the bread and wine, and spake figuratively, calling bread his body, and wine his blood, because he ordained them to be sacraments of his body and blood. And where the papists say in those two points contrary unto me, that Christ called not bread his body, but a substance uncertain, nor spoke figuratively: herein I said, I would be judged by the old church, and which doctrine could be proved the elder, that I would stand unto. And forasmuch as I have alledged in my book many old authors, both Greeks and Latins, which above a thousand years after Christ continually taught as I do: if they could bring forth but one old author, that saith in these two points as they say, I offered six or seven years ago, and do offer yet still, that I will give place unto them.

But when I bring forth any author that saith in most plain terms as I do, yet saith the other part, that the authors meant not so; as much as to say, that the authors spake one thing, and meant clean contrary. And upon the other part, when they cannot find any one author, that saith in words as they say; yet say they, that the authors meant as they say. Now, whether I or they speak more to the purpose herein, I refer me to the judgment of all impartial hearers; yea, the old church of Rome, above a thousand years together, neither believed nor used the sacrament, as the church of Rome hath done of late years.

For in the beginning, the church of Rome taught a pure and a sound doctrine of the sacrament. But after that the church of Rome fell into new doctrine of transubstantiation; with the doctrine they changed the use of the sacrament contrary to that Christ commanded, and the old church of Rome used above a thousand years. And yet to deface the old, they say that the new is the old: wherein for my part I am content to stand to the trial. But their doctrine is so foolish and uncomfortable, that I marvel how any man would allow it, if he knew what it was. But howsoever they hear the people in hand, that which they write in their books hath neither truth nor comfort.

For by their doctrine, of one body of Christ is made two bodies: one natural having a distance of members, with form and proportion of man's perfect body, and this body is in heaven: but the body of Christ in the sacrament, by their own doctrine, must needs be a monstrous body, having neither distance of members, nor form, fashion, or proportion of a man's natural body. And such a body is in the sacrament (teach they), and goeth into the mouth in the form of bread, and entereth no further than the form of bread goeth, and tarrieth no longer than the form of bread is by natural heat in digesting. So that when the form of bread is digested, that body of Christ is gone. And forasmuch as evil men are as long in digesting as good men, the body of Christ (by their doctrine) entereth as far, and tarrieth as long in wicked men as in godly men. And what comfort can be herein to any christian man, to receive Christ's unshapen body, and it to enter no further than the stomach, and to depart by and by as soon as the bread is consumed?

It seemeth to me a more sound and comfortable doctrine, that Christ hath but one body, and that hath form and fashion of a man's true body: which body spiritually entereth into the whole man, body and soul: and though the sacrament be consumed, yet whole Christ remaineth, and feedeth the receiver unto eternal life, if he continue in godliness, and never departeth until the receiver forsake him. And as for the wicked, they have not Christ within them at all, who cannot be where Belial is. And this is my faith, and (as I judge) a sound doctrine, according to God's word, and sufficient for a christian to believe in that matter. And if it can be shewed unto me that the pope's authority is not prejudicial to the things before mentioned, or that my doctrine in the sacrament is erroneous (which I think cannot be shewed), then I never was nor will be so perverse to stand wilfully in mine own opinion, but I shall with all humility submit myself unto the pope, not only to kiss his feet, but another part also.

Another cause why I refused to take the bishop of Gloucester for my judge, was the respect of his own person, being more than once perjured. First, for that he being divers times sworn never to consent that the bishop of Rome should have any jurisdiction within this realm, but to take the king and his successors for supreme heads of this realm, as by God's laws they are: contrary to that lawful oath the said bishop sat then in judgment by authority from Rome, wherein he was perjured, and not worthy to sit as judge.

The second perjury was, that he took his bishopric both of the queen's majesty and of the pope, making to each of them a solemn oath, which oaths are so contrary that the one must needs be perjured. And furthermore in swearing to the pope to maintain his laws, decrees, constitutions, ordinances, reservations, and provisions, he declareth himself an enemy to the imperial crown, and to the laws and state of this realm, whereby he declareth himself not worthy to sit as a judge within this realm. And for these considerations I refused to take him for my judge.

LETTER II.

I Learned by Mr. Martin, that on the day of your majesty's coronation, you took an oath of obedience to the pope of Rome, and the same time you took another oath to this realm, to maintain the laws, liberties, and customs of the same. And if your majesty did make an oath to the pope, I think it was according to the other oaths which he useth to administer to princes; which is, to be obedient to him, to defend his person, to maintain his authority, honour, laws, lands, and privileges. And if it be so, (which I know not but by report) then I beseech your majesty to look upon your oath made to the crown and realm, and to compare and weigh the two oaths together, to see how they do agree, and then do as your majesty's conscience shall direct you: for I am surely persuaded, that willingly your majesty will not offend, nor do against your conscience for any thing.

But I fear that there are contradictions in your oaths, and that those which should have informed your grace thoroughly, did not their duties therein. And if your majesty ponder the two oaths diligently, I think you shall perceive you were deceived; and then your highness may use the matter as God shall put in your heart. Furthermore, I am kept here from the company of learned men, from books, from counsel, from pen and ink, except at this time to write unto your majesty, which were all necessary for a man in my case. Wherefore I beseech your majesty, that I may have such of these as may stand with your majesty's pleasure. And as for my appearance at Rome, if your majesty will give me leave, I will appear there. And I trust that God shall put in my mouth to defend his truth there as well as here. But I refer it wholly to your majesty's pleasure.

LETTER III.

I Have me commended unto you. And as I promised, I have sent my letters unto the queen's majesty unsigned, praying you to sign them, and deliver them with with all speed. I might have sent them by the carrier sooner, but not surer. But hearing Mr. Bailiff say, that he will go to court on Friday, I thought him a safe messenger to send my letters by. For better is later and surer, than sooner and never to be delivered. Yet one thing I have written to the queen's majesty inclosed and sealed; which I require may be so delivered without delay, and not to be opened until it be delivered into her grace's own hands. I have written all that I remember I said, except that which I spake against the bishop of Gloucester's own person, which I thought not meet to write. And in some places I have written more than I said, which I would have answered to the bishop, if you would have suffered me.

You promised I should see mine answers to the sixteen articles, that I might correct, amend, and change them where I thought good, which your promise you kept not. And mine answer was not made upon mine oath, nor repeated, nor made in judicio, but extra judicium, as I protested; nor to the bishop of Gloucester as judge, but to you the king and queen's proctors. I trust you deal sincerely with me, without fraud or craft, and use me as you would wish to be in like case yourselves. Remember, that what measure you mete, the same shall be measured to you again. Thus fare you well, and God send you his Spirit to induce you into truth.

THOMAS CRANMER.

Ye heard before how archbishop Cranmer in the month of February was cited up to Rome, and in the month of March next following was degraded by the bishop of Ely, and bishop Bonner. In time of which his degradation he put up his appeal.

In this his appeal, because he needed the help of some good lawyer, he writeth to a friend of his about the same: the copy of which letter I thought good here to insert as follows.

LETTER IV.

THE law of nature requireth all men, that so far forth as it may be done without offence to God, every one should seek to defend and preserve his own life. Which thing when I about three days ago be-thought myself of, and therewithal remembered how that Martin Luther appealed in his time from pope Leo the Tenth to a general council (lest I should seem rashly and unadvisedly to cast away myself), I determined to appeal in like sort to some lawful and free general council. But seeing the order and form of an appeal pertaineth to the lawyers, where I myself am ignorant, and seeing that Luther's appeal cometh not to my hand, I purposed to break my mind in this matter to some faithful friend, and skilful in the law, whose help I might use in this behalf, and you only among others came to my remembrance, as a man the most proper in this university for my purpose. But this is a matter that requireth great secrecy, so that no man know of it before it be done. It is so that I am summoned to make mine answer at Rome, the 16th day of this month, before which day I think it good, after sentence pronounced, to make mine appeal. But whether I should first appeal from the judge delegate to the pope, and so afterward to the general council, or else leaving the pope, I should appeal immediately to the council, herein I stand in need of your counsel.

Many causes there are for which I think good to appeal. First, because I am by an oath bound never to consent to the receiving of the bishop of Rome's authority into this realm. Besides this, whereas I utterly refused to make answer to the articles objected unto me by the bishop of Gloucester, appointed by the pope to be my judge, yet I was content to answer Martin and Story with this protestation, that mine answer should not be taken as made before a judge, nor yet in place of judgment, but as pertaining nothing to judgment at all: moreover, after I had made mine answer, I required to have a copy of the same, that I might either by adding thereunto, or by altering or taking from it, correct and amend it as I thought good: which, though both the bishop of Gloucester, and the king and queen's proctors promised me, yet have they altogether broke their promise with me, and have not permitted me to correct my said answers according to my request; and yet notwithstanding have (as I understand) registered the same as acts formally done in place of judgment.

Finally, forasmuch as all this my trouble cometh upon me, for my departing from the bishop of Rome, and from the popish religion, so that now the quarrel is between the pope himself and me, and no man can be a lawful and indifferent judge in his own cause; it seemeth (methinks) good reason, that I should be suffered to appeal to some general council in this matter; especially seeing the law of nature (as they say) denieth no man the remedy of appeal in such cases.

Now, since it is very requisite that this matter should be kept as close as may be, if perhaps for lack of perfect skill herein you shall have need of further advice; then I beseech you even for the fidelity and love you bear to me in Christ, that you will open to no creature alive whose the case is. And forasmuch as the time is now at hand, and the matter requireth great expedition, let me obtain thus much of you, I beseech you, that laying aside all other your studies and business for the time, you will apply to this my matter only, till you have brought it to pass. The chief cause in very deed (to tell you the truth) of this mine appeal is, that I might gain time (if it shall so please God) to live until I have finished mine answer against Marcus Antonius Constantius, which I have now in hand. But if the adversaries of the truth will not admit mine appeal, as I fear they will not, God's will be done; I pass not upon it, so that God may therein be glorified, be it by my life, or by my death. For it is much better for me to die in Christ's quarrel, and to reign with him, than here to be shut up and kept in the prison of this body, unless it were to continue yet still a while in this warfare, for the advantage and profit of my brethren, and to the further advancing of God's glory. To whom be all glory for evermore, Amen.

There is also yet another cause why I think good to appeal, that whereas I am cited to go to Rome to answer there for myself, I am notwithstanding kept here fast in prison, that I cannot there appear at the time appointed: and moreover, forasmuch as the state I stand in, is a matter of life and death, so that I have great need of learned counsel for my defence in this behalf: yet when I made my earnest request for the same, all manner of counsel, and help of proctors, advocates, and lawyers, was utterly denied me.

Your loving friend,

THOMAS CRANMER.

LETTER V.

From Archbishop CRANMER, to Mrs. WILKINSON, exhorting her to fly in the Time of Persecution.

THE true Comforter in all distress is only God, through his Son Jesus Christ; and whosoever hath him, hath company enough if he were in a wilderness all alone: and he that hath twenty thousand in his company, if God be absent, is in a miserable wilderness and desolation. In him is all comfort, and without him is none. Wherefore I beseech you seek your dwelling there where you may truly and rightly serve God, and dwell in him, and have him ever dwelling in you. What can be so heavy a burden as an unquiet conscience, to be in such a place as a man cannot be suffered to serve God in Christ's religion? If you are loth to depart from your kindred and friends, remember that Christ calleth them his mother, sisters, and brothers, that do his Father's will. Where we find therefore God truly honoured according to his will, there we can want neither friend nor kindred.

If you be loth to depart for the slander of God's word, remember that Christ, when his hour was not yet come, departed out of his country into Samaria, to avoid the malice of the scribes and pharisees; and commanded his apostles, that if they were persecuted in one place they should fly to another. And was not Paul let down by a basket out at a window, to avoid the persecution of Aretas! And what wisdom and policy he used from time to time to escape the malice of his enemies, the Acts of the Apostles do declare. And after the same sort did the other apostles, although when it came to such a point, that they could no longer escape danger of the persecutor of God's true religion, then they shewed themselves, that their flying before came not of fear, but of godly wisdom to do more good; and that they would not rashly, without urgent necessity, offer themselves to death, which had been but a temptation of God. Yea, when they were apprehended, and could no longer avoid, then they stood boldly to the profession of Christ; then they shewed how little they dreaded death; how much they feared God more than man; how much they loved and preferred the eternal life to come above this short and miserable life.

Wherefore I exhort you as well by Christ's commandment, as by the example of him and his apostles, to withdraw yourself from the malice of your's and God's enemies, into some place where God is most purely served; which is no slandering of the truth, but a preserving of yourself to God, and the truth, and to the society and comfort of Christ's little flock. And what you will do, do it with speed, lest by your own folly you fall into the persecutor's hands. And the Lord send his Holy Spirit to lead and guide you wheresoever you go, and all that be godly will say, Amen.

Unto these former letters of Dr. Cranmer, archbishop, written by him unto others, it seemeth to me not much out of place to annex withal a certain letter also of Dr. Taylor, written to him and his fellow prisoners; the tenor of which letter here followeth.

To my dear Fathers and Brethren Dr. CRANMER, Dr. RIDLEY, and Mr. LATIMER, Prisoners in Oxford for the faithful Testimony of God's holy Word.

RIGHT reverend fathers in the Lord, I wish you to enjoy continually God's grace and peace through Jesus Christ; and God be praised again for this your most excellent promotion, which you are called unto at this present, that is, that you are counted worthy to be allowed amongst the number of Christ's recorders and witnesses. England hath had but a few learned bishops, that would stick to Christ, ad ignem, inclusively. Once again I thank God heartily in Christ for your most happy onset, most valiant proceeding, most constant suffering of all such infamies, hissings, clappings, taunts, open rebukes, loss of living and liberty, for the defence of God's cause, truth, and glory. I cannot utter with pen how I rejoice in my heart for you three such captains in the foreward under Christ's cross, banner, or standard, in such a cause and skirmish, when not one or two of our dear Redeemer's strong holds are besieged, but all his chief castles, ordained for our safeguard, are traiterously assaulted. This your enterprize, in the sight of all that be in heaven, and of all God's people in earth, is most pleasant to behold. This is another manner of nobility than to be in the fore-front in wordly warfares. For God's sake pray for us, for we fail not daily to pray for you. We are stronger and stronger in the Lord, his name be praised, and we doubt not but you be so in Christ's own sweet school. Heaven is all and wholly of our side; therefore, rejoice always in the Lord: and again, rejoice and be glad.

Your assured in Christ,
ROWLAND TAYLOR.

The HISTORY of AGNES POTTEN, and JOAN TRUNCHFIELD, MARTYRS, persecuted in Suffolk.

IN the history of Robert Samuel mention was made before of two godly women of the same town of Ipswich, who shortly after him suffered likewise, and obtained the crown of martyrdom: the name of the first was Agnes, the wife of Robert Potten; and another, wife of Michael Trunchfield, a shoemaker, both dwelling in one town: who, about the same time that the archbishop aforesaid was burnt at Oxford, suffered likewise in the aforesaid town of Ipswich, either in the same month of March, or (as some say) in the end of February before.

Their opinion or persuasion was this, that in the sacrament was the memorial only of Christ's death and passion: for (said they) Jesus Christ is ascended up into heaven, and is on the right hand of God the Father, according to the scriptures, and not in the sacrament, as he was born of the virgin Mary.

For this they were burnt. In whose suffering their constancy was worthy to be wondered at; who being simple women, so manfully stood to the confession and testimony of God's word and verity: insomuch that when they had prepared and undressed themselves ready to the fire, with comfortable words of the scripture they earnestly required the people to credit and to lay hold on the word of God, and not upon man's devices and inventions, despising the ordinances and institutions of the Romish Antichrist, with all his superstitions and rotten religion; and so continuing in the torment of fire, they held up their hands and called unto God constantly so long as life did endure.

This Potten's wife, one night a little before her death, being asleep in her bed, saw a bright burning fire, right up as a pole, and on the side of the fire she thought there stood a number of queen Mary's friends looking on. Then being asleep, she seemed to muse with herself whether her fire should burn so bright or no: and indeed her suffering was not far unlike her dream.

This also I thought further to note, how these two being always together in prison, the one which was Michael's wife, seemed to be nothing so ardent and zealous as Potten's wife was, although (God be thanked) they did both stoutly stand to the confession of the truth; but when the said Michael's wife came to the stake, and saw nothing but present death before her, she much exceeded the other in joy and comfort; although both of them did so joyfully suffer, that it was marvelled at by those who knew them, and did behold their end. And thus these two martyrs ended their lives with great triumph: the Lord grant we may do the like, Amen.

JOHAN MAUNDREL was the son of Robert Maundrel of Rowd, in the county of Wilts, farmer; he was from his childhood brought up in husbandry, and when he came to man's estate, he dwelt in a village called Buchampton, in the parish of Kevel, in the county aforesaid, where he lived in good repute with his wife and children. After the scripture was translated into English by William Tindal, this John Maundrel became a diligent hearer thereof, and a fervent embracer of God's true religion, so that he delighted in nothing so much, as to hear and speak of God's word, never being without the New Testament about him, although he could not read himself. But when he came into any company that could read, his book was always ready, having a very good memory, so that he could recite by heart most places of the New Testament; his life and conversation being very honest and charitable, as his neighbours could testify.

So it was, that in the days of king Henry the Eighth, at which time Dr. Trigouion and Dr. Lee did visit the abbey, abbeys, the said John Maundrel was brought before Dr. Trigonion at an abbey called Edyngton in Wiltshire; where he was accused that he had spoken against the holy water and holy bread, and such like ceremonies, and for the same did wear a white sheet, bearing a candle in his hand about the market, in the town of the Devizes, which is in the said county. Nevertheless his fervency did not abate, but by God's merciful assistance he took better hold, as the sequel thereof did declare.

For in the days of queen Mary, when popery was restored again, and God's true religion put to silence, the said John Maundrel left his own house and went into Gloucestershire, and into the north part of Wiltshire, wandering from one to another to such men as he knew feared God, with whom, as a servant to keep their cattle, he there did remain with one John Bridges, or some other at Kingswood; but after a time he returned to his own country, and there coming to the Devizes to a friend of his named Anthony Clee, had talk and conference with him in a garden, of returning home to his house.

And when the other exhorted him by the words of scripture, to fly from one city to another, he replied again by the words of the Revelations xxi. of them that be fearful, and said, that he must needs go home, and so did. Where he with Spicer and Coberly used at times to resort and confer together.

At length upon the Sunday following they agreed together to go to the parish church, called Revel, where the said Maundrel, and the other two, seeing the parishioners in the procession following and worshipping the idol there carried, advised them to leave the same, and to return to the living God, particularly speaking to one Robert Barkisdale, head man of the parish, but he paid no regard to their words.

After this the vicar came into the pulpit, who there being about to read his head-roll, and to pray for the souls in purgatory: the said John Maundrel, speaking with an audible voice, said, that was the pope's pin-fold, the other two affirming the same. After which words, by command of the priest, they were had to the stocks, where they remained till the service was done, and then were brought before a justice of peace, and the next day were all three carried to Salisbury, and presented before bishop Capon, and William Geffrey, being chancellor of the diocese. By whom they were imprisoned, and oftentimes examined concerning their faith, in their houses, but seldom openly. And at the last examination these were the articles which the chancellor alledged against them, being accompanied by the sheriff of the shire, Mr. St. Johns, and other popish priests in the parish church of Fisherton Anger, demanding how they did believe.

They answered, as christian men should and ought to believe: and first they said, they believed in God the Father, and in the Son, and in the Holy Ghost, the twelve articles of the creed, the holy scripture from the first of Genesis to the last of the Revelations.

But that faith the chancellor would not allow. Wherefore he proposed them in particular articles: First, whether they did not believe, that in the sacrament of the altar (as he termed it), after the words of consecration spoken by the priest at mass, there remained no substance of bread nor wine, but Christ's body, flesh and blood, as he was born of the virgin Mary. Whereunto they answered negatively, saying that the popish mass was abominable idolatry, and injurious to the blood of Christ; but confessing, that in a faithful congregation, receiving the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, being duly administered according to Christ's institution, Christ's body and blood is spiritually received of the faithful believer.

Also, being asked whether the pope was supreme head of the church, and Christ's vicar on earth; they answered negatively, saying, that the bishop of Rome doth usurp over emperors and kings, being Antichrist, and God's enemy.

The chancellor said, Will you have the church without a head? They answered, Christ was head of his church, and under Christ the queen's majesty.

What, said the chancellor, a woman head of the church? Yea, said they, within her grace's dominions.

Also, whether the souls in purgatory were delivered by the pope's pardon, and the suffrages of the church.

They said, they believed faithfully that the blood of Christ had purged their sins, and the sins of them that were saved, unto the end of the world, so that they feared nothing of the pope's purgatory, nor esteemed his pardons.

Also, whether images were necessary to be in the churches, as laymen's books, and saints to be prayed unto and worshipped.

They answered negatively, John Maundrel adding, that wooden images were good to roast a shoulder of mutton, but evil in the church; whereby idolatry was committed.

Those articles thus answered (for their articles were one, and their answers in manner alike), the chancellor read their condemnation, and so delivered them to the sheriff. Then spake John Spicer, saying, O master sheriff, now must you be their butcher, that you may be guilty also with them of innocent blood before the Lord. This was the 23d day of March, 1556, and the 24th day of the same month, they were carried out of the common gaol to a place between Salisbury and Wilton, where were two posts set for them to be burnt at. Which men coming to the place, kneeled down, and made their prayers secretly together, and then being unclothed to their shirts, John Maundrel spake with a loud voice, Not for all Salisbury. Which words men judged to be an answer to the sheriff, who offered him the queen's pardon if he would recant. And after that in like manner spake John Spicer, saying, This is the joyfullest day that ever I saw. Thus were the three burnt at two stakes: where most constantly they gave their bodies to the fire, and their souls to the Lord, for the testimony of his truth.

As touching William Coberly, this moreover is to be noted, that his wife also, called Alice, being apprehended, was detained in the keeper's house at the same time that her husband was in prison. Where the keeper's wife, named Agnes Penicote, had secretly heated a key fire-hot, and laid it in the grass in the back-yard. So speaking to Alice Coberly to fetch her the key in all haste, the said Alice went with all speed to bring it, and taking it up in haste did piteously burn her hand. Whereupon she crying out on the sudden burning of her hand, Ah thou drab, quoth the other, thou that canst not abide the burning of the key, how wilt thou be able to abide burning thy whole body? and so she afterward revoked.

But to return again so the story of Coberly, who being at the stake, was somewhat long a burning as the wind stood: after his body was scorched with the fire, and his left arm drawn and taken from him by the violence of the fire, that the flesh being burnt to the white bone, at length he stooped over the chain, and with the right hand, which was less injured, knocked upon his breast softly, the blood and matter issuing out of his mouth. Afterward when they all thought he had been dead, suddenly he rose upright with his body again. And thus much concerning these three Salisbury martyrs.

An ACCOUNT of the DEATH of SIX other MARTYRS suffering at LONDON, whose Names follow.

ABOUT the 23d day of April, 1556, were burned in Smithfield, at one fire, these six constant martyrs of Christ, suffering for the profession of the gospel, viz. Robert Drakes, minister. William Tyns, curate. Richard Spurge, sheerman. Thomas Spurge, fuller. John Cavel, weaver. George Ambrose, fuller.

They were all of Essex, and so of the diocese of London, don, and were sent up, some by the lord Rich, and some by others at sundry times, unto Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, then lord chancellor of England, about the 22d day of March, 1555; who after a short examination, sent them, some unto the King's Bench, and others unto the Marshalsea, where they remained almost the whole year, until the death of the said bishop of Winchester, and had during that time nothing said unto them. Whereupon, after that Dr. Heath, archbishop of York, was chosen to the office of lord chancellor, four of these persecuted brethren, being now weary of this their long imprisonment, made their supplication unto the said Dr. Heath, requiring his favour and aid for their deliverance: the copy whereof here followeth.

To the Most Reverend FATHER in GOD, THOMAS, ARCHBISHOP of YORK, LORD CHANCELLOR of ENGLAND.

MAY it please your honourable good lordship, for the love of God to tender the humble suit of your lordship's poor petitioners, whose names are subscribed, who have lain in the Marshalsea for ten months or more at the commandment of the late lord chancellor, to their utter ruin, with their wives and children. In consideration whereof your lordship's said supplicants do most humbly pray and beseech your good lordship to suffer them to be brought before your honour; and there if any man of good conscience can lay any thing to our charge, we trust either to declare our innocence against their accusations, or if otherwise their accusations can be proved true and we faulty, we are ready (God helping us) with our condign punishments to satisfy the law according to your wise judgment, as we hope, full of fatherly mercy towards us and all men, according to your godly office, and in which we pray for your godly success to the good pleasure of Almighty God, Amen.

This supplication was sent (as is said) and subscribed with the names of these four under written:

RICHARD SPURGE. GEORGE AMBROSE.
THOMAS SPURGE. JOHN CAVEL.

RICHARD SPURGE.

UPON the receipt hereof, it was not long after, but sir Richard Reed, knight, then one of the officers of the court of Chancery, the 16th day of January, was sent unto the Marshalsea to examine the said four prisoners; and therefore beginning first with Richard Spurge upon certain demands, received his answers thereunto: the effect whereof was, that he with others were complained upon by the parson at Bocking; unto the lord Rich, for not coming to their parish church of Bocking, where they had inhabited; thereupon he was, by the said lord Rich, sent unto the late lord chancellor, about the 22d of March, 1555.

And farther, he said, that he came not to the church since the first alteration of the English service into Latin (Christmas day then a twelvemonth only excepted), and that because he misliked both the same and the mass also, as not consonant and agreeing with God's holy word.

Moreover he required that he might not be any more examined upon the matter, unless it pleased the lord chancellor that then was, to know his fault therein, which to him he would willingly utter.

THOMAS SPURGE.

THOMAS SPURGE being then next examined, made the same answer in effect that the other had done; confessing, that he absented himself from the church, because the word of God was not there truly taught, nor the sacraments of Christ duly administered in such sort as was prescribed by the same word. And being further examined of his belief concerning the sacrament of the altar, he said, that if any could accuse him thereof, he would then make answer as God had given him knowledge therein.

GEORGE AMBROSE.

THE like answer made George Ambrose, adding moreover, that after he had read the late bishop of Winchester's book, De vera Obedientia, with Bonner's preface thereunto annexed, inveighing both against the authority of the bishop of Rome, he did set much less by their doings than before.

JOHN CAVEL.

JOHN CAVEL agreeing in other matters with them, answered, that the cause why he did forbear coming to the church, was, that the parson there had preached two contrary doctrines. For first, in a sermon that he made at the queen's first entry to the crown, he did exhort people to believe the gospel; for it was the truth, and if they did not believe it, they should be damned. But in a second sermon, he preached that the Testament was false in forty places, which contrariety in him was a cause, amongst others, of his absenting from the church.

ROBERT DRAKES.

ABOUT the fourth day of March next after, Robert Drakes was also examined, who was parson of Thundersley, in Essex, and had there remained for the space of three years. He was first made deacon by Dr. Taylor of Hadley, at the commandment of Dr. Cramer, late archbishop of Canterbury. And within one year after (which was the third year after king Edward) he was, by the said archbishop and Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, admitted minister of God's holy word and sacraments, not after the order then in force, but after such order as was after established; and was presented to the said benefice of Thundersley by the lord Rich, at the suit of Mr. Causton and Mr. Treheron; and now notwithstanding was sent up by the said lord Rich, with the others before-mentioned; and at his coming to the bishop of Winchester, was by him demanded whether he could conform himself like a subject to the laws of this realm then in force. To whom he said, he would abide all laws that stood with the laws of God; and thereupon was committed to prison, where he, and the rest above-named did remain ever since.

The HISTORY of WILLIAM TYMS, DEACON, and CURATE of Hockley, in Essex.

IN the days of queen Mary there were two sermons preached in the woods at Hockley, which woods belonged to one Mr. Tyrel; one was called Plumborough Wood, and the other Beches Wood, and there was at the same sermons an honest man and his wife, whose name was John Gye, and servant to Mr. Tyrel at the farm called Plumborough. Shortly after it was known to Mr. Tyrel that his woods were polluted with sermons, which he took very ill, and much matter did arise about it as an unlawful assembly, which was laid to John Gye's charge, because he did not disclose that unlawful act to his master, being then in the commission of the peace, appointed at that time to keep down the gospel, which he did to the utmost, as it may appear to many of his acts.

Soon after Mr. Tyrel came to Hockley to sift out this matter, and to know who was at these preachings: And there were found many faulty; for it is supposed there were an hundred persons at the least. So it pleased Mr. Tyrel to begin first with John Gye, and asked where that naughty fellow was that served their parish, one Tymes; for it is told me, said he, that he is the cause of these naughty fellows coming into the country. Therefore I charge thee, Gye, to fetch me this naughty fellow Tymes; for thou knowest where he is. No, said Gye, I do not know. So in no wise could he make him fetch him.

Then stepped forth another of Mr. Tyrel's men, willing to please his master, whose name was Richard Sheriff, and said to him, Sir, I know where he is. Well, said his his matter, go to the constables, and charge them to bring him to me.

So this Richard Sheriff being very diligent, made sure work, and had him brought by the constables (whose names were Edward Hedge and John James) before his master.

Then Mr. Tyrel commanded all the rest to depart; and it was wisely done, for he was not able to open his mouth against Tyms without reproach; and there he kept him about three hours. But there were some that listened at the walls, and heard Mr. Tyrel say thus to Tyms.

Methinketh, said he, when I see the blessed rood, it maketh me think of God.

Why, sir, said Tyms, if an idol that is made with man's hands doth make you remember God, how much more ought the creatures of God, as man being his workmanship, or the grasse, or the trees that bring forth fruit, make you remember God?

So Mr. Tyrel ended his talk with Tyms, as it were in a heat, calling him a traitorous knave.

Why, sir, said Tyms, in king Edward's days you affirmed the truth that I do now.

Affirm! quoth Tyrel, nay, by God's body, I never thought it with my heart.

Well, said Tyms, I pray you, Mr. Tyrel, bear with me, for I have been a traitor but a while, but you have been a traitor six years.

After this Tyms was sent to London to the bishop, and from him to the bishop of Winchester, and so from him to the King's Bench, and then was Mr. Tyrel's rage over with them that were in the woods at the sermons. So Mr. Tyrel took away Gye's coat, and gave it to John Traiford, and sent him to St. Tosies to see good rule kept there.

When Tyms came before the bishop of London, there was at that time the bishop of Bath, and William Tyms was examined of his faith before them both. So mightily God wrought with this true-hearted man, that he had wherewith to answer them both; for the constables said, that brought them before the bishop, that they never heard the like. Then the bishop (as though he would have had Tyms to turn from the trial) said to the constables, I pray you give him good counsel, that he may turn from his error. My lord, said the constables, he is at a point, for he will not turn.

Then both the bishops began to be weary of him, for he had troubled them about six or seven hours. Then the bishops began to pity Tyms's case, and to flatter him, saying, Ah, good fellow, (said they) thou art bold, and thou hast a good fresh spirit, we would thou hadst learning to thy spirit. I thank you, my lords, said Tyms, and both you be learned, and I would you had a good spirit to your learning.

So thus they broke up, and sent Tyms to the bishop of Winchester, and then were Edward Hedge and John James the constables aforementioned discharged, and Tyms was commanded to the King's Bench, where he was mightily strengthened with the good men that he found there.

And thus hitherto you have heard, first upon what occasion this William Tyms was apprehended, how he was treated by Mr. Tyrel the justice, and by him sent up to the ordinary of the diocese, which was bishop Bonner; who, after some talk, and debating with the said Tyms, at length directed him to the bishop of Winchester, being then lord chancellor, and was commanded by him upon the same to the King's Bench.

Here by the way is to be understood, that Tyms as he was but a deacon, so he was but simply, or at least not priestly appareled, forasmuch as he went not in a gown, but in a coat; and his hose were of two colours, the upper part white, and the nether stocks of sheep's russet. Whereupon the prelate sending for him to come before him, and seeing his simple attire, began to mock him, saying, Ah, sirrah, are you a deacon? Yes, my lord, that I am, quoth Tyms. So methinketh, said the bishop, you are decked like a deacon. My lord, said Tyms, my vesture doth not so much vary from a deacon: but methinketh your apparel doth as much vary from an apostle.

So then there spake one of the bishop's gentlemen, My lord, (said he in mockery) give him a chair, a toast, and drink, and he will be lusty. But the bishop ordered him away, and commanded him to come before him again the next day at an hour appointed.

But Winchester, for lack of leisure, or because of sickness growing upon him, or for what cause else I know not, either would not, or could not attend unto him, but returned him again to his ordinary bishop from whence he came. So William Tyms being put off again to bishop Bonner, was placed together and coupled with the other five martyrs above-named, and with them brought together to public examination before the bishop the 21st day of March, first in the bishop's palace of London, where the said bishop, after his accustomed manner proceeded against them, inquired of them their faith upon the sacrament of the altar. To whom they answered, that the body of Christ was not in the sacrament of the altar really and corporally, after the words of consecration spoken by the priest: of which opinion they had been a long time, some later, some sooner, even as God of his mercy did call upon them unto the knowledge of his gospel.

Then the bishop's chaplains began to reason with them, but with no great authorities either of the scriptures or of the ancient fathers, as other their large conferences with the learned do already declare.

Another EXAMINATION of W. TYMS and R. DRAKES, &c. before the Bishop of LONDON.

THE 23d day of the same month of March, the bishop sent again for Tyms and Drakes, and ex officio did object unto them certain articles, the sum and manner whereof were the same which before were objected to Whitte, Green, Tudson, &c. And the 26th day of the same month he sent for the other four, administering to them also the same general articles. Unto which they all in effect answered in matters touching their faith, as did the said Bartlet Green and the rest. Other appearings they had, as the bishop's common manner of proceeding was more (as I have often said) for order and form of law, than for any zeal of justice.

But in conclusion, the 28th day of the said month, William Tyms and Robert Drakes, with the other four above named, were brought to the open consistory in St. Paul's before the said bishop of London, to be condemned for heresy.

The bishop first began in this manner: Tyms, said he, I will begin with thee first, for thou art and hast been the ringleader of these thy companions, thou hast taught them heresies, and confirmed them in their erroneous opinions, and hast endeavoured as much as in thee lieth, to make them like unto thyself. If thy fault had not tended to the hurt of others, I would then have used thee more charitably, and not have brought thee to this open rebuke. I would, according to the rule of Christ, in the 18th of Matthew, have told thee thy fault between me and thee; if thou wouldest not have heard me, I would not so have left thee, but I, with two or three others, would have exhorted thee; if that would not have served, then would I have told the church, &c. But for that thy fault is open and manifest to the world, and thou thyself remainest stout in thine error, this charitable dealing is not to be extended towards thee: I have therefore thought good to proceed by another rule, whereof St. Paul speaketh, 1 Tim. v. "Such as sin, rebuke them openly, that others may fear." For this cause art thou brought before me in the face of this people to receive judgment according to thy deserts. Let me see what thou canst say, why I should not proceed against thee as thine ordinary.

My lord, quoth Tyms, will you now give me leave to speak? Yea, quoth the bishop. Then said Tyms, My lord, I marvel that you will begin with a lie. You call me the ringleader and teacher of this company, but how untruly you have said shall shortly appear: for there is none of all these my brethren, which are brought hither as prisoners, but when they were at liberty and out of prison, prison, they dissented from you and your doings, as much as they do at this present; and for that cause they are now prisoners.

So it is evident, that they learned not their religion in prison. And as for me, I never knew them, until such time as I, by their commandment, was prisoner with them; how could I then be their ringleader and teacher? so that all the world may see how untruly you have spoken. And as for my fault which you make so grievous, whatsoever you judge of me, I am well assured that I hold none other religion than Christ preached, the apostles witnessed, the primitive church received, and now of late the apostolical and evangelical preachers of this realm have faithfully taught; for which you have cruelly burnt them, and now you seek our blood also. Proceed on hardly, by what rule you will, I oppose not, neither refuse you for mine ordinary.

Then, said the bishop, I perceive thou wilt not be counted their ringleader. How sayest thou, wilt thou submit thyself to the catholic church as an obedient child? In so doing thou shalt be received, and do well enough, otherwise thou shalt have judgment as an heretic.

Then one of the prisoners (whose name is not certainly known) said, My lord, you are no upright judge, for you judge after your own lust. But if you will judge us according to the holy Testament of Christ, which is the word of truth, we will accord to your judgment; for unto that word we wholly submit ourselves. But as for your judgment without the truth, God shall condemn. This was very earnestly expressed, insisting that they should be judged by the word of God.

At this the bishop was offended, calling him busy knave, and commanded him to hold his tongue, or else he should be had away to a place of smaller ease.

Then Tyms answered and said, My lord, I doubt not but I am of the catholic church, whatsoever you judge of me. But as for your church, you have before this day renounced it, and by corporal oath promised never to consent to the same. Contrary to which you have received into this realm the pope's authority, and therefore you are falsely perjured and forsworn all the sort of you. Besides this, you have both spoken and written very earnestly against that usurped power, and now you burn men that will not acknowledge the pope to be supreme head.

Have I? quoth the bishop, where have I written any thing against the church of Rome?

My lord, quoth Tyms, the bishop of Winchester wrote a very learned oration, intituled, De vera Obedientia, which containeth worthy matter against the Romish authority: unto which book you made a preface, inveighing against the bishop of Rome, reproving his tyranny and falshood, calling his power false and pretended. The book is extant, and you cannot deny it.

Then was the bishop somewhat ashamed, and looking upon those that were present, spake very gently, saying, Lo, here is a good matter indeed. My lord of Winchester being a very learned man, did write a book against the supremacy of the pope's holiness, and I also did write a preface before the same book, tending to the same effect. And thus did we because of the perilous times that then were. For then it was made treason by the laws of this realm, to maintain the pope's authority, and great danger it was to be suspected a favourer of the see of Rome; and therefore fear compelled us to comply with the time, for otherwise there had been no way but one. You know when any uttered his conscience in maintaining the pope's authority, he suffered death for it.

And then turning his tale upon Tyms, he said, But since that time, even since the coming in of the queen's majesty, when we might be bold to speak our conscience, we have acknowledged our faults, and my lord of Winchester shamed not to recant the same at Paul's Cross. And also thou thyself seest that I stand not in it, but willingly have submitted myself. Do thou also as we have done.

My lord, quoth Tyms, that which you have written against the supremacy of the pope, may be well approved by the scriptures. But that which you now do, is against the word of God, as I can well prove.

Then another, I suppose it was Dr. Cooke, said, Tyms, I pray thee let me talk with thee a little, for I think we two are learned alike. Thou speakest much of the scripture, and yet understandest it not. I will tell thee to whom thou mayst be compared: thou art like to one who intending to go a hunting, riseth up early in the morning, taketh his hounds, and forth he goeth up to the hills, and down into the valleys; he passeth over the fields, over hedge and ditch, he searcheth the woods and thickets; thus laboureth he all the whole day, without finding any game. At night home he cometh, weary of his travel, not having caught any thing at all; and thus fareth it with thee. Thou labourest in reading of the scriptures, thou takest the letter, but the meaning thou knowest not, and thus thy reading is as unprofitable unto thee, as hunting was unto the man that I spake of even now.

Sir, quoth Tyms, you have not well applied your similitude; for I praise God, I have not read the scriptures unprofitably: but God, I thank him, hath revealed unto me so much as I doubt not is sufficient for my salvation.

Then said the bishop, You brag much of knowledge, and yet you know nothing: you speak much of scripture, and you know not what scripture is. I pray thee tell me; how knowest thou that thing to be the word of God, which thou callest scripture?

To this answered Robert Drakes, that he knew it to be the word of God, because it shewed unto men their salvation in Christ, and doth revoke and call all men back from their wicked lives, unto a pure and undefiled conversation.

The bishop replied, that the heathen writers have taught precepts of good living, as well as the scripture, and yet their writings are not esteemed to be God's word.

Then said Tyms, The Old Testament beareth witness of those things which are written in the New; for (quoth he) there is nothing taught in the New Testament but it was fore-shewed in the law and the prophets.

I will deny all, quoth the bishop, I will deny all; what sayest thou then? Then Robert Drakes alledged a sentence in Latin out of the 59th chapter of Isaiah's prophecy: Spiritus meus qui est in te, &c. that is, "My Spirit which is in thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of the seed of thy seed from henceforth even for ever;" meaning thereby to prove, that he who had the Spirit of God, could thereby discern and judge truly which was God's word: but before he could explicate his mind, he was interrupted by the bishop, who spoke unto Dr. Pendleton, saying,

Mr. Doctor, I pray you say something to these folk that may do them some good. Then Dr. Pendleton leaning near the bishop, covered his face with both his hands, to the end he might the more easily devise what to say; but another conversation was presently brought forward, so that for that time he said nothing.

And thus much William Alsbury, witness here being present thereat, so far as he heard, hath faithfully recorded and reported. What more was said, (for he had not yet made an end) because he departed thence out of the house, he doth not know, nor did hear.

Then the bishop, after this, and such like communication, proceeded at length in form of law, causing both the articles and his answers to the same to be read and there openly read; the sum of which his confession recorded and left in his own hand-writing, is in effect as follows.

The ARTICLES for which WILLIAM TYMS, of Hockley, in Essex, was condemned in the Consistory of St. Paul's, the 28th of March, with his ANSWERS and CONFESSION upon the same.

FIRST, I did truly confess, and believe that I was baptized in the true catholic church of Christ; when I was baptized, there was the element and the word of God, according to Christ's institution. And my godfathers and godmothers did promise for me, that I should forsake the devil, and all his works, and that I should keep God's commandments, and believe all the articles of the christian faith; all which I do believe at this day, and with God's help I trust to do while I live; for it was not the wickedness of the minister that made the sacrament of none effect, &c.

Item, I confessed two sacraments, and but two in Christ's true church; that is, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and that Christ is present with his sacraments, as it pleaseth him.

Item, I confessed, that Christ hath a visible church, wherein the word of God is truly preached, and the sacraments truly administered.

Item, I confessed the see of Rome to be as the late bishop of Winchester hath written in his book De vera Obedientia, to which I said unto the bishop of London, that he had made a godly preface; and also John Bale hath plainly declared in his book, called, The image of both churches, even so much as I believe thereof.

Item, I confessed the mass to be blasphemy to Christ's death and passion.

Item, I confessed that in the sacrament of the altar, Christ is not present either spiritually or corporally; but as they use it, it is an abominable idol.

Last of all, I confessed the bishop of London to be mine ordinary.

After this the bishop fell to intreaty and persuasions, earnestly exhorted him to revoke his heresies (as he termed them), and to reform himself unto the church of Rome, and not to stick so much to the literal sense of the scriptures, but to use the interpretations of the old fathers.

To which Tyms answered, I will not reform myself thereunto. And I thank God for this day; for I trust he will turn your cursings into blessings.

And furthermore asking this question, he said; And what have you to maintain the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, but only the bare letter?

We have (quoth the bishop) the catholic church.

No, said Tyms, you have the popish church of Rome for you, for which you are perjured and forsworn. And the see of Rome is the see of Antichrist; and therefore to that church I will not conform myself, nor once consent unto it.

Then the bishop seeing his constant boldness to be unmoveable, proceeding to his condemnation, pronounced the sentence definitive upon him, and gave him over to the secular power.

Afterwards calling for Robert Drakes, he used towards him the like manner of exhortation that he did before.

To whom Drakes replied, As for your church of Rome, I utterly defy and deny it, with all the works thereof, even as I deny the devil and all his works.

The bishop then using his accustomed order of law, with his like exhortations, at last gave him the like blessing that Tyms had, and so charged the sheriff with him.

Thomas Spurge being next demanded if he would return to the catholic church, said as follows; As for your church of Rome, I do utterly deny it: but to the true catholic church I am content to return, and continue in the same, whereof I believe the church of Rome to be no part or member.

Then in short, calling the rest in their turn, and upon the like demands receiving the like answers, the said bishop gave unto each of them their several judgments; and so ridding his bloody hands, committed them unto the custody of the sheriffs of London, who sent them unto Newgate, where they all went most joyfully, abiding there the Lord's good time, wherein they should seal this their faith with the shedding of their blood; which they most stoutly and willingly performed, in the month of April.

L E T T E R I.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his faithful Sister in the Lord, AGNES GLASCOCK, Parishioner in the Town of Hockley.

THE grace, mercy, and peace of God our Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, with the sweet comfort of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the performance of his will, to your everlasting comfort, be with you my dear sister Glascock, both now and evermore, Amen.

My most dear and entirely beloved sister, yea mother, I might right well call you for the motherly care which you have always had for me, I have most heartily commended myself unto you, giving God most hearty thanks for you, that he hath given you so loving a heart to Christ's poor gospel, and his poor afflicted flock for the same: and as you have full godly begun, so I beseech God to give you power to go forward in the same, and never more to look back, fearing neither fire nor sword; and then I warrant you, you have not far to run.

And now (my dear heart) remember well what I have taught you when I was present with you, and also written being absent, and no doubt we shall shortly meet again with a most joyful meeting. I go on Friday next to the bishop of London's coal-house, which is the 20th day of March, where I think it will be hard for any of my friends to speak with me. However I trust I shall not long tarry there, but shortly after be carried up after my dear brethren and sisters, which are gone before me into heaven in a fiery chariot: therefore now I take my leave of you till we meet in heaven; and hasten you after.

I have tarried a great while for you, and seeing you are so long making ready, I will tarry no longer for you. You shall find me merrily singing, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Sabbath, at my journey's end. Therefore now (my dear heart) make good haste, and loiter not by the way, lest night take you, and so you be shut out of the gate with the foolish virgins. And now (my sister) in witness that I have taught you nothing but the truth, here I write my name with my blood for a testimonial unto you, that I will seal the simple doctrine which I have taught you, with the rest. And thus fare you well: and God defend you from Antichrist, and all his ministers, the false priests, Amen.

These words following were written with his own blood.

Continue in prayer.

Ask in faith.

And obtain your desire.

L E T T E R II.

From WILLIAM TYMS, comforting his Sister GLASCOCK, being in great Sorrow and Repentance for going to the Mass.

GOD be merciful unto you, pardon and forgive all your sins, and send you faith to believe the same, that you may be partaker of his heavenly kingdom, Amen.

My dear sister, I have me most heartily commended unto you; and as I have lamented your falling from God, by being partaker with that idolatrous priest; so have I, since I heard of your earnest repentance, very much rejoiced, and also praised Almighty God for his mercy shewed unto you, in that he hath not left you to yourself, but since your denial he hath shewed his mercy on you, by looking back on you as he did, and bitterly to weep for your sins: whereas if God had left you to yourself, you had run forward from one evil to another, till at length your heart would either have been hardened, or else you would have despaired of the mercy of God.

God. And seeing that God hath been so merciful unto you as he hath been, be ye not unthankful unto him for the same. For I certify you that your sorrowful heart that you have had, doth declare unto me that God hath pardoned and forgiven all your sins for the blood-shedding of that immaculate Lamb, Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour.

Therefore as Peter, after the time that Christ had forgiven him his sin, did boldly confess Christ before all his enemies; even so, my dear heart in the Lord, seeing that God hath so mercifully pardoned and forgiven you your sins, now cleave unto him, and be at defiance with his enemies the papists; and as they do bear witness with their father the devil, by going to the church, and shedding the innocent blood of those that will not go with them; even so do you bear witness with Christ, by not coming there: for all those that do go thither shall be partakers of their brethren's blood, that is shed for the testimony of Christ, except they repent and amend; which grace that they may so do, I beseech the eternal God for his Christ's sake, if it be his good will, to give them in his good time. And the same good God that hath been so merciful unto you to call you to repentance, him I beseech to keep you in his fear and love, that you may always have affiance in him, and evermore seek his honour and glory to your everlasting comfort in Christ, Amen. Thus fare you well. From the King's-bench, this 28th of August.

LETTER III.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you both now and evermore, Amen.

Dear sisters, I have me most heartily recommended unto you, thanking you for the great kindness shewed unto me in this time of mine imprisonment, and not only unto me, but also unto my poor wife and children; and also for the great kindness that you shew unto all the living saints that are dispersed abroad, and are obliged to hide their heads for fear of this cruel persecution.

Dear sisters, when I do remember your constancy in Christ, I call to remembrance the constancy of divers godly women, as Susannah, Judith, Esther, and the good wife of Nabal, that through her godly conditions saved both her husband's life, and all her household, when David had thought to have slain him for his churlish answer that he sent him. Also I do remember Rahab that lodged the Lord's spies, how God preserved her and her whole household for her faithfulness that she bare to God's people. So I do believe that when the Lord shall send his angel to destroy these idolatrous Egyptians here in England, and shall find the blood of the Lamb sprinkled on the door-post of your hearts, he will go by and not hurt you, but spare your whole households for your sakes. Also I remember Mary Magdalen, how faithful she was; for she was the first that preached the resurrection of Christ. Remember the blessed martyr, Anne Askew, in our time, and follow her example of constancy, and for the love of God take heed that in no case you consent to idolatry, but stand fast to the Lord, as the good woman did that had her seven sons put to death before her face, and she always comforting them, yea, and last of all suffered death herself, for the testimony of her God, which is the living God. Thus I beseech God to send you grace and strength to stand fast to the Lord, as she did, and then you shall be sure of the same kingdom that she is sure of; to which kingdom I pray God bring both you and me, Amen.

By me,
prisoner in the King's-bench,

LETTER IV.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his FRIENDS in HOCKLEY.

THE grace of God the Father, through the merits of his dear Son Jesus, our Lord and only Saviour, with the continual aid of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the performance of his will, to our everlasting comfort, be with you my dear brethren, both now and evermore, Amen.

My dearly beloved, I beseech God to reward the great goodness that you have shewed unto me, seven-fold into your bosoms; and as you have always had a most godly love unto his word, even so I beseech him to give you grace to love your own souls, and then I trust you will flee from all those things that should displease our good and merciful God, and hate and abhor all the company of those that would have you to worship God any otherwise than is contained in his holy word. And beware of those masters of idolatry, that is, these papistical priests. My dear brethren, for the tender mercy of God, remember well what I have said unto you, and also written, which I am now ready to seal with my blood. I praise God that ever I lived to see the day, and blessed be my good and merciful God, that ever he gave me a body to glorify his name. And, dear hearts, I do now write unto you for none other cause, but to put you in remembrance that I have not forgotten you, to the end that I would not have you forget me, but to remember well what I have simply by word of mouth and writing taught you. Which although it were most simply done, yet truly, as your own conscience beareth me record: and therefore in any case take heed that you do not that thing which your own conscience doth condemn. Therefore come out of Sodom and go heavenward with the servants and martyrs of God, lest you be partakers of the vengeance of God that is coming upon this wicked nation from which the Lord God defend you, and send us a joyful meeting in the kingdom of heaven; unto which God bring you all, Amen. Thus now I take my leave of you for ever in this world, except I be burned amongst you, which thing is uncertain unto me as yet.

By me in Newgate, your poorest and most unworthy brother in Christ,
Newgate, April 12. W. TYMS.

LETTER V.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his PARISHIONERS, giving Thanks for their Charity shewed to his Wife, being brought to Bed of a Child in his Captivity.

THE everlasting peace of our dear Lord and only Saviour Jesus Christ, with the sweet comfort of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the increase of your faith, to the performance of his will, and to your eternal comfort in the everlasting kingdom of heaven, be with you, my dear brethren and sisters, both now and ever, Amen.

My most dear brethren and sisters in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, I have me most heartily commended unto you with hearty thanks for all the great liberality that you have shewed unto me, and especially now in the time of my necessity, when that God hath sent my poor wife a child in my captivity; which is no little care to me, so to provide, that I might keep both the child and my wife from the antichristian-church: which thing I thank my God, through his most gracious providence, I have yet done, though it be (as ye know) great charge, not to me, but to the congregation of God, and it grieveth me that I have been so chargeable to them as I have been, and especially you my dear brethren, I being so unworthy a member as I have been, and also of so small acquaintance: but such is the merciful goodness of God, so as to move your hearts with charity towards me. And as he hath moved your hearts so to do, even so I beseech God to give you power to forsake and reject all things which are displeasing in his sight, to do all things which are requisite to a christian christian; and fend you grace to go forwards in the same, as you have godly begun, neither fearing fire nor sword. And, my most dear hearts, remember well the simple plain doctrine which I have taught you, and also written unto you, which was the truth, and for a testimony of the same I trust that you shall shortly hear, or else see that I will seal the same with my blood.

And in the mean time I desire you all to remember me in your prayers, as I know you do, and as with God's help I will do for you, that God, for his dear Son Christ's sake, will so finish the days of our pilgrimage, that we may rest together with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the everlasting kingdom of heaven, to which I beseech the eternal Lord for his Christ's sake to bring both you and all your's, Amen.

By me, WILLIAM TYMS.

LETTER. VI.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his Sisters COLFOX and AGNES GLASCOCK.

GRACE and peace from God the Father of all mercy, through the merits of our dear Saviour Jesus Christ, be perceived and felt in the hearts of you, my dearly beloved sisters in the Lord, by the mighty working of the Holy Ghost the Comforter, both now and evermore, Amen.

My most dear and intirely beloved sisters in the Lord, after my most hearty commendations, according to my most bounden duty, I do as I am accustomed, or at least ought to do, that is, I give you warning of your enemies, which are the priests, and take good heed of them, for they serve a crafty master; yea, and as St. Peter saith, He sleepeth not, but goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. For your old familiar friends, or worldly companions, when they see that you will not run into the idol's temples with them, it will seem a strange thing unto them, that ye run not to the same excess of riot, as St. Peter saith, and therefore they will speak evil of you, rail on you, and persecute you.

But, my dear sisters, let it not trouble you, for it is but to try you, and let it not seem a strange thing unto you. But when they do so, remember wherefore it is, and for whose sake, even because you will not forsake God as they do. For the hatred they bear you, is for the word of God, and then it is God's cause, and I tell you he will revenge it. And therefore if ye be railed on, and troubled for his sake, think yourselves most happy. For if you suffer with the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, then shall ye be sure to be partakers of the same joy that they are in. Yea, you have heard by the word of God, how cruelly the tyrants have always persecuted the true members of Christ, as he himself hath promised that they shall do unto the end of the world.

By the way I will bring to your remembrance the holy martyr St. Stephen, who for favouring, maintaining, and defending the same doctrine that we now suffer for, was called a blasphemer, and stoned to death at Jerusalem. And Christ's apostles were diversly afflicted all over the world for the same by this viperous generation. Antipas the faithful witness of Christ was slain at Pergamus. Jason for receiving Paul and Silas, with other disciples and teachers of the gospel, was brought before the council at Thessalonica, and accused for a seditious traitor against Cæsar. No marvel therefore though at this day we are vexed on the same sort, maintaining the same cause, and favouring the teachers thereof. Is there any other reward following the true servants of God now, than hath been aforesaid? No surely, for so hath Christ promised. And if they have persecuted him, they needs must persecute his members; if they have called the Master of the house Beelzebub, so will they do his household; "You shall be hated of all men, (saith Christ) for my name's sake."

It is no new thing, my dear hearts, to see the true members of Christ handled as in our days they are, as it is not unknown to you how they are cruelly treated, and blasphemed without any reasonable cause. For heretics must they be taken, who follow not their traditions. And then they may as well call Christ an heretic, for he never went a procession with the cope, cross, or candlestick. He never censured image, nor sang Latin service. He never sat in confession. He never preached of purgatory nor of the pope's pardons. He never honoured saints, nor prayed for the dead. He never said mass, mattins, nor even-song. He never commanded to fast Friday nor vigil, lent nor advent. He never hallowed church nor chalice, ashes nor palms, candles nor bells. He never made holy water nor holy bread, with such like. But such dumb ceremonies, not having the express commandment of God, he calleth the leaven of the pharisees, and damnable hypocrisy; admonishing his disciples to beware of them. He curseth all those that add to his word such beggarly shadows, wiping their names clean out of the book of life. St. Paul saith, they have no portion with Christ, which entangle themselves again with such yokes of bondage.

Therefore, my dear hearts, seeing that our good God hath, by the light of his holy word, delivered us from all such dark, blind, dumb, beggarly traditions of men, stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free, bring not yourselves again into the yoke of bondage. But let us always be ready, looking for the coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, which, as St. Peter saith, "will come as a thief in the night." And our captain Christ saith "If the good man of the house knew what hour the thief would come, he would surely watch."

Therefore, my dear hearts, be of good comfort, although the world rage ever so sore against you. And for your comfort mark well the great mercy of God, who according to his promise for the weakness of our nature hath so assuaged the heat of the fire, that our dear brethren that have gone before us, to the fight of all men, have found it rather to be joy than pain. And think you surely God will be as merciful unto you, as he hath been unto them; and say with St. Paul, Rom. viii. "Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or hunger, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? as it is written, For thy sake are we killed all the day long," &c.

Therefore, my dear sisters, if to save your lives, any dissembling gospellers would have you to go to the idol's temple with them, say unto them, No; for my master Christ saith, Matth. x. "He that would save his life shall lose it." And in another place to comfort us, he saith, "There shall not one hair fall from your head, without it be your heavenly Father's will." And therefore say that you will not be of that sort, that be neither hot nor cold, lest God should spue you out of his mouth. But make them this answer, saying, St. Paul saith, 2 Cor. vi. "Bear no strange yoke with the unbelievers. For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness, what company hath light with darkness, what concord hath Christ with Belial, or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? How agreeth the temple of God, with images?" And ye are the temple of God, as God saith, I will dwell among them, walk among them, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and separate yourselves, saith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing: so will I receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord."

Thus mine own bowels in the Lord, as I began, so make I an end, bidding you beware of your enemies, and take up your cross, and follow your captain Christ in at the narrow gate here by persecution, and then you shall be sure to reign and rejoice with him in his everlasting kingdom, which he himself hath purchased with his own most precious blood: to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour both now and for ever, Amen.

By me, WILLIAM TYMS.

L E T T E R VII.

From WILLIAM TYMS, exhorting all GOD's faithful Servants to eschew the SOCIETY of IDOLATERS, and GOD's ENEMIES.

GRACE be with you, and peace from the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

I thank my God with all remembrance of you always in my prayers for you, and pray with gladness, because of the fellowship which ye have in the gospel, from the first day that I knew you, until this day; and I am surely certified of this, that he who hath begun a good work in you, shall go forth with it, until the day of Jesus Christ, as it becometh me to judge of you; whom I have in my heart, and as companions of grace with me, even in my bonds. And thus I pray, that your love may increase more and more in knowledge. Good brethren, I most heartily desire God, that as you have a willing mind to comfort my vile earthly body in this time of persecution, so he will strengthen you with his Holy Spirit, that my imprisonment do not discomfort, but rather strengthen and comfort you, to see the goodness of God shewed unto me, in that being a man without learning, and brought before three such bishops concerning worldly wisdom, he gave me both mouth and wisdom; inasmuch that the bishop of London went away in a great haste from me; and after that he sent his man with a Bible, turning to the 9th chapter to the Hebrews, and the bishop of Bath looking on it, said, What meaneth my lord? this maketh nothing for his purpose. Then I looked on it, and said, My lord seeth that I was weak, and therefore he hath holpen me; for here he hath condemned the sacrifice of your mass: for you say that you offer a daily sacrifice in your mass, both for the quick and the dead; and here St. Paul saith, "Without blood-shedding there is no forgiveness of sins;" therefore that is here condemned. He answered, Yea, saith he so? So say all such heretics, and so forth, with many like arguments, which my neighbours that heard them can declare, therefore I leave them. This have I written that you should not be afraid, but call upon God as he hath commanded us to ask and we shall have; seek and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you. Also he hath commanded us to call on him in the day of trouble, and he hath promised to hear us. Therefore if we have not mouth and wisdom at his hand, the fault is in us, that either we will not repent us of our wickedness, and amend our lives, or else we be unfaithful, and believe not the promises of God; and so we ourselves are the cause that this wisdom is lacking in us. Therefore let us repent and amend our lives, and God is merciful. And in any case, as I have always said unto you, since I first knew you, so say I now, beware of idolatry, and of your good intents; if not, mark what hath followed upon them that have left God's commandments, and done their own good intents. Remember when the children of Israel had made them a golden calf, did not God say they had marred all, and would have destroyed them, had not Moses earnestly prayed for them? I let many other places alone that prove the wrath of God to come upon the people for idolatry: therefore as we will avoid the wrath of God, let us keep unstained from it. You have example out of the Old Testament, how loth the godly fathers were to be partakers with the wicked: and yet to see how little we regarded it, it would make any christian man's heart to weep. God send us more grace.

First look in the 11th. and 12th. of Genesis; Abraham, because he would not be partaker of their idolatry, fled from the people of Chaldea, being his native country. And in the 19th. of Genesis, Lot at the commandment of the angels departed from Sodom, lest he tarrying with the Sodomites should have been consumed with them. In the 21st. of Genesis, Sarah would not suffer Ishmael, who was given to mocking, to keep company with her son Isaac, lest he should also become a mocker. Look in the 16th. of Numbers; Moses at God's appointment commanded the people to depart from the dwelling-places of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, lest they also should be all wrapped in their sins, and so perish among them. So do I, even as Moses commanded them that they should not keep company with those wicked people, lest the vengeance of God should light on them; so do I (I say) give you warning that you should not keep company with the idolaters, in their idolatrous temples, lest the wrath of God come upon you to destroy you.

Look what St. Paul saith in the second epistle, and the sixth chapter to the Corinthians: "Set yourselves (saith he) therefore at large, and bear no strange yoke with the unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? what company hath light with darkness? what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? How agreeth the temple of God with images? And ye are the temple of God, as saith God; I will dwell among them, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and separate yourselves, saith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing."

Good brethren, mark what cometh of keeping company with the wicked. Syrach saith, "He that toucheth pitch, shall be defiled therewith; and he that keepeth company with the proud, shall clothe himself with pride." Even so he that is familiar with idolaters, cannot be unstained with idolatry; except he do it to win them to Christ, as there be but a few that do. Yea, it may not be where idolatry is openly committed, as for an example; Peter, so long as he continued with Christ and Christ's disciples, continued in the truth, preached the truth, confessed openly Christ to be the Son of the living God, and promised that he would not only go to prison, but also to very death with him: but when he came once into the court of the bishop's house, he straightway was stricken with such fear, by a poor maiden, and a simple ruffian (such a one as my lord of London hath, that said, By God's blood, if I meet with any of these vile heretics, I will thrust an arrow in him) that when, I say, he was amongst them, he denied his master, swore that he never knew him, whom he, before he came there, boldly confessed before all men: and again, after that he had repented him of his wicked deed, he boldly preached to the unbelieving Jews, commanding them, among other his godly exhortations, to save themselves from that untoward generation. How many of our priests before this storm of persecution, when the gospel was truly preached, were bold, and could say, They would die rather than deny their master! but when they come once into the bishops houses, they preach no more Christ, but utterly deny him: therefore I pray God keep them from thence, or else send them more grace and strength. It is needful to pray; therefore watch in prayer.

Paul, all the while he was among the bishops, was a cruel persecutor; but after he was called by God from the bishops, he became a true preacher: therefore God keep all christian men out of the hands of our bishops. St. Paul, in the fifteenth to the Romans, saith, I dare not speak any of those things that Christ hath not wrought by me. He saith also, Rom. xvi. "I beseech you, brethren, mark them that make division, and give occasion of evil, contrary to the doctrine that ye have learned, and avoid them: for they that are such serve not the Lord Jesus Christ, but their own bellies, and with sweet and flattering words deceive the hearts of the simple." Our master Christ himself hath given us warning which they be; for he hath set the plain mark on them, in the 24th. of Matthew, "If they say, here is Christ, or there is Christ, believe them not. If they say he is in the desert, go not forth. If they say he is in the secret place, believe them not." And I pray you where can he be more secret, than in so small a piece of bread? For my lord of London, like a liar, said to me, that after the words be spoken, there remaineth neither bread nor wine. Then I asked him what he said to David, where he saith, "Thou shalt not suffer thy Holy One to see corruption." How say you to that? Will not the sacrament of the altar putrify or corrupt? He answered, Yes. I asked him, what it was that did corrupt, corrupt, if there were neither bread nor wine. He answered, and said the accidents. I said unto him, It was a mad accident without substance: for you say, there is neither bread nor wine, and then there is nothing to corrupt; with many such like arguments.

Therefore beware of them, for they go about to deceive you with such arguments. Say not but ye be warned, and a great deal the more worthy of your damnation, if they deceive you, because you have had so much warning. Repent ye betimes of your sinful lives, and amend, and then no doubt but God will either turn their hearts, or else take them away, or else he will give us that which he promised to his disciples, if we be contented to take the same reward they had. And if we disdain the one, let us not look for the other. For he that will be the father's heir, must be contented to receive his father's correction. For St. Paul saith in the 12th to the Hebrews, "If we be not under correction, whereof all are partakers, then are we bastards and not sons."

And you know what belongeth to a bastard; he shall not be his father's heir. And if we remember ourselves well, how negligent we have been to our father's commandment, we shall find ourselves worthy to be corrected at his hand. If we refuse his correction, he will refuse us to be his sons. I pray you look what he promised to his disciples, and I pray you also look how willingly they received it: and so must we do if we will be partakers with them. First let us see what Christ promised to his disciples. Look in the tenth chapter of St. Matthew, and there shall you see these words, "Behold, I send you forth as sheep among wolves. Be wise therefore as serpents, and innocent as doves. Beware of men, for they shall deliver you up to the councils, and shall scourge you in their synagogues: ye shall be brought before the head-rulers and kings for my name's sake. But when they put you up, take ye no thought how or what you shall speak: for it shall be given you in the same hour what you shall speak. For it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of my Father," &c. Read the whole chapter, for it is very comfortable to a christian man; and mark it well, and you shall find what we ought to do in the time of persecution. Also look into the fourth chapter of the second epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, where it is said, "For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might appear in our mortal flesh." Thus have you heard that St. Paul doth boast of persecution; even so should we, for it is the way to bring us to rest.

Therefore let us strive to enter in at the narrow gate, and let us remember the saying of St. Paul in the 21st chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, when he was going to Jerusalem. When he was in the house of Philip the Evangelist, there came in a prophet, and took off his girdle, and bound his hands and his feet, saying, "Thus shall they do with the man that owneth this girdle, when he cometh to Jerusalem." When the disciples heard that, they would have persuaded him that he should not go thither. Here you shall see what answer this pastor made them; he was a faithful shepherd; "What do ye weeping and breaking of my heart? I am not only ready to be bound, but also to die at Jerusalem, for the name of the Lord Jesus."

Yet I think there are some that will say, that I needed not to have been taken, if I would have kept me out of the way. But I say unto them, that the shrinking away of so many of our shepherds as are gone, maketh so many of the flock to scatter; which will be required at their hands, by the master of the sheep. What will he say to them on the day of account, when they shall come to receive their wages? He shall say to them, Depart from me ye wicked hirelings, for when ye saw the wolf come, ye ran away, and left my sheep in the wilderness. If you had been good shepherds, you would rather have lost your lives than have lost one sheep committed to your charge, through your fault. And I pray you, what case are the sheep in, when the shepherd runneth away from them? I need not tell you, you know the danger that followeth so well.

Therefore let us pray God to send us faithful shepherds, and also obedient sheep, that will not hear a stranger's voice. I would all men would mark well the saying of St. Paul in the eighth chapter of his epistle to the Romans, where he thus saith, "Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written, For thy sake are we killed all the day long, and are counted as sheep appointed to be slain: nevertheless, we overcome strongly through his help that loved us. Yea, I am sure, that neither death nor life, neither angels nor rule, nor power, nor things present, nor things to come, neither height nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God," &c. Also he saith in another place, "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution," 2 Tim. iii. Thus I prove it to be our heavenly Father's rod: therefore let us thankfully receive it like obedient children, and then our Father will love us.

Yet hear what St. Peter saith in his first epistle, and the fourth chapter, "Dearly beloved, (saith he) be not troubled in this heat which is now come among you to try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you; but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's passions, that when his glory appeareth you may be merry and glad. If ye be railed on for the name of Christ, happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory, and the Spirit of God resteth upon you. On their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified." Here St. Peter saith, it is no strange thing; and that I have partly proved before, because we have nothing else promised us in this world.

Therefore let us call on God for grace. Be ye sure that they can do nothing to us, till God permit it. As for example, look in the first book of Samuel, chap. xix. you shall see how Saul persecuted David, purposing to kill him: but his labour was in vain.

Also in the 19th chapter of the first book of Kings, Jezebel threatened and sware to slay Elias, but the Lord preserved him. Also in the second chapter of Job, you see that Satan could do nothing to Job till God suffered him, neither exercise his cruelty any further than God had appointed him. The godly woman Susannah, through the false accusation of the wicked judges, was even at a point to die, yet God wonderfully delivered her. This have I written to put you in remembrance, that man can do no more than is the will of God: therefore let us not resist his will, but refer all to him: and let us be doing that thing that God hath commanded us in his holy word.

Dear brethren, for the blood of Christ refuse not the cross of Christ, but remember the saying of the godly man David in his 119th Psalm, where he saith, "It is good for me that I have been in trouble, that I may learn thy statutes." In the same place he saith, "Before I was in trouble I went wrong, but now I have kept thy word." Even so it is in trouble with us, for the word of God was never so sweet and comfortable as it is now that we are in trouble. Also St. Paul saith in the fifth chapter to the Romans, "We rejoice in tribulation: for we know that tribulation bringeth patience, patience bringeth experience, experience bringeth hope, and hope maketh not ashamed."

Also I pray remember the saying of St. Paul in the first chapter of the second epistle to Timothy, where he saith, "Be not ashamed to testify the Lord; neither be ashamed of me." Even so I say unto you, dear brethren, be not ashamed of my imprisonment, neither sorry, but rejoice with me, that it hath pleased God of his goodness to call me to such a dignity, as this shall be unto me, if I may have his grace to lose my life (which I regard as most vile) for his name's sake: for then I shall be sure to find it again with advantage. Therefore I desire you all that you will pray with me unto Almighty God, that he of his merciful goodness will send me his grace and strength, that I may continue unto the end; as I will pray for you, that God will preserve you from all the wicked ways of Antichrist, and strengthen and comfort you, if it be his good pleasure, that you shall suffer any thing for his name's sake, as he hath faithfully promised to do.

And I certify you, that if all men knew the comfort they should receive at the hand of God being in prison, I think there would come more to prison than there do. For surely we find such comfort at the hand of God since we have been in prison, that we had rather die than be abroad to see the idolatry that is committed among them that are abroad; beside the seeking of one another's blood, with other wickedness too much; God fend me more grace. But I trust, among you there be none such: and if there be, repent and amend, lest it be verified in you, that which is spoken by the prophet Jeremy, the second chapter, where he saith, "My people hath committed too great evils: they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and digged them pits; pits (I say) that are broken, and can hold no water." Also in the seventh chapter he saith, "Hear not the words of the prophets that preach their own dreams." Good brethren, beware of those false prophets that I have given you warning of.

Dearly beloved, here I make an end for this time, desiring the same health both of body and soul unto you all that I would have myself, and I end with the same that St. Peter saith in the fifth chapter of his first epistle: "Submit yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you when the time is come. Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you. Be sober and watch, for your adversary the devil like a roaring lion walketh about seeking whom he may devour, whom resist steadfast in faith:" remembering that ye do but fulfil the same afflictions, that are appointed to your brethren that are in the world. The God of all grace that called you unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, shall himself, after you have suffered a little affliction, make you perfect, shall settle, strengthen, and establish you. To him be glory and dominion for ever, and while the world endureth, Amen.

Greet one another with an holy kiss of love. Peace be with you all which are in Christ Jesus. I pray you all say, Amen.

There are in the same prison where I am, the bishop of St. David's, Dr. Taylor, of Hadley, Mr. Philpot, and my singular good father Mr. Bradford, with five others, laymen of Suffex.

I desire some good brother to write this over again, for I wrote it (as I do many times) with fear. For if the keepers had seen me, they would have taken it from me, and my pen and ink also.

Good brethren, I am kept alone, and yet I thank God he comforteth me past all the comfort of any man: for I thank him, I was never merrier in Christ.

By me; prisoner in the King's-bench,

WILLIAM TYMS.

ABOUT this time certain commissioners, assigned by the queen and council, came to Norfolk, (as they did to other counties) to inquire after matters of religion: unto which commissioners there was a supplication then exhibited by some well disposed men dwelling about those parts. Which supplication, for the worthy matter contained in it, I thought proper here to insert.

The SUPPLICATION exhibited by certain INHABITANTS of the COUNTY of NORFOLK, proper to be read and observed by all MEN.

IN most humble and lowly wise, we beseech your honours, right honourable commissioners, to tender and pity the humble suit of us poor men, and true, faithful and obedient subjects, who as we have ever heretofore, so intend we, with God's grace, to continue in christian obedience unto the end, and (according to the word of God) with all reverent fear of God, to do our bounden duty to all those superior powers, whom God hath appointed over us, doing as St. Paul saith, Rom. xiii. "Let every soul be subject to the superior powers. For there is no power but of God: but those powers that are, are ordained of God. Wherefore whosoever resisteth the powers, the same resisteth God, and they that resist get themselves judgment." These lessons (right honourable commissioners) we have learned of the holy word of God, in our mother tongue.

First, That the authority of a king, queen, lord, and other their officers under them, is no tyrannical usurpation, but a just, holy, lawful, and necessary estate for a man to be governed by, and that the same is of God, the fountain and author of righteousness.

Secondly, That to obey the same in all things not against God, is to obey God; and to resist them is to resist God. Therefore, as to obey God in his ministers and magistrates bringeth life; so to resist God in them bringeth punishment and death. The same lesson have we learned of St. Peter, 1 Pet. ii. saying, "Be ye subject to all human ordinances for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king, as supreme, or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him, for the punishment of evil-doers, and for the praise of them that do well. For so is the will of God, that with well-doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men. As free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God."

Wherefore considering with ourselves, both that the magistrates' power is of God, and that for the Lord's sake we are bound by christian obedience unto them, having now presently a commandment, as though it were from the queen's majesty; with all humble obedience due to the regal power and authority ordained of God (which we acknowledge to stand wholly and perfectly in her grace), and with due reverence unto her grace's commissioners, we humbly beseech you with patience and pity to receive this our answer unto this commandment, given unto us.

First, Right honourable commissioners, we have considered ourselves to be not only Englishmen, but also christians, and therefore bound by the holy vow made to God in our baptism, to prefer God's honour in all things, and that all obedience (not only of us mortal men, but even of the very angels and heavenly spirits) is due unto God's word; inasmuch that no obedience can be true and perfect, either before God or man, that fully and wholly agreeth not with God's word.

Then have we weighed the commandment concerning the restitution of the late abolished Latin service, given unto us to dissent and disagree from God's word; and to command manifest impiety, and the overthrow of godliness and true religion, and to import a subversion of the regal power of this our native country and realm of England, with the bringing in of the Romish bishop's supremacy, with all errors, superstitions, and idolatry, wasting of our goods and bodies, destroying of our souls, bringing with it nothing but the severe wrath of God, which we already feel, and fear lest the same shall be more fiercely kindled upon us. Wherefore we humbly protest, that we cannot be persuaded, that the same wicked commandment should come from the queen's majesty, but rather from some other, abusing the queen's goodness and favour, and studying to work some mischief against the queen, the crown, and the realm, to please with it the Romish bishop, at whose hands the same thinketh hereafter to be advanced.

As the Agagite Haman wrought maliciously against the noble king Ahasuerus, and as the princes of Babel wrought against the good king Darius; so think we the queen's most gentle heart to be abused by some, who seeking themselves and their own vain glory, procure such commandments as are against the glory of God. For we cannot have so evil an opinion of her majesty, that she should subvert the most godly and holy religion, (so accordingly to God's word set forth by the most noble, virtuous, and innocent king, our late most dear king Edward, her grace's brother) except she were wonderfully abused; who, as hating reformation, will rather the destruction of all others, than acknowledge their errors, and to be according to God's word reformed. For truly, the religion lately set forth by king Edward,

Edward, is such in our consciences, as every christian man is bound to confess to be the truth of God, and every member of Christ's church here in England must needs embrace the same in heart, and confess it with mouth, and (if need require) lose and forsake not only land, and possessions, riches, wife, children, and friends; but also (if God will so call them) gladly to suffer all manner of persecution, and to lose their lives in the defence of God's word and truth set out amongst us. For our Saviour Christ requireth the same of us, saying, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and my word before this adulterous and sinful generation, the Son of man will also be ashamed of him, when he shall come in the glory of his Father with the holy angels." And again he saith, "Whosoever will confess me before men, I will confess him before my Father which is in heaven. And whosoever will deny me before men, I will also deny him before my Father that is in heaven. And whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever shall rail against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him."

We humbly beseech the queen's majesty, and you her honourable commissioners, be not offended with us, for confessing this truth of God, so straightly given us in charge of Christ; neither bring upon us that great sin that never shall be forgiven, and shall cause our Saviour Jesus Christ, in the great day of judgment, before his heavenly Father and all his angels, to deny us, and to take from us the blessed price and ransom of his blood wherewith we are redeemed.

For in that day, neither the queen's highness, nor you, nor any man shall be able to excuse us, nor to purchase a pardon of Christ for this horrible sin and blasphemy of casting aside and condemning his word. We cannot agree nor consent unto this so horrible a sin; but we beseech God for his mercy to give us and all men grace, most earnestly to flee from it, and rather (if the will of God be so) to suffer all extremity and punishment in this world, than to incur such damnation before God.

Manasses, who restored again the wickedness of idolatrous religion, (before put down by Ezechias his father) brought the wrath of God upon the people: so that the scripture saith, 2 Kings xxiii. "Notwithstanding the reformation made by Josias, the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath wherewith he was angry against Judah, because of the provocation with which Manasses provoked him. And the Lord said, Even Judah will I cast away from my presence, as I cast away Israel: and I will cast away this city of Jerusalem, and the house whereof I said, My name shall be there." Jeroboam, who at Bethel and Dan erected a new-found service of God, and not only sinned himself, but also made all Israel to sin with him, so that not only was he damned for commanding, but the wrath of God came upon all Israel for obeying that his ungodly commandment: yet was it not so heinous an offence to bring in an idolatry never yet heard of, as after reformation made by the godly kings and princes, by the virtuous and holy bishops, by the prophets and servants of God, to reject and cast off the word and true religion of God, and to receive again a blasphemous impiety.

This most heinous offence is now offered unto us, although the same be painted and coloured with the name of reformation, restoring of religion, ancient faith, with the name of the catholic church, of unity, catholic truth, and with the cloak of feigned holiness. These are sheep skins, under which (as Christ saith) ravening wolves hide themselves. But Christ willeth us to look upon their fruits, whereby we may know them; and truly that is no good fruit to cast aside God's word, and to banish the English service out of the churches, and in the place of it to bring in a Latin tongue unknown to the people. Which as it edifieth no man, so it hath been occasion of all blindness and error among the people. For before the blessed reformation begun by the most noble prince of godly memory, the queen's good father; and by our late holy and innocent king, her good brother, finished; it is not unknown what blindness and error we were all in, when not one man in all this realm, unlearned in the Latin, could say in English the Lord's prayer, or knew any one article of his belief, or rehearse any one of the ten commandments. And that ignorance, the mother of mischief, was the very root and well-spring of idolatry, Sodomitical monkery, and whorish chastity of unmarried priests, of all whoredom, drunkenness, covetousness, swearing, and blasphemy, with all other wicked sinful living. These brought in the severe wrath and vengeance of God, plaguing them with famine and pestilence; and at last the sword consumed and avenged all their impiety and wicked living. As it is greatly to be feared the same or more grievous plagues shall now again follow.

We cannot therefore consent nor agree that the word of God and prayers in our English tongue, which we understand, should be taken away from us, and for it a Latin service, we know not what, (for none of us understand it) to be again brought amongst us, especially seeing that Christ hath said, "My sheep hear my voice, and follow me, and I give to them everlasting life." The service in the English teacheth us that we are the Lord's people, and the sheep of his pasture, and commandeth that we harden not our hearts, as when they provoked the Lord's wrath in the wilderness, lest he swear unto us, as he did swear unto them, that they should not enter into his rest.

The service in Latin is a confused noise; which if it be good (as they say it is), yet unto us that lack understanding, what goodness can it bring? St. Paul commandeth, that in the churches all things should be done to edifying, which we are sure is God's commandment. But in the Latin service nothing is done to edifying, but contrarily all to destroy those that are already edified, and to drive us from God's word and truth, and from believing of the same, and so to bring us to believe lies and fables, that templing and provoking God, we should be brought into that judgment that blessed Paul speaketh of, saying, "Antichrist shall come according to the working of Satan, with all manner of power and signs, and lying wonders, in all deceivableness of unrighteousness in those that perish: because they have not received the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And therefore God will send them strong delusion, that they should believe lies and be damned, as many as have not believed the truth, but have approved unrighteousness."

Thus, altogether drawn from God, we shall fall into his wrath through unbelief, till he swear unto us as he did unto the unfaithful Jews, that such infidels shall not enter into his rest.

In the administration of the Lord's supper, which we confess to be the holy communion, and partaking with Christ and his holy congregation, we have learned God's holy commandments, and at the rehearsal of every one of them to ask God mercy for our most grievous transgressions against them, and to ask grace of God, to keep them in time to come, that the same may not only outwardly sound in our ears, but also inwardly by the Holy Ghost be written in our hearts.

We have learned also the holy prayer made for the queen's majesty: wherein we learn that her power and authority is of God; therefore we pray to God for her, that she, and all magistrates under her, may rule according to God's word, and we, her subjects, obey according to the same.

Truly, most honourable commissioners, we cannot think these things evil, but think them most worthy to be retained in our churches, and we should not think ourselves to have true subjects hearts, if we should go about to put away such godly prayers, as put us perpetually in memory of our bounden obedience and duty to God and our rulers. For, as we think, at this present the unquiet multitude had more need to have these things more often and earnestly beaten and driven into them, (especially given in many places to stir and trouble) than to take from that blessed doctrine, whereby only they may, to their salvation, be kept in quiet.

Furthermore, we cannot forsake that blessed partaking of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ's institution, tution, ministered with such godly prayers, exhortations, and admonitions, teaching us the knowledge of God, the exceeding love and charity of our loving Redeemer Christ, breaking his body upon the cross for our sins, and shedding his most precious blood for our redemption: which we, in eating of that blessed bread, and drinking of the blessed cup, assuredly believe that we receive, and are perfectly joined with Christ in his holy catholic church into one body, and into one unity and brotherly love, whereby every member faithfully embraceth each other. We must needs confess this institution of Christ to be most holy and godly, whereof we have the only comfort in conscience against sin and damnation, with the assurance of salvation, and whereof hath ensued reformation of many heinous sins, much lawing, strife, and contention being ended; drunkenness, whoredom, and other vices in some reformed; goodness and virtue increased and nourished.

In the Latin mass we never had any such edifying, but only we saw a great many ceremonies and strange gestures; as turning of the priest, crossings, blessings, breathings, washing of hands, and spreading abroad of his arms, with like ceremonies that we understand not. And concerning the Latin tongue, wherein the priest prayeth, we know not whether he blesteth or curseth us. We are not partakers of the sacrament, as Christ's institution appointeth we should be.

In the ministering of the sacrament, the priests alter the institution of Christ, committing theft and sacrilege, robbing us of the cup of Christ's blood, contrary to Christ's commandment, saying, Drink ye all of this.

They rob us also of God's word, speaking all things in Latin, which nothing edifieth us either in faith or manners. Christ commandeth not that his supper should be administered in an unknown tongue: but forasmuch as faith cometh by hearing, and hearing cometh of God's word, how can we believe Christ's word and promise made unto us in the holy sacrament, saying, "This is my body broken for you, and this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you, for the remission of sins;" if the same promises of Christ either be not at all recited, or else so recited in Latin, that the congregation understandeth not, or heareth not what is spoken? St. Paul saith thus, reciting the saying of Isaiah, "As truly as I live, saith the Lord, all knees shall bow unto me, all tongues shall give praise unto God." Also he saith, "All tongues must confess that Jesus Christ is the Lord, unto the glory of God the father." The Holy Ghost came upon the apostles in fiery tongues, so that they spake the tongues of all nations under heaven. St. Paul ministered to the Corinthians, and preached to them in their own mother-tongue, and rebuked the bringing in of strange tongues into the congregations. We cannot think that to be right, which so holy an apostle rebuked. And whatsoever virtue the Latin tongue hath to such as understand it, to us Englishmen not understanding it, it is altogether without virtue and edification, and therefore unmeet for our churches.

The priests complain that we laymen love them not, nor have them in honour, but it is their own fault: for how should we love them that only seek to keep us in blindness and ignorance, to damn our souls, to destroy our bodies, to rob and spoil our goods and substance under a colour of pretended holiness? We know (right honourable commissioners) what honour is due to such wolves, and how by the authority of God's word such are to be avoided as pestilences to the Lord's lambs, whom they miserably murder daily.

But we have rather chosen, by this our meek supplication, humbly to desire the queen's majesty, and you her honourable commissioners, to restore God's word again unto the churches, and to permit us freely to enjoy the same. For we certainly know, that the whole religion lately set out by the holy faint of God, our late most dear king Edward, is Christ's true religion written in the holy scripture of God, and by Christ and his apostles taught unto his church. Wherefore we cannot allow with safe consciences this refusal of it, and casting of it out of our churches; forasmuch as to refuse, cast off, and to reject it, is to cast off Christ himself, and to refuse our part in his blessed body broken for our sins, and his blood shed for our redemption. Which thing whoso doth, the same without repentance can look for no sacrifice for his sins, but must fearfully wait for the judgment, and for that vehement fire that shall destroy Christ's adversaries. For if he that despiseth the law of Moses, is without mercy put to death under two or three witnesses, how much more grievous torments shall he suffer that treadeth under foot the Son of God, and esteemeth the blood of the Testament (whereby he was sanctified) as a profane thing, and contumeliously useth the Spirit of grace?

Wherefore we most humbly pray and beseech the queen's gracious majesty to have mercy and pity upon us her poor and faithful subjects, and not to compel us to do the thing that is against our consciences, and so incurably wound us in heart, by bringing into the church the Latin mass and service that nothing edifieth us, and by casting out Christ's holy communion and English service, so causing us to sin against our redemption. For such as wittingly and willingly against their consciences shall so do, (as it is to be feared many a one doth) they are in a miserable state, until the mercy of God turn them; which if he do not, we certainly believe that they shall eternally be damned: and as in this world they deny Christ's holy word and communion before men, so shall Christ deny them before his heavenly Father and his angels.

And whereas it is very earnestly required, that we should go in procession (as they call it), at which time the priests say in Latin such things as we are ignorant of, the same edifieth nothing at all unto godliness, and we have learned that to follow Christ's cross is another matter, namely, to take up our cross, and to follow Christ in patient suffering for his love, tribulations, sickness, poverty, prison, or any other adversity, whensoever God's holy will and pleasure is to lay the same upon us. The triumphant passion and death of Christ, whereby in his own person he conquered death, sin, hell, and damnation, hath most lively been preached unto us, and the glory of Christ's cross declared by our preachers: whereby we have learned the causes and effects of the same more lively in one sermon, than in all the processions that ever we went in, or ever shall go in.

When we worshipped the Divine Trinity kneeling, and in the Litany invoking the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, asking mercy for our sins, and desiring such petitions as the need of our frail state and this mortal life required, we were edified, both to know unto whom all christian prayers should be directed, and also to know that of God's hand we receive all things, as well to the salvation of our souls, as to the relief of our mortal necessities. And we humbly beseech the queen's majesty, that the same most holy prayers may be continued amongst us; that our ministers praying in our mother-tongue, and we understanding their prayers and petitions, may answer, Amen, unto them. At evening-service we understood our ministers prayers, we were taught and admonished by the scriptures then read; which in the Latin even-song is all gone.

At the ministration of holy baptism, we learned what league and covenant God made with us, and what vows and promises we upon our part had made, namely, to believe in him, to forsake Satan and his works, and to walk in the way of God's holy word and commandments.

The christian catechism continually taught and called to remembrance the same, whereas before no man knew any thing at all. And many good men of forty years, that had been godfathers to thirty children, knew no more of the godfather's office, but to wash their hands ere they departed the church, or else to fast five Fridays with bread and water.

O merciful God, have pity upon us. Shall we be altogether cast from thy presence? We may well lament our miserable state, to receive such a commandment, to reject and cast out of our churches all these most godly prayers, instructions, admonitions, and doctrines, and and thus to be compelled to deny God, and Christ our Saviour, his holy word, and all his doctrine of our salvation, the candle to our feet, and the light to our steps, the bread that cometh down from heaven that giveth life, which whoso eateth, it shall be to him a well-spring streaming unto eternal life; whereby we have learned all righteousness, all true religion, all true obedience towards our governors, all charity one towards another, all good works that God would have us to walk in, what punishment abideth the wicked, and what heavenly reward God will give to those that reverently walk in his ways and commandments.

Wherefore, right honourable commissioners, we cannot without impiety refuse and cast from us the holy word of God which we have received, or condemn any thing set forth by our late godly king Edward and his virtuous proceedings, so agreeable to God's word. And our most humble suit is, that the commandment may be revoked, so that we may not be constrained thereunto. For we protest before God, we think if the holy word of God had not taken some root amongst us, we could not in times past have done that poor duty of our's, which we did in assisting the queen, our most dear sovereign, against her grace's mortal foe, that then fought her destruction. It was our bounden duty, and we thank God for the knowledge of his word and grace, that we then did some part of our bounden service.

And we meekly pray and beseech the queen's majesty for the dear passion of Jesus Christ, that the same word may not be taken away out of our churches, nor from us her loving, faithful, and true subjects; lest if the like necessity should hereafter chance, (which God for his mercy's sake forbid, and ever save and defend her grace, and us all) the want of knowledge and due remembrance of God's word may be occasion of great ruin to an infinite number of her grace's true subjects. And truly we judge this to be one subtle part of the devil (enemy to all godly peace and quietness) that by taking God's word from among us, and planting ignorance, he may make a way to all mischief and wickedness; and by banishing the holy gospel of peace he may bring upon us the heavy wrath of God, with all manner of plagues; as death, strange sickness, pestilence, murrain, most terrible uproars, commotions, and seditions. These things did the Lord threaten unto the Jews for refusing his word, saying, "Go, and thou shalt say unto this people, Ye shall hear indeed, but ye shall not understand, ye shall plainly see, and not perceive. Harden the heart of this people, stop their ears, and shut their eyes, that they see not with their eyes, hear not with their ears, understand not with their hearts, and be converted and healed. And I said, How long, Lord? And he answered, Until the cities are destroyed, utterly wasted without inhabitants, and the houses without men, till the land also be desolate, and lie unbuilded." And the prophet Micah in the seventh chapter, considering the contempt of God's word among the Israelites, threatened them thus, "When the day that thy preachers warned thee of coming, thou shalt be wasted away. And let no man believe his friend, or put confidence in his brother. Keep the door of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom: for the son shall put his father to dishonour, and the daughter shall rise against her mother, the daughter-in-law against the mother-in-law; and a man's foes shall be even they of his own household." The same plague Christ threatened unto the Jews, for refusing his peace proffered them in the gospel, and he wept on the city of Jerusalem which murdered the prophets, and stoned such as were sent unto her.

The same plagues, we are afraid, will also fall upon us. For whereas heretofore with the receiving of Christ's word and peaceable gospel, we had great benedictions of God, especially this christian concord and holy peace, so that all were at a full and perfect stay in religion, and no man offended with another, but as the sons of peace, each of us with christian charity embraced other: now, alas, for pity, the devil (riding upon the red horse, shewed unto St. John in the Revelations) is come forth, and power is given unto him to take peace from the earth. For now a man can go to no place, but malicious busy bodies curiously search out his deeds, mark his words, and if he agree not with them in despising God's word, then will they spitefully and hatefully rail against him and it, calling it error and heresy, and the professors thereof heretics and schismatics, with other odious and spiteful names, as traitors and not the queen's friends, nor favourers of the queen's proceedings; as if to love God's word were heresy, and as though to talk of Christ were to be schismatic; as though none could be true to the queen that were not false to God; as though none were the queen's friends, but such as despitefully rail on her grace's father and brother, and on God's word that they set forth; as though none favoured the queen's majesty, but such as hate all godly knowledge.

And in very deed these things that all this turmoil is made for, are mere inventions of popes, brought into the church of their own imaginations without commandment or example either of Christ or of his apostles; and there is not one word in the Bible, that being truly alledged, maintaineth them, nor any doctor of antiquity before St. Augustine's days, as it hath been divers times sufficiently proved before all the whole parliament and convocation of this realm. Yet these being mere traditions of bishops, are set out for God's commandments; and the queen's authority (given to her of God to maintain his word) must be abused to put down God's word. And you, right honourable justices, and keepers of laws and righteousness, are also abused and made the bishops apparators, to set forth such Romish trash as is to Christ's dishonour, and against the supreme authority of the regal state of this realm. And we poor subjects, for speaking of that which is truth, and our bounden allegiance, are daily punished, railed upon, and noted for seditious, and not the queen's friends.

But God (who is blessed for ever) knoweth that they slander us, and pull the thorn out of their own foot, and put it in our's: for the searcher of hearts knoweth, that we bear a faithful and true heart unto her grace, and unto all her proceedings, that are not against God and his holy word. And we daily pray unto the heavenly Father, to enlighten her grace's royal heart with the glorious light of the gospel, that she may establish and confirm that religion, which her grace's brother, our most dear king, did set amongst us; and so governing and ruling this her realm in the fear and true way of God, she may long live, and with prosperity, peace, and honour reign over us.

But we cannot think that those men do seek either God's honour, or her grace's prosperity, or wealth of the realm, that take from her grace's faithful subjects God's word, which only is the root of all love and faithful obedience under her grace, and of all honesty, good life, and virtuous concord among her commons. And this we fear lest the root being taken away, the branches will soon wither and be fruitless. And when the Philistines have stopped up the well-spring, the fair streams that should flow shall soon be dried up. All our watchmen, our true preachers have taught us, that as long as we retained God's word, we shall have God our gracious merciful Father; but if we refused and cast off the Lord's yoke of his doctrine, then shall we look for the Lord's wrath and severe visitation to plague us, as he did the Jews for the like offences. And Paul saith, Rom. ii. "God gave them the spirit of unquietness and uproar, eyes wherewith they should not see, and ears wherewith they should not hear, until this day:" and as David said, Psalm lxxix. "Let their table be made a snare to catch them, and a stumbling-block to fall at. Let their eyes be blinded that they see not, and bow thou down their backs always."

O merciful God, all this is now come upon us, and daily more and more increased, and we fear at last it will so bow down our backs, that we shall be utterly destroyed; the troublesome spirit of uproars and unquietness daily troubleth men's hearts, and worketh such unquietness in all places, that no man that loveth quietness can tell where to place himself. Men have eyes, and see not how grievous an offence it is to cast off the yoke of God's doctrine, and to bear the heavy burden that unfaithful hypocrites lay upon us. We have ears, and hear not the warning of God's word calling us to true repentance, nor his threats against our impiety. Our most sweet table of Christ's word and most holy communion is taken away, and turned to a most perilous snare, through the brawling disputations of men. And as the idol of abomination betokened final subversion unto the Jewish nation, so we fear this setting aside of the gospel and holy communion of Christ, and the placing in of a Romish religion, betokeneth the desolation of this noble realm of England to be at hand.

For the plagues of hunger, pestilence, and sword, cannot long tarry; but except we repent, and turn again to the Lord, our backs shall be so bowed, that the like horrible plagues were never seen. And no marvel: for the like offence was never committed, as to reject and cast off Christ and his word, and in plain English to say, We will not have him to reign over us. O Lord, how terrible is that which followeth in the gospel? "Those mine enemies that would not have me to reign over them, bring them hither, and slay them before me," Luke xix. God be merciful to us, and move the heart of the queen's majesty, and the hearts of her honourable council, and your hearts (right worshipful commissioners), to weigh these dangers in due time; and to call God's word into your council, and then you shall see how it agreeth with this unreasonable commandment; and to be as wary to avoid the contempt of the eternal God, and dangers of the same, as you are prudent and wise in matters of this world, lest, if the Almighty be contemned, he stretch forth his arm, which no man can turn, and kindle his wrath, which no man can quench.

We have humbly opened to you our consciences, doubtless sore wounded and grieved by this commandment; and we meekly pray and beseech the queen's majesty, for the precious death and blood-shedding of Jesus Christ our Saviour, to have mercy and pity upon us her grace's poor commons, faithful and true subjects, members of the same body politic, whereof her grace is supreme head. All our bodies, lands, goods, and lives, are ready to do her grace faithful obedience, and true service of all commandments that are not against God and his word: but in things that import a denial of Christ, and refusal of his word and holy communion, we cannot consent nor agree unto it. For we have bound ourselves in baptism to be Christ's disciples, and to keep his holy word and ordinances. And if we deny him before men, he will deny us before his heavenly Father and his holy angels in the day of judgment: which we trust her benign grace will not require of us.

And we humbly beseech her majesty, that we be not enforced unto it; but as we serve her grace with body and goods, and due obedience, according to God's commandment; so we may be permitted freely to serve God and Christ our Saviour, and keep unto him our souls, which he hath with his precious blood redeemed, that so (as Christ teacheth) we may render to Cæsar that which is due to Cæsar, and to God that which is due to God.

For we think it no true obedience unto the queen's majesty, or to any other magistrate ordained of God under her to obey in things contrary to God's word, although the same be ever so straitly charged in her grace's name. The bishop of Winchester hath truly taught in this point, in his book of true obedience, that true obedience is in the Lord, and not against the Lord: as the apostles answered before the council at Jerusalem, commanding them no more to preach in the name of the Lord Jesus: "Judge you (said they) whether it be right in the sight of God, to hear you rather than God." And again they said, "We must obey God rather than man." Wherefore we learn, that true obedience is to obey God, King of all kings, and Lord of all lords, and for him, in him, and not against him and his word, to obey princes and magistrates of this world, who are not truly obeyed when God is disobeyed, nor yet disobeyed when God is faithfully obeyed.

Tobias disobeyed not his king, although contrary to his commandment, and contrary to the usage of all others, when they went to Dan and Bethel, he went unto Jerusalem, and worshipped in the temple of the Lord. The three young men in Babylon, refusing Nebuchadnezzar's commandment, pleased God more than the whole multitude that obeyed. And Daniel that prayed to the God of heaven, contrary to king Darius's commandment, bare a more true and faithful heart to the king, than those wicked counsellors that procured that wicked law, or those that for fear or flattery obeyed it. Which two pestilences (fear and flattery) have ever destroyed true obedience to God and man; when wicked men (that care not if the devil were worshipped, so they might get and obtain riches, promotions, dignity, and worldly glory) turn to and fro as every wind bloweth; and weak and frail men, fearing loss of goods, punishment, or death, do outwardly in body that thing which their hearts and consciences inwardly abhor, and so outwardly disobey God, and in heart dissemble with man, which dissimulation we think worthy the hate of all men, and most uncomely with christian men.

Wherefore we humbly beseech the queen's majesty, with pity and mercy to tender the lamentable suit of us her poor subjects, which be by this commandment sore hurt, and wounded in our consciences, and driven to many miseries, and by the malicious attempts of wicked men suffer great wrongs and injuries, slanders, loss of goods, and bodily vexations. We think not good, by any unlawful stir or commotion to seek remedy; but intend, by God's grace, to obey her majesty in all things not against God and his holy word. But unto such ungodly commandments as are against God, we answer with the apostles, "God must be obeyed rather than man." If persecution shall ensue, which some threaten us with, we desire the heavenly Father, according to his promise, to look from heaven, to hear our cry, to judge between us and our adversaries, and to give us faith, strength, and patience to continue faithful unto the end, and to shorten these evil days for his chosen's sake; and so we faithfully believe he will.

Notwithstanding, we trust the queen's gracious and merciful heart will not suffer such tyranny to be done against her poor, innocent, faithful, and obedient subjects, that daily pray unto God for her; which have no remedy in this world but to sue unto her highness, our most gracious and benign sovereign; whom we pray and beseech, for the dear blood of Christ, to pity our lamentable case and hurt of conscience, and to call back all such commandments as are against God's honour, as the good king Darius, Ahasuerus, Trajan, Theodosius, and divers others have done, and permit the holy word of God and true religion (set forth by our most holy and innocent king Edward) to be restored again unto our churches, to be frequented amongst us. So shall we grow and increase in the knowledge of God and of Christ, in true repentance and amendment of life: so shall we exhibit true obedience to our lawful magistrates, and all superiors ordained of God: so shall love and charity (of late through this commandment so decayed) be again restored, the honour of her regal estate the more confirmed and established, and godliness and a virtuous life among her loving subjects increased and maintained.

And we most heartily pray you (right honourable commissioners) to be means unto the queen's highness, and to her honourable council, that this our humble suit may be favourably tendered, and graciously heard and granted. And we shall not cease day and night to pray unto the heavenly Father, long to preserve her grace, and all other magistrates, in his fear and love, and in prosperous peace and wealth, with long life and honour, Amen.

Your poor suppliants, the lovers of Christ's true religion in Norfolk and Suffolk.

The HISTORY of JOHN HARPOLE of Rochester, and JOAN BEACH, Widow, of Tunbridge, Martyrs.

TOUCHING the examination of Joan Beach, widow, and of John Harpole, within the diocese of Rochester, by Maurice, bishop of the said diocese, mention was made before in the history of Nicholas Hall, wherein were declared the four articles consistorial of the bishop, objected and laid, as unto the said Nicholas Hall and his company, so also to this Joan Beach, widow: whereof the first was this;

1. That she was of the parish of Tunbridge, in the diocese of Rochester.

2. Item, That all persons who preach, teach, believe, or say otherwise or contrary to that their mother holy catholic church of Christ doth, are excommunicate persons and heretics.

3. Item, That the said Joan Beach hath, and yet doth affirm, maintain, and believe contrary to the said mother church of Christ, namely, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under the form of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour in substance, but only a token and memorial thereof; that the very body and blood of Christ is in heaven, and not in the sacrament.

4. Item, That she hath been, and yet is amongst the parishioners of Tunbridge, openly noted, and vehemently suspected to be a sacramentary and heretic.

To which afore said articles her answers were as follow:

1. That she was and is of the said parish of Tunbridge, in the diocese of Rochester.

2. That all persons which do preach and hold otherwise and contrary to that which the holy catholic church of Christ doth, are to be reputed for excommunicate and heretics; adding withal, that nevertheless she believeth not the holy catholic church to be her mother, but believeth only the Father of heaven to be her Father.

3. That she hath, and yet doth verily believe, hold, and affirm, in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, not to be the very body and blood of our Saviour in substance, but only a token and remembrance of his death to the faithful receiver, and this his body and substance is only in heaven, and not in the sacrament.

Lastly, As touching how she hath been or is noted and reputed among the parishioners of Tunbridge, she said she could not tell; however she believed she was not so taken and reputed.

The like matter, and the like four articles were also the same present time and place ministered to John Harpole, by the afore said bishop Maurice; who, after the like answers received of him, as of the other before, adjudged and condemned them both together to death, by one form of sentence, according to the tenor and course of their several sentences, which may be read before in the history of Mr. Rogers.

An Account of JOHN HULLIER, Minister and Martyr.

JOHAN HULLIER, minister, was first brought up in Eaton-school, from whence he went to King's College, in Cambridge. He suffered under Dr. Thirlby, bishop of Ely, and his chancellor, for the sincere preaching of the gospel. In whose behalf it is much to be lamented, that among so many fresh wits and stirring pens in that university, so little matter is left unto us concerning the process of his judgment, and order of his suffering, who so innocently gave his life in such a cause amongst the midst of them. By certain letters which he himself left behind, it appeared that he was zealous and earnest in that doctrine of truth, which every true christian man ought to embrace. His martyrdom was on the second day of April, in the year 1556.

LETTER I.

IT standeth now most in hand (O dear christians) all them that look to be accounted of Christ's flock at the great and terrible day, when a separation shall be made of the sort that shall be received, from the other which shall be refused, faithfully in his time of great afflictions to hear our master Christ's voice, the only true shepherd of our souls, who saith, "Whosoever shall endure to the end, shall be safe." For even now is that great trouble in hand (as here in England we may well say) that our Saviour Christ spake of long before, which should follow the true and sincere preaching of his gospel. Therefore in this time we must needs either shew that we are his faithful soldiers, and continue in his battle unto the end, putting on the armour of God, the buckler of faith, the breast-plate of love, the helmet of hope and salvation, and the sword of his holy word (which we have heard plentifully), with all instance of supplication and prayer; or else if we do not work and labour with these, we are apostates and false soldiers, shrinking most unthankfully from our gracious and sovereign lord and captain Christ, and leaning to Belial. For as he saith plainly, Luke xiv. "Whosoever beareth not my cross and followeth me, he cannot be my disciple." And Matth. vi. "No man can serve two masters: for either he must hate the one, and love the other, or else he shall lean to the one, and despise the other." Which thing the faithful prophet Elias signified, when he came to the people, and said, "Why halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him, or if Baal be he, then follow him," 1 Kings xviii.

Now let us not think, but that the same was recorded in writing for our instruction, whom the ends of the world are come upon, as the apostle St. Paul saith, Rom. xv. "Whatsoever things are written aforehand, that are written for our learning." If Christ be that only good and true shepherd that gave his life for us, then let us that bear his mark, and have our consciences sprinkled with his blood, follow altogether, for our salvation, his heavenly voice and calling, according to our profession and first promise. But if we shall not so do, certainly, (say what we can) although we bear the name of Christ, yet we be none of his sheep indeed. For he saith very manifestly, John x. "My sheep hear my voice, and follow me: a stranger they will not follow, but will flee from him, for they know not the voice of a stranger."

Therefore let every man take heed in these perilous days, (whereof we have had so much warning aforehand) that he be not beguiled by the godly outward shew and appearance, as Eve was of our old subtle enemy, whose craft and wiliness is so manifold and divers, and so full of close windings, that if he cannot bring him directly and the plain strait way to consent to his suggestions, then he will allure him and wind him in by some other false ways, (as it were by a train) that he shall not perceive it, to deceive withal, and to steal from him that goodly victory of the incorruptible and eternal crown of glory, which no man else can have, but he that fighteth lawfully: as at this present day, if he cannot induce him thoroughly, as others do, to favour his devilish religion, and of good will and free heart to help to uphold the same, yet he will inveigle him to resort to his wicked and whorish school-house, and at the leastwise to be conversant and keep company with his congregation there, and to hold his peace and say nothing, whatsoever he think, so that he be not a diligent soldier and a good labourer on Christ's side, to further his kingdom: by that subtle means flattering him that he shall both save his life, and also his good, and live in quiet. But if we look well on Christ's holy will and testament, we shall perceive that he came not to make any such peace upon earth, nor yet that he gave any such peace to his disciples; "I leave peace with you (saith he), my peace I give give you, not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, nor fearful. These things have I spoken unto you, that in me you should have peace. In the world ye shall have affliction, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world. The servant is not greater than his lord and master: if they have persecuted me, they shall also persecute you. If any man come to me, and hateth not his own father and mother, wife, children, sisters, yea, and moreover his own life, it is not possible for him to be my disciple. Blessed be ye that now weep, for ye shall laugh: and woe be unto you that now laugh, for ye shall mourn and weep. He that will find his life, shall lose it."

Therefore the God of that true peace and comfort, preserve and keep us, that we never obey such a false flattering, which at length will pay us home once for all, bringing for temporal peace and quietness, everlasting trouble, vexation, and disquietness; for these vain and transitory goods, extreme loss and utter damage of the eternal treasure and inheritance; for this mortal life, deprivation of the most joyful life immortal; finally, the entrance into endless death most miserable, unmeasurable pain and torment both of body and soul.

Now conferring the setwo schoolmasters together, let us consider the thing well, and determine with ourselves which way we ought to take, and not to take the common broad way that seemeth here most pleasant, and that the most part of the people take. Surely I judge it to be better to go to school with our master Christ, and to be under his ferula and rod, (although it seemeth sharp and grievous for a time) that at length we may be inheritors with him of everlasting joy, than to keep company with the devil's scholars, the adulterous generation, in his school that is all full of pleasure for a while, and at the end to be paid with the wages of continual burning in the most horrible lake which burneth evermore with fire and brimstone without end. What shall then these vain goods and temporal pleasures avail? Who shall then help, when we cry incessantly, Woe, woe, alas, and weal away, for unmeasurable pain, grief, and sorrow? O let us therefore take heed betime, and rather be content to take pains in this world for a time, that we may please God. Our Saviour Christ the true teacher saith, "Every branch that bringeth not forth fruit in me, my Father will take away; John xv."

It is also not written in vain, Eccclus. xli. "The children of the ungodly are abominable children, and so are they that keep company with the ungodly." What doth he else, I pray you, that resorteth to the administration and service that is most repugnant and contrary to Christ's Holy Testament, there keeping still silence, and nothing reproving the same, but in the face of the world, by his very deed itself, declare himself to be of a false, fearful, dissembling, feigned, and unfaithful heart, and to have laid away from him the armour of light, discouraging as much as lieth in him all the residue of Christ's host, and giving a manifest offence to the weak, and also confirming, encouraging, and rejoicing the hearts of the adversaries in all their evil doings. By which example he doth shew himself neither to love God, whom he seeth to be dishonoured and blasphemed by an Antichristian minister, nor yet his neighbor before whom he should rebuke the evil, as it is expressly commanded in God's holy law, where it is said, "Thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour, that thou bear not sin for his sake," Lev. xviii. Wherefore let such a one never fancy to deceive himself, that his name is registered in the book of life, to have the stipend of Christ's soldier, except he do the duty, and perform the part of a faithful and right true soldier, as others have done before. For such fearfulness cometh not from God, as testifieth St. Paul, 2 Tim. i. saying, "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power and love. Be not ashamed, saith he, to testify our Lord, but suffer adversity also with the gospel, through the power of God, which saved us, and called us with an holy calling."

To be now fearful, when most need is that we should be of strong hearts, is utterly the rejecting of the fear of God, and plain unfaithfulness and disobedience to the express commandment of our Saviour Christ, who saith in his holy gospel, Matth. x. "Fear not them that kill the body," &c. For what faithfulness do we express towards him, when he saith thus to us, and yet we declare in our doings the very contrary, being ever fearful, even as the unbelieving Israelites, who unfaithfully feared God's enemies the Canaanites, whereas he had oftentimes given them commandment by his true prophet Moses, to do the contrary? For which cause all the whole number of that sect were destroyed in process of time in the wilderness, and enjoyed not the pleasant land of promise. That was a bodily figure shewed before, and now agreeing to the promise of the heavenly inheritance, which shall be given to none other, but only to such as with love unfeigned be wholly bent, without any fear of man, to fulfill God's holy will and pleasure. But all they that pertain to the lively faith, to the winning of the soul, will faithfully stick to the commandment, trusting most firmly and faithfully that he that gave the same, will also give strength plentifully to perform it, even in the weakest vessels of all, as we have heard and seen by divers examples; he only therefore be praised.

St. Peter saith, 1 Pet. iii. "Fear not though they seem terrible unto you, neither be troubled, but sanctify the Lord God in your hearts." "Only (saith St. Paul, Phil. i.) let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ. Continue in one spirit, and in one soul, labouring as we do, to maintain the faith of the gospel, and in nothing fearing your adversaries, which is to them a token of damnation, and to you of salvation, and that of God: for unto you it is given that not only ye should believe in Christ, but also suffer for his sake." Wherefore let us be right well assured, that we shall yield a most strict account, if we transgress the said most wholesome precepts given us of our master Christ, and of his apostles, and now in this troublesome time wherein the gospel is persecuted, shew ourselves fearful soldiers; as it is manifestly declared in the Revelation of St. John, chap. xxi. where it is written, "That the fearful shall have their part with the unbelieving and abominable, in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." Again, it is written in the same book for our warning, chap. iii. "Because thou art betwixt both, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth."

Now therefore (good Christians) these true testimonies of God's lively word deeply considered and weighed, let us chiefly stand in awe of his most terrible judgments, and be not as they that presumptuously tempt him. Let him always be our fear and dread. He now chasteneth, he now nurtureth us for our profit, delighteth in us even as a loving father in his beloved child, to make us perfect, and to have us to be partakers of his holiness. He now judgeth us (not utterly taking away his everlasting love and mercy from us, as he doth from the malignant and wicked) that we should not be condemned with the wicked world: but if we now refuse his most loving chastising, and follow the world, we must needs have our portion with the world. Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: but strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. O how much better is it to go this narrow way with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a time!

In consideration whereof, let us without any more slackening and furthering delays in this great warning by God's loving visitation, submit ourselves betime under his mighty hand, that he may exalt us when the time is come. And thus I wholly commit you to him, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build farther, beseeching you most heartily to pray for me, that I may be strong through the power of his might, and stand perfect in all things, being always prepared and ready, looking for the mercy of our Lord unto eternal rest; and and I will pray for you as I am most bound. So I trust he will graciously hear us for his promise sake made unto all the faithful of his dearly beloved Son Christ our alone Saviour, whose grace be with your spirit, most dear christians, for ever. So be it.

By your christian brother JOHN HULLIER, a prisoner of the Lord.

The second letter, written after his condemnation, addressed in the same terms, more immediately tends to charge the pope and the church of Rome with being the beast of the Revelation, and the antichrist of the scriptures. It warns them against apostacy from the faith, and to submit to persecution, but not wilfully to invite it; and sets before them briefly, the narrow way which leadeth unto life, and the broad way that leadeth to destruction, and calls upon them to chuse which they will prefer. Expecting, as he then did, within a few days, to seal his faith with his blood; he bids them an affectionate farewell, and finally concludes with exhorting them to watch and pray.

The Martyrdom of six constant Professors of Christ, burned at Colchester, for the Testimony of the Gospel, the 28th Day of April.

NOT long after the death of Robert Drakes, William Tyms, and the other Essex martyrs, who suffered in Smithfield, as is before specified, followed in the same order likewise of martyrdom, at one fire in the town of Colchester, (where most of them inhabited) six other martyrs, whose names be these:

Christopher Lyfter, of Dagneham, husbandman; John Mace, of Colchester, apothecary; John Spencer, of Colchester, weaver; Simon Joyne, sawyer; Richard Nichols, of Colchester, weaver; John Hammond, of Colchester, tanner.

With these six was also joined another, whose name was Roger Grasbroke, but he afterward submitted himself. Of these above named, the bishop, because (as it seemed by the short process recorded by his register) he waxed now weary, made a very quick dispatch. For soon after that they were delivered unto one John Kingstone, bachelor of the civil law, and then commissary to the bishop, by the earl of Oxford, and other commissioners, (as appeareth by a bill indented, made between the commissioners and the said commissary, for the receipt of the said prisoners, dated March the 28th, in the second and third years of the reign of king Philip and queen Mary, which was in the year of our Lord 1556) and by him sent unto his lord and master, the bishop caused them to be brought unto his house at Fulham; where, in the open church, judicially were ministered unto them the same articles that were propounded unto Bartlet Green and others, mentioned before. To which they made their several answers, agreeing altogether in one truth.

As these answers were so extremely similar to those which were given by those faithful martyrs, it seems unnecessary to repeat them in this place; for as they contain no new doctrine, but generally concur in opposition to the doctrines of the sacrament of the altar, with transubstantiation and the popish doctrines of the mass, &c. we cannot but refer our readers to the account of those martyrs, to refresh their memories on these subjects.

These answers thus made, the bishop dismissed them for that present until the afternoon. At which time, having first their articles and answers read unto them again, and they standing most firmly unto their christian profession, they were by divers ways and means essayed and tried if they would revoke the same their professed faith, and return to the unity of Antichrist's church.

mitting them unto the secular power. Who, upon the receipt of the king and queen's writ, sent them unto Colchester, where the 28th day of April, most cheerfully they ended their lives, to the glory of God's holy name, and the great encouragement of others.

An account of the Martyrdom of HUGH LAVEROCK, an old Man, and JOHN APPRICE, a blind Man, burned at Stratford the Bow.

IN the discourse of this part of history, I know not whether more to marvel at the great and unsearchable mercies of God, or else to note the unreasonable, or rather unnatural doings of these unmerciful catholics, I mean bishop Bonner and his accomplices.

Hugh Laverock, of the parish of Barking, painter, was of the age of sixty-eight, and a cripple, and John Apprice, a blind man.

These two poor and simple creatures being alike accused by some promoting neighbour of their's, unto the bishop and other of the king and queen's commissioners, were sent for by their officer; and being brought and delivered into the hands of the said bishop, were the first day of May examined before him in his palace at London; where he first propounded and objected against them those nine articles, whereof mention is made before, ministered as well unto Bartlet Green, as also unto many others. To which they answered in effect as Christopher Lyfter, John Mace, and others before mentioned had done.

Whereupon they were again sent to prison, and beside other times, the ninth day of the same month, in the consistory of St. Paul's were again openly produced, and there intreated to recant their opinions against the sacrament of the altar.

Whereunto Hugh Laverock first said, I will stand to mine answers, and to that I have confessed; and I cannot find in the scriptures, that the priests should lift up over their head a cake of bread.

The bishop then turned unto John Apprice, and asked what he would say.

To whom he answered, Your doctrine that you set forth and teach, is so agreeable with the world, and embraced of the same, that it cannot be agreeable with the scripture of God. And you are not of the catholic church; for you make laws to kill men, and make the queen your hangman.

At which words the bishop belike somewhat tickled, and therefore very loth to delay their condemnation any longer, (such was now his hot burning charity) commanded that they should be brought after him unto Fulham, whither he went before dinner, and there in the afternoon, after his solemn manner, in the open church, he pronounced the definitive sentence of condemnation against them, and so delivering them into the hands of the temporal officer, thought to dispatch his hands of them, but could not so dispatch his conscience before the judgment of God, from the guiltiness of innocent blood.

The poor men being now in the temporal officer's hands, might not be suffered long to remain there, and therefore the fifteenth day of May, very early in the morning, they were carried in a cart from Newgate to Stratford the Bow, and most quietly in the fire praising God, yielded up their souls into his hands through a lively faith in Jesus Christ, whom unto the end they did most constantly confess.

At their death, Hugh Laverock, after he was chained, cast away his crutch, and comforting John Apprice his fellow-martyr, said unto him, Be of good comfort, my brother, for my lord of London is our good physician. He will heal us both shortly, thee of thy blindness, and me of my lameness. And so patiently they suffered together.

An Account of the Martyrdom of CATHERINE HUT, ELIZABETH THACKVEL, and JOAN HORNS, in Smithfield.

THE next day after the martyrdom of this lame and blind man above specified, were brought to the fire three women, with whom also was adjoined another, who being in the same constancy with them, was likewise partaker of the said condemnation. These were,

Catherine Hut, of Bocking, widow. Joan Horns, of Billericay, maid. Elizabeth Thackvel, of Great Bursted, maid. Margaret Ellis, of Billericay, maid.

How these with divers others were persecuted and sent up, especially by sir John Mordaunt, and Edmund Tyrel, esquire, justices of peace, the following letter will declare.

A LETTER

From Sir JOHN MORDAUNT, Knight, and EDMUND TYREL, Esq. Justices of Peace for the County of Essex, to BONNER, Bishop of London.

OUR humble commendations to your lordship: these shall be to advertise you, that we have sent unto your good lordship, Joan Potter, the wife of Hugh Potter, James Harris, servant of William Harris, of Bromhill, and Margaret Ellis, for that they are not conformable to the orders of the church, nor to the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, to use your lordship's pleasure with them, as you think good; not doubting, with the punishment of these and others before sent to your lordship, but that the parish of Great Bursted and Billericay shall be brought to good conformity. Thus, committing your good lordship to the tuition of the Almighty God, we take our leave. From Great Bursted, this second day of March, 1556.

Your lordship's to command,

JOHN MORDAUNT.

EDMUND TYREL.

After the receipt of these letters, bishop Bonner entering into the examination of these four women above named, laid and objected the like articles to them, as after his usual form he was used to administer, and are before expressed: whereunto the said women likewise agreeing in the same unity of the spirit and doctrine, accorded in their answers, much agreeing unto the other before them.

After these their answers received, they were produced again about the thirteenth of April to further examination, and so at length to their final judgment; where Catherine Hut, widow, standing before the bishop, boldly and constantly stood to that which she had said before, neither yielding to his fair promises, nor overthrown with his terror. Who being required to declare her mind concerning the sacrament, and to reform herself unto the fellowship of the catholic faith, openly protested, saying, I deny it to be God, because it is a dumb god, and made with men's hands.

Joan Horns, maid, produced likewise to her judgment and condemnation, with like firmness and christian fortitude declared herself a true martyr and follower of Christ's Testament, giving no place to the adversary; but being charged that she did not believe the sacrament of Christ's body and blood to be Christ himself, of which sacrament (contrary to the nature of a sacrament) the adversaries are wont to make an idol service; to this she protesting openly her mind, said as follows; If you can make your god to shed blood, or to shew any condition of a true lively body, then will I believe you: but it is but bread, (as touching the substance thereof) meaning the matter whereof the sacrament consisteth; and that which you call heresy, I trust to serve my Lord God in, &c.

And as touching the Romish see, she said, My lord, (speaking to Bonner) I forsake all his abominations, and from them good Lord deliver us. From this her stable and constant assertion, when the bishop was too weak to remove her, and too ignorant to convince her, he knocked her down with the butcherly ax of his sentence. And so the holy virgin and martyr was committed to the flames of the secular sword, and offered up with her other fellows a burnt sacrifice to the Lord, in the favour of a sweet and pleasant smell.

As touching Margaret Ellis, she likewise persevering in her aforesaid confession, and resisting the false catholic errors of the papists, was by the said Bonner judged and condemned; but before the time of her burning came, prevented by death in Newgate.

No less strength in the grace of the Lord appeared in the other maid Elizabeth Thackvel, whose heart and mind the Lord had so confirmed in his truth, and so armed with patience, that as her adversaries could by no sufficient knowledge of scripture disprove her affirmation, so by no forcible attempts could they remove her confession.

These three innocent and godly women, thus falsely and wrongfully by men condemned for the just quarrel and cause of God's gospel, were brought to Smithfield, and there cruelly bound to the stake, gave their bodies to the tormentors on the 16th day of May, 1556.

An Account of the Martyrdom of THOMAS DROWRY, a blind Boy, and THOMAS CROKER, Bricklayer.

A Little before, ye have heard of two men, the one blind and the other lame, which suffered about the 15th of May. And here is not to be forgotten another as godly a couple, who suffered the like passion and martyrdom for the same cause of religion at Gloucester.

How long this blind boy was in prison, and in what year he suffered, I am not certain. Of this credible intelligence I have received by the testimony of the then register of Gloucester, named John Taylor, alias Barker, that the said blind boy, at his last examination and final condemnation, was brought (by the officers, under whose custody he had remained) before Dr. Williams, then chancellor of Gloucester, sitting judicially with the said register in the consistory, near unto the south-door, in the nether end of the church of Gloucester. Where the said chancellor then ministered unto the boy such usual articles as are accustomed in such cases, and are sundry times mentioned in this book.

Chancellor. Dost thou not believe, that after the words of consecration spoken by the priest, there remaineth the very real body of Christ in the sacrament of the altar?

To whom Thomas Drowry answered, No, that I do not.

Chancellor. Then thou art an heretic, and shalt be burned. But who hath taught thee this heresy?

Drowry. You, master chancellor.

Chancellor. Where, I pray thee?

Drowry. Even in yonder place: pointing with his hand, and turning towards the pulpit, standing upon the north side of the church.

Chancellor. When did I teach thee so?

Drowry. When you preached there (naming the day) a sermon to all men as well as to me, upon the sacrament. You said the sacrament was to be received spiritually by faith, and not carnally and really, as the papists have heretofore taught.

Chancellor. Then do as I have done, and thou shalt live as I do, and escape burning.

Drowry. Though you can so easily dispense with yourself, and mock with God, the world, and your own conscience, yet will I not so do.

Chancellor. Then the Lord have mercy upon thee, for I will read the condemnation sentence against thee.

Drowry. God's will be fulfilled.

The register being herewith somewhat moved, stood up and said to the chancellor:

Fie for shame, man, will you read the sentence against him, and condemn yourself? Away, away, and substitute some other to give sentence and judgment.

Chancellor. No, register, I will obey the law, and give sentence myself according to mine office.

And so he read the sentence condemnatory against the boy, (with an unhappy tongue, and a more unhappy conscience) delivering him over to the secular power. Who the said fifth day of May, brought the said blind boy to the place of execution, at Gloucester; together with one Thomas Croker, a bricklayer, condemned also for the like testimony of the truth. Where both together in one fire most constantly and joyfully yielded their souls into the hands of the Lord Jesus.

PERSECUTION in the COUNTY of SUFFOLK.

AFTER the death of these above rehearsed, were three men burnt at Beckles, in Suffolk, in one fire about the 21st day of May, Anno 1556. Whose names are here specified.

Thomas Spicer, of Winston, labourer; Johny Denny, and Edmund Poole.

This Thomas Spicer was a single man, of the age of nineteen years, and by vocation a labourer, dwelling in Winston, in the county of Suffolk, and there taken in his master's house in summer, about, or soon after sun-rising (being in his bed) by James Ling and John Keretch, of the same town, and William Davies, of Debnam, in the said county.

He was apprehended for not coming to hear mass, and because he would not receive their idol at the commandment of sir John Tyrrel, knight, of Gipping-hall, in Suffolk, and certain other justices there, who sent both him and them to the dungeon, in the town of Eye, in Suffolk, from whence they were all three together brought before Dunning, then chancellor of Norwich, and Mr. Mings the register sitting at the town of Beckles to be examined.

And there the chancellor endeavoured, but to no purpose, to persuade them from the truth. Wherefore minding in the end to give sentence on them, he burst out into tears, intreating them to remember themselves, and to turn again to the holy mother church, for that they were deceived and out of the truth, and that they ought not wilfully to cast themselves away, with such like words.

As he was thus labouring with them, and seemed very loth to read the sentence (for they were the first that he condemned in that diocese), the register there sitting by, being weary belike of tarrying, or else perceiving the constant martyrs to be at a point, called upon the chancellor in haste to rid them out of the way, and to make an end. At which words the chancellor read the condemnation over them with tears, and delivered them to the secular power.

The articles objected to these, and commonly to all others condemned in that diocese by Dr. Hopton, bishop of Norwich, and by Dunning his chancellor, were these:

1. First, it was articulate against them, that they believed not the pope of Rome to be supreme head, immediately under Christ, in earth, of the universal catholic church.
2. Item, That they believed not holy bread and holy water, ashes, palms, and all other like ceremonies used in the church, to be good and laudable for stirring up the people to devotion.
3. Item, That they believed not, after the words of consecration spoken by the priest, the very natural body of Christ, and no other substance of bread and wine to be in the sacrament of the altar.
4. Item, That they believed it to be idolatry to worship Christ in the sacrament of the altar.
5. Item, That they took bread and wine in remembrance of Christ's passion.
6. Item, That they would not follow the cross in procession, nor be confessed to a priest.

7. Item, That they affirmed no mortal man to have in himself free-will to do good or evil.

For this doctrine and these articles they were all three condemned by Dr. Dunning, and committed to the secular power, sir John Silliard being high sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk at the same time.

And the next day following they were all burnt together in the town of Beckles. Whereupon it is to be thought, that the writ De Comburendo, was not yet come down, nor could be, the lord chancellor Heath being at London the same time. Which, if it be true, then it is plain that they both went beyond their commission, that were the executioners; and also the clergy which were the instigators thereof, cannot make good what they now pretend; saying, that they did nothing but by law. But this let the Almighty find out when he seeth his time.

In the mean time while these good men were at the stake, they prayed, and said their belief; and when they mentioned the catholic church, sir John Silliard spake to them; That is well said, sirs, quoth he, I am glad to hear you say you do believe the catholic church. That is the best word I have heard of you yet.

To which his sayings Edmund Poole answered, That though they did believe the catholic church, yet do they not believe in their popish church, which is no part of Christ's catholic church, and therefore no part of their belief.

When they rose from prayer, they all went joyfully to the stake, and being bound thereto, and the fire burning about them, they praised God in such an audible voice, that it was wonderful to all those that stood by and heard them.

Then one Robert Bacon, dwelling in the said Beckles, a great enemy of God's truth, and a persecutor of his people, being there present within hearing thereof, willed the tormentors to throw one faggot to stop the breath of the knaves, as he termed them; so hot was his burning charity. But these good men not regarding their malice, confessed the truth, and yielded their lives to death for the testimony of the same, very gloriously and joyfully. Which constancy the Lord grant we may imitate, whether it be by death or by life, to glorify the name of Christ, Amen.

And forasmuch as we have here entered into the persecution of Norfolk and Suffolk, it cometh therefore to mind, by occasion hereof, briefly to touch by the way, some part (for the whole cannot be so expressed as it was done) touching the troubles of the town of Winston and Mendlesam, in Suffolk, raised and stirred by the said sir John Tyrrel and other justices there of the like affinity. The sum and effect of which briefly is thus signified to me in writing.

The PERSECUTION in the TOWNS of WINSON and MENDLESAM, in SUFFOLK.

BY the procurement of sir John Tyrrel, knight, and others of his colleagues, there were persecuted out of the town of Winson, in Suffolk, these persons hereafter following.

Mrs. Alice Twaites, gentlewoman, of the age of threescore years and more, and two of her servants.

Humphrey Smith, and his wife.

William Catchpoole, and his wife.

John Mauling, and his wife.

Nicholas Burlingham, and his wife.

And one Routh, and his wife.

Such as were persecuted and driven out of the town of Mendlesam, in the county of Suffolk, now follow.

Symon Harlstone, and Catherine his wife, with his five children.

William Whitting, and Catherine his wife.

Thomas Dobson, and his wife.

Thomas Hubbard, and his wife.

John Doncon, and his wife and maid.

William Doncon.

Thomas Woodward, the elder.

——Konbold's wife.

A poor widow.

One mother Semon's maid.

Besides those that were constrained to do against their conscience by the help of the parish priest.

These are the chief causes why those above-named were persecuted.

First, They held and believed the holy word of God to be sufficient unto their salvation.

Secondly, They denied the pope's usurped authority, and did hold all that church of Antichrist to be Christ's adversaries. And further, they refused the abused sacraments, defied the mass and all popish service and ceremonies, saying, they robbed God of his honour, and Christ of his death and glory, and would not come to the church, without it were to the defacing of that they did there.

Thirdly, They did hold that the ministers of the church by God's word might lawfully marry.

Fourthly, They held the queen to be as chief head, and wicked rulers to be a great plague sent of God for sin, &c.

Fifthly, They denied man's free-will, and held that the pope's church did err, and many other in that point with them, rebuking their false confidence in works, and their false trust in man's righteousness. Also when any rebuked those persecuted for going so openly, and talking so freely, their answer was, They acknowledged, confessed, and believed, and therefore they must speak: and that their tribulation was God's good will and providence, and that his judgments were right, to punish them with others for their sins; and that of very faithfulness and mercy God had caused them to be troubled, so that one hair of their heads should not perish before the time, but all things should work unto the best to them that love God; and that Christ Jesus was their life and only righteousness, and that only by faith in him, and for his sake, all good things were freely given them, also forgiveness of sins, and life everlasting.

Many of these persecuted were of great substance, and had possessions of their own.

Give God the praise.

Forasmuch as we are now in the month of May, before we overpass the same, and because the story is not long, and not unworthy peradventure of noting, it shall not grieve the studious reader, a little to give the hearing thereof, whereby to learn to marvel and muse at the great works of the Lord. "They that go down (saith the psalmist) into the sea, labouring upon the water, have seen the works of the Lord, and his mighty wonders upon the deep," Psal. cvi. The truth whereof may well appear in this following story; which, as it was written to me by the very person himself, one Thomas Morfe, who was the doer thereof, so I thought proper to insert the same in the following manner.

The HISTORY of one GREGORY CROW, who was miraculously preserved with his New Testament upon the Seas, May 26.

UPON Tuesday in Whitsun-week, May 26, 1556, (or else, as he rather thinketh, in the year immediately before) a certain poor man, named Gregory Crow, dwelling in Maulden, went to sea, intending to have gone into Kent for fullers earth, but by the way being bad weather, was driven upon a sand, where presently the boat sunk, and was full of water, so that the men were forced to hold by the mast of the boat, and all things that could swim, did swim out of her. Amongst which Crow saw his Testament in the water, and caught it, and put it into his bosom. Now it was ebbing water, so that within one hour the boat was dry, but so broken that they could not save her; but they went themselves upon the sand (being at least ten miles from the land) and there made their prayers together, that God would send some ship to their assistance (being in all two men and one boy), for they could stay there but an hour longer before it would be flood. In which time they found their chest, wherein were five pounds, six shillings and eight pence, "belonging to the said Crow; which money the other man (whose name I know not) took up, and gave it to the owner, who cast it into the sea, saying, If the Lord will save our lives, he will provide us a living; and so they got upon the mast, and there hung by the arms and legs for the space of ten hours, in which time the poor boy was so weary, and beaten with the sea, that he fell off and was drowned.

And when the water was gone again, and the sand dry, Crow said to the other man, It were best for us to take down our masts, and when the flood cometh we will sit upon them, and so it may please God to bring us to some ship that may take us up. Which accordingly they did, and so at ten of the clock in the night of the same Tuesday, the flood did bear up the mast whereon they sat.

And upon the Wednesday in the night the man died, being overcome with hunger and watching. So that there was none left but Crow, who driving up and down in the sea, called upon God as he could, and might not sleep for fear that the sea would have beaten him off.

So at length I myself (said Thomas Morfe) being laden to Antwerp with my crayer, going from Lee upon Friday, having within my vessel, of mariners and merchants, to the number of forty-six persons, and so coming to the Foreland, the wind was not very good, so that I was constrained to go somewhat out of my way, being in the afternoon about six of the clock, where at the last we saw a thing afar off, appearing unto us like a small buoy, that fishermen do use to lay with their hooks.

When we saw it, some said, Let us have some fish. And I said to him that was at the helm, Keep your course away, for we shall but hinder the fishermen, and have no fish neither: and so at my command he did. But at length he at the helm standing higher than all we did, said, Methinks, master, it is a man. But yet they, being in doubt that it was but a fisherman's buoy, turned the ship from him again to keep their course.

Crow beholding the ship to turn from him, being then in utter despair, and ready now to perish with watching, famine, and moreover miserably beaten with the seas, at last took his mariner's cap from his head, and holding up the same with his arm as high as he could, thought by shaking it as well as he might, to give them some token of better sight.

Whereupon the steerman, more sensibly perceiving a thing to move, advertised us again, declaring how he did plainly see a man's arm; and with that we all beheld him well, and so came to him and took him up. And as soon as we had him in our ship, he began to put his hand into his bosom, and one asked him if he had money there. No, said he, I have a book here, I think it be wet; and so drew out his Testament, which we then dried. But the sea had so beaten him, that his eyes, nose and mouth, were almost closed with salt, that the heat of his face and the weather had made. So that we made fire and shifted him with dry cloaths, and gave him aqua composita to drink, and such meat as was in the ship, and then let him sleep.

The next day we awaked him about eight of the clock in the morning, and his blood began somewhat to appear in his flesh (for when we took him up, his flesh was even as though it had been sodden, or as a drowned man's is) and then we talked with him of all the matter before rehearsed. And so sailing to Antwerp, the merchants who saw the thing, published the same in Antwerp; and because it was wonderful, many of the people there, both men and women, came to the ship to see him. Some gave him a petticoat, and some a shirt, some hose, and some money (always noting how he cast away his money and kept his book.)

And many of the women wept when they heard and saw him. And Master Governor of the English nation there had him before him, and talked with him of all the matter; and pitying his case, commanded the officer of the English house to go to the free Oste-houses amongst the English-merchants, and I with them, and at three houses there were given him six pounds ten shillings. And so from thence he went to Roan, where the people also came to him to see him, marvelling at the great works of God.

And thus much concerning this poor man, with his New Testament preserved in the sea, (which Testament the pope's clergy condemn on the land) ye have heard, as I received by the relation of the party above named, who was the doer thereof, and yet alive dwelling in Lee, well known to all merchants of London. In which story, this by the way understand, good reader, (which rightly may be supposed) that if this poor man, thus found and preserved in the sea with a New Testament in his bosom, had had instead of that a pix with a consecrated host about him, no doubt it had been rung ere this time all Christendom over for a miracle, so far as the pope hath any land.

But to let the pope with his false miracles go, let us return again and adjoin another history of much like condition, testified likewise by the information of the said Thomas Morfe above-mentioned, to the intent to make known the worthy acts of the Almighty; that he may be magnified in all his wondrous works. The story is thus declared, which happened Anno 1556, about Michaelmas.

THERE was a ship (saith the said Thomas Morfe) whereof I had a part, going toward the Bay for salt, with two ships of Brickley, which were altogether going for salt, as before is said. At the time we were within ten miles of the North Foreland, otherwise called Tenet, the wind did come so contrary to our ship, that we were forced to go clean out of the way, and the other two ships kept their course still, until our ship was almost out of sight of them. And then they saw a thing driving upon the sea, and hoisted out their boat and went unto it; and it was three men sitting upon a piece of their ship, who had sat so two days and two nights.

There had been in their ship eight men more, which were drowned, being all Frenchmen, dwelling in a place in France, called Olloronne. They had been at Dantzick, and lost their ship about Orford Ness, as might be learned by their words. They were men that feared God, the one of them was owner of the ship. Their exercise, while they were in our ship, was, that after their coming in, they gave thanks for their deliverance: both morning and evening they exercised prayer, and also before and after meat; and when they came into France, our ships went to the same place where these men dwelt, and one of these men did sell unto our men their ship's lading with salt, and did use them very courteously and friendly, and not at that time only, but always whensoever that ship cometh thither, (as she hath been there twice since) he always doth for them, so that they can lack nothing. I should have noted, that after our ship had taken up those three men out of the sea, they had the wind fair presently, and came and overtook the other two ships again, and so they proceeded in their voyage together.

For the more credit of this story above recited, to satisfy either the doubtful, or to prevent the quarreller, I have not only alledged the name of the party which was the doer thereof, but also expressed the matter in his own words, as I received it of him; the party and reporter himself being yet alive, and dwelling at Lee, a man so well known among the merchants of London, that whosoever heareth the name of Thomas Morfe, will never doubt thereof. And again, the matter itself being so notoriously known to merchants as well here as at Antwerp, that though his name were not expressed, the story can lack no witnesses.

The last day of the said month of May, in the year aforesaid, William Stuch being in prison for the said doctrine of the Lord's gospel, and the confession of his truth, died in the King's Bench, and was buried in the back-yard of the said prison, for that the Roman catholic spirituality thought him not worthy to come within their pope-holy church-yards, neither in any other christian burial-place, as they call it.

The HISTORY of FOUR MEN condemned at LEWES, June 6.

IN June next following, about the sixth day of the same month, four martyrs suffered together at Lewes, whose names were these:

Thomas Harland, of Woodmancote, carpenter.

John Oswald, of Woodmancote, husbandman.

Thomas Read.

To Thomas Harland, I find in the bishop of London's registers, to be objected to for his not coming to church. Whereunto he answered, That after the mass was restored, he never had will to hear the same, because (said he) it was Latin, which he did not understand, therefore as good, quoth he, never a whit, as never the better.

John Oswald denied to answer any thing, until his accusers should be brought face to face before him; and nevertheless said, The fire and faggots could not make him afraid: but as the good preachers which were in king Edward's time have suffered and gone before, so was he ready to suffer and come after, and would be glad thereof.

These four, after long imprisonment in the King's-Bench, were burned together at Lewes in Suffex, in one fire.

In the same town of Lewes, and in the same month likewise, were burned Thomas Whood, minister, and Thomas Milles, about the twentieth day of the same month, for resisting the erroneous and heretical doctrine of the pretended catholic church of Rome.

On the 24th of the same month likewise William Adherhall, minister, died in the prison of the King's-Bench, and was buried in the back-yard: also John Clement, wheelwright, who dying in the said prison, was buried in like manner upon the dung-hill in the back-yard, viz. the 25th day of June.

The next day following of the said month, we read of a certain young man, a merchant's servant, who for the like godliness suffered cruel persecution from the papists, and was burnt at Leicester the 26th day of June 1556.

An ACCOUNT of THIRTEEN MARTYRS, burned at STRATFORD the Bow.

NOT long after the death of the merchant's servant before-mentioned, there followed in this blessed order of martyrs, burned in one fire at Stratford the dwellings were in sundry places in Essex, and whose Bow, by London, eleven men and two women, whose names hereafter follow.

Henry Adlington.

Laurence Parnam.

Henry Wye.

William Hallywel.

Thomas Bowyer.

George Searles.

Edmund Hurst.

Lyon Cawch.

Ralph Jackson.

John Derifall.

John Routh.

Elizabeth Pepper.

Agnes George.

Unto whom, the sixth of June, 1556, Dr. Darbyshire, bishop Bonner's chancellor, in form of law ministered the same articles that were pronounced unto Thomas Whittle and his companions, mentioned before, to which they made their several answers, in simplicity and in a good conscience. The sum and effect whereof ensueth.

To the first, they all answered affirmatively; but Lyon Cawch added further, that he believed that the true faith and religion of Christ is wheresoever the word of God is truly preached.

To

To the second article they all answered in effect, denying that there be seven sacraments; some affirming that in the church of Christ there are but two sacraments, that is to say, baptism, and the Lord's supper: others referring themselves to believe as the Scripture teacheth them: and others refused to make answer because of their simplicity.

To the third article they all answered affirmatively.

To the fourth article they all answered affirmatively, except John Routh, who said he would make no answer thereunto. But Lyon Cawch added, that he believed the article to be true; but it was because he had no better knowledge. And Agnes George added, that in the time of king Edward the Sixth, she went from her old faith and religion, and believed in the faith and religion that was then taught and set forth.

To the fifth they also answered in effect affirmatively, except John Routh, whose answer was, that the mass is such a thing, which neither can nor will enter into his conscience. And Henry Adlington answered, that for nine or ten years before, he misliked the mass, and also the sacrament of the altar, because they cannot be proved by the scriptures. And as touching the authority of the see of Rome, he bring but fourteen years of age, took an oath against the same, which oath, he said, he intended to keep by the grace of God.

To the sixth they all answered affirmatively, except John Routh and William Hallywel who both refused to answer, because they knew not what they meant by this article. But the two women added, that they refused to be reconciled to the faith and religion that was then used in the realm of England. And Laurence Pernam added, that he never refused to be reconciled and brought to the unity of the catholic church of Christ.

To the seventh article they all answered affirmatively; but William Hallywel denied that ever he called the mass idolatry and abomination. And Henry Wye affirming the article to be true: yet he confessed his infirmity, that he went to his parish-church and received, before he was put to prison.

To the eighth article Edmund Hurst, Ralph Jackson, and George Searles, answered affirmatively: Henry Wye said, he was brought before certain justices of the peace in Essex, concerning one Higbed his late master, and thereupon he was committed to Colchester castle, and from thence sent to London to the bishop to be further examined. William Hallywel affirmed the like confession as Henry Wye did, only Higbed excepted. John Derifall said he was called before the lord Rich and Mr. Mildmay, of Chelmsford, and was by them sent to Bonner, bishop of London, to be further examined. Thomas Bowyer said he was brought before Mr. Wiseman, of Felsed, and by him was sent to Colchester castle, and from thence was carried to Bonner, bishop of London, to be by him further examined. Lyon Cowch said, that he was sent for to come before the king and queen's commissioners, and appearing before them three times, was sent to bishop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Henry Adlington said, that he coming to Newgate to speak with one Gratwike there, being prisoner for the testimony of Jesus Christ, was apprehended and brought before Dr. Story, and by him sent to bishop Bonner, to be by him further examined. John Routh said, that he was convented before the earl of Oxford, and by him was sent to the castle of Colchester, and from thence conveyed to bishop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Laurence Pernam said, that he was committed to Hertford prison, because he would not go to church, and from thence sent to bishop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Agnes George said, that she was committed to prison in Colchester, at the command of one Mr. Maynard, an alderman of the town, because she would not go to church, and from thence was sent to bishop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Elizabeth Pepper said, she was apprehended by two constables and an alderman, for that she would not come to church, and by them was sent to Bonner, bishop of London, to be by him further examined.

To the ninth article, they believed the premises all to be true as above by them confessed, and that they were of the diocese and jurisdiction of London. But Elizabeth Pepper added, that she was of the town of Colchester.

And Agnes George added, that she was of the parish of Barefold. And Lyon Cawch added, that he was at that present a merchant there.

Henry Wye, brewer, was of the parish of Stantford le Hore, and 32 years of age.

William Hallywel was a smith, of the parish of Waltham Holy-Cross, and of the age of 24 years, or thereabouts.

Ralph Jackson was a serving man of Chippin-Ongar, and of the age of 25 years.

Laurence Pernam was a smith of Hodsdon, within the parish of Amwell, in the county of Hertford, and of the age of 22 years.

John Derifall was a labourer, of the parish of Rettington, in Essex, and of the age of 50 years and above.

Edmund Hurst, labourer, of St. James's, in Colchester, was 50 years of age.

Thomas Bowyer was a weaver of Much Dunmow, and of the age of 36 years.

George Searles was a taylor, between 20 and 21 years of age, of the parish of White-Nottle, where he was taken and carried to the lord Rich, who sent him to Colchester castle, with a commandment that no friend he had in the world should speak with him. There he lay six weeks, and was sent up to London, where he was some time in the bishop's coal-house, some time in Lollard's tower, and last of all in Newgate. He was apprehended in Lent, about a fortnight before Easter, in the place aforesaid.

Lyon Cawch was a broker in Flanders, but when he was apprehended he resided in the city of London, and of the age of 28 years.

Henry Adlington was a sawyer, of Greensted, in the county of Suffex, of the age of 30 years.

John Routh was a labourer, and of the parish of Wickes, in Essex, of the age of 26 years.

Elizabeth Pepper was the wife of Thomas Pepper, weaver, of the parish of St. James, in the town of Colchester, of the age of 30 years, or thereabouts, who when she was burnt at Stratford, was eleven weeks gone with child, as she then testified to one Bosom's wife, who then unloosed her handkerchief, saying moreover, when she was asked why she did not tell them, Why, said she, they knew it well enough. O! such be the bloody hearts of this cruel generation, that no occasion can stay them from their mischievous murdering of the innocent saints of the Lord, who truly profess Christ crucified only and alone for the satisfaction of their sins.

Agnes George was the wife of Richard George, husbandman, of West Barefold, in the county of Essex, and of the age of 26 years. This Richard George had another wife before her, who was burnt in the Postern, at Colchester, and himself lay in prison till queen Elizabeth came to the crown, and then he was released.

When these thirteen were condemned, and the day appointed that they should suffer, which was the 27th of June, 1556, they were carried from Newgate in London the same day, to Stratford-Bow, (the place appointed for their martyrdom) and there divided into two parts, in two several chambers. Afterwards the sheriff, who there attended upon them, came to the one part, and told them that the other had recanted, and their lives therefore should be saved, willing and exhorting them to do the like, and not to cast themselves away.

Unto whom they answered, that their faith was not built upon man, but on Christ crucified. Then the sheriff perceiving no good to be done with them, went to the other part, and said (like a liar) the like to them, that they with whom he had been before, had recanted, and should therefore not suffer death, counselling them to do the like, and not wilfully to kill themselves, but to play the wise men, &c.

Unto

Unto whom they answered as their brethren had done before, that their faith was not built on man, but on Christ and his word, &c.

Now when he saw it needful to persuade (for they were, God be praised, surely grounded on the Rock Jesus Christ) he then led them to the place where they should suffer, and being there all together, they most earnestly prayed unto the Lord, and then joyfully went to the stake and kissed it, and embraced it very heartily.

The eleven men were tied to three stakes, and the two women loose in the middle without any stake, and so they were all burnt in one fire, with such love to each other, and constancy in our Saviour Christ, that it made all the lookers on to marvel. The Lord grant us the like grace in the like need, according to the good pleasure of his will, Amen.

In the company of these aforesaid thirteen, were three more condemned to die, whose names are hereunder specified.

Thomas Freeman, William Stannard, and William Adams.

These three answered to the same articles that were propounded to the aforesaid thirteen, in effect as they did. And being thus in the hands of the secular power, Cardinal Poole sent his dispensation for their lives, by what occasion I cannot safely say, but by means thereof they then escaped.

The Sunday after these aforesaid sixteen were condemned, Fecknam, dean of St. Paul's, preached at Paul's Cross, where he declared, that he had as many sundry opinions as they were sundry persons. At the hearing whereof they drew out their faith, and set to their hands as hereafter followeth, and directed the same to their friends, and the faithful congregation, as followeth.

Unto all our dearly beloved FRIENDS, and the holy CONGREGATION of JESUS CHRIST, even so many as love GOD, grace be with you, and peace from God our Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ. So be it.

BE it manifest to all unto whom this our certificate shall be seen, that whereas, upon Saturday, being the thirteenth day of June, at Fulham before the bishop of London, sixteen of us (whose names are hereunder subscribed) were condemned to die for the most pure and sincere truth of Christ's verity; which most godly truth hath been from the beginning with the wicked adversaries thereof continually defeated, and is by the devil and his imps, even at this present, likewise daily slandered: upon this occasion, dearly beloved brethren, we are moved, yea constrained, in the ears of all men to manifest our belief, and also briefly the articles whereof we are condemned, for the avoiding of false reports and slanderous tongues, which might happen by the most ungodly and uncharitable sermon lately preached at Paul's cross, the fourteenth of the said month, being Sunday, by Mr. Fecknam, now dean of the same church; where he, in that most worthy audience, defamed us to be in sixteen sundry opinions, which were a thing prejudicial to all christian verity: and for a testimonial thereof, this hereunder written shall answer our cause, and therefore we pray you that are of God to judge.

The first, We believe we were baptized in the faith of Christ's church, and incorporate unto him, and made members of his church, in which faith we continue. And although we have erred for a certain time, yet the root of faith was preserved in us by the Holy Ghost: which hath reduced us into a full certainty of the same, and we do persist, and will by God's assistance to the end. Now mark, that although the minister were of the church malignant, yet his wickedness did not hurt us, for that he baptized us in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

There was both the word and the element, and our godfathers and godmothers renouncing for us the devil and all his works, and confessing the articles of the christian faith for us, and also witnesses that we are baptized, not in the faith of the church of Rome, but in the faith of Christ's church.

1. Item, There are but two sacraments in Christ's church, that is, the sacrament of baptism, and the Lord's supper. For in these are contained the faith of Christ's church; that is, the two testaments, the law and the gospel. The effect of the law is repentance, and the effect of the gospel remission of sins.

2. Item, We believe that is a visible church, wherein the word of God is preached, and the holy sacraments truly administered, visible to the wicked world, although it be not credited, and by the death of saints confirmed, as it was in the time of Elias the prophet as well as no.

3. Item. The see of Rome is the see of Antichrist, the congregation of the wicked, &c. whereof the pope is head under the devil.

4. Item, The mass is not only a profanation of the Lord's supper, but also a blasphemous idol.

5. Item, God is neither spiritually nor corporally in the sacrament of the altar, and there remaineth no substance in the same, but only the substance of bread and wine.

For these articles of our belief, we being condemned to die, do willingly offer our corruptible bodies to be dissolved in the fire, all with one voice assenting and consenting thereunto, and in no point dissenting or disagreeing from any of our former articles.

Apparent also let it be and known, that being examined on the former articles before the bloody bishop, the said day and time, we affirmed to believe all that he or they would prove by the scriptures. But he said that he would not stand to prove it with heretics, but said they themselves were the holy church, and that we ought to believe them, or else to be cut off like withered branches.

About the fourteenth of June, in the same year, John Colstock, who was lately come from London, and now dwelling at Wellington, though he did not suffer martyrdom, yet he sustained some trouble, being examined by the bishop, named Ralph Bane, for his religion, especially for two points, in holding against the reality of Christ in the sacrament, and against auricular confession to be made to the priest. For which cause being compelled to recant, he was enjoined in the church of St. Cedde to bear a faggot before the cross bare-headed, having in the one hand a taper, and in the other a pair of beads, &c.

Amongst divers others, which in the same diocese, and at the same time, were suspected and troubled for the like, was Thomas Flier, of Uttoxater, shoe maker; Nich. Ball, of Uttoxater; Thomas Pyot, of Chedull.

Item, Henry Crimes, for marrying his wife on Palm-Sunday eve, &c. Some others also there were which had the like penance enjoined them, as Thomas Johnson, about the 26th day of this month of June, because he swore by the holy mass before the bishop sitting in judgment, who for the same was driven to go before the cross with his taper and beads, &c.

In the same month of June one Thomas Parret died in the prison of the King's-Bench in Southwark, and was buried in the back-yard the 27th day of the said month.

Also Martin Hunt (as is reported) was famished in the same prison the 29th day. At which time likewise died in the same prison, as I find recorded, one John Norice, and after the same sort as the other was buried in the back-yard of the said prison.

The MARTYRDOM of ROGER BERNARD, ADAM FOSTER, and ROBERT LAWSON.

WHEN Roger Bernard came before the bishop, first he asked, whether he had been with the priest at Easter to be shriven, and whether he had received the blessed sacrament of the altar, or no? Unto whom Roger Bernard answered, No: I have not been with the priest, nor confessed myself unto him, but I have confessed my sins to Almighty God, and I trust he hath forgiven me; whereof I shall not need to go to the priest for such matters, who cannot help himself.

Bishop. Surely, Bernard, thou must needs go, and confess thyself unto him.

Bernard. That shall I not do (by God's grace) while I live.

Bishop. What a stout heretic is this! How impudently he answereth!

Bernard. My lord, it grieveth me no whit (I thank God) to be called heretic at your hands: for so your forefathers called the prophets and confessors of Christ long before this time.

At these words the bishop rose up in great heat, and bade Bernard follow him. Then the bishop went and kneeled before what they call the sacrament of the altar, and as he was in his prayers kneeling, he looked back, and asked Bernard why he came not and did as he did. Unto whom Bernard answered, I cannot tell why I should do so. Why, quoth the bishop, thou lewd fellow, whom seest thou yonder? pointing to the pyx over the altar.

Bernard. I see no body there. Do you, my lord?

Bishop. Why, naughty man, dost thou not see thy Maker?

Bernard. My Maker? No, I see nothing but a few clouts hanging together on a heap.

With that the bishop rose up sore displeased, and commanded the gaoler to take him away, and to lay irons enough on him. For, said he, I will tame him ere he go from me; I think so: and so he was carried away.

The next day Bernard was brought again before the bishop, who asked him, if he did not remember himself since the day before that he was before him.

Bernard. Yes, my lord, I have remembered myself very well; for the same man I was yesterday, I am this day, and I hope shall be all the days of my life, concerning the matter you talked with me of.

Then one of the guard standing by, said, My lord, I pray you, trouble not yourself any more with him, but let me have the examining of him, I shall handle him after another sort, I think, and make him a fair child ere he go, you shall see.

So he was committed to him, and brought by him to an inn, where were a great many priests assembled together, and there they all fell to flatter him, and persuaded him with fair enticing words, what they could; but when they could not prevail therein, then they began to threaten him with whipping, stocking, burning, and such like. Unto whom Bernard said, Friends, I am not better than my master Christ, and the prophets which your fathers served after such sort; and I, for his name's sake, am content to suffer the like at your hands, if God shall so permit, trusting that he will strengthen me in the same according to his promise, in spite of the devil and all his ministers. So when they could not make him relent or yield, they said, Behold, a right scholar of John Fortune, whom they had then in prison. Then they carried him to the bishop, who immediately condemned him as an heretic, and delivered him to the secular power.

This Roger Bernard was a single man, and by his vocation a labourer, dwelling in Framsdon, in Suffolk, who was taken in the night by Mr. Tamage's men, because he would not go to church to hear their unfavoury service, and so by them carried to prison.

The HISTORY of ADAM FOSTER.

ADAM FOSTER, of the age of six and twenty years, husbandman, being married, dwelling in Mendlesam, in the county of Suffolk, was taken at home in his house, a little before the sun's going down, by the constables of the said town, George Revet and Thomas Mause, at the commandment of sir John Tyrrel, knight, of Gipping-hall, in Suffolk, because he would not go to church and hear mass, and receive at Easter, except he might have it after Christ's holy ordinance. When they came for him, they told him he must go with them unto the justice. Unto whom Adam Foster said, For Christ's cause, and to save his conscience, he was well contented; and so they led him to sir John Tyrrel, and he sent him to Eye-dungeon, in Suffolk, from whence at length he was sent to Norwich, and there condemned by bishop Hopton.

Now after his apprehension, the said Thomas Mause and George Revet were stricken with a great fear and sickness, whereby Mause pined and consumed away, even unto death, although he was a lusty young man. But George Revet, who was the said Mause's fellow, and a great reader of the scripture, or (as many term it) a talkative gospeller, would not be premonished by the works of God, but set his son to help the priest at mass, and to be clerk of the same town of Mendlesam for lucre sake; yet was there a fair warning given him of God, although he had not the grace so to consider it, which thing was this:

A young man of the same parish, newly married, called Robert Edgore, being of a ripe wit and sound judgment, was clerk in the said church before the said Revet set his son in that room, and executed the office a little; yea, alas, too long, against his own conscience; whereby at length the Lord so took away his wits, that many years after, his poor and woeful wife, good woman, was compelled to keep him chained, and bound continually, lest he should unawares do himself or some other some mischief, as many times (the more pity) he was ready enough to do.

This (as I said) would not admonish Revet, but needs he must persist in his wicked purpose. Notwithstanding at length, as many men were offended with him in the parish, so honest women especially, (being mightily grieved at his ungodly doings) came to him and said, Neighbour Revet, are you not afraid to let your son help the naughty priest to say mass, and to serve that abominable idol? And he said, No.

Then said they, We fear not to go to church and hear mass, seeing you, being a man that so much professes christianity, will let your son help the priest to say mass, &c.

At which words Revet waxed angry, and in his rage immediately made his prayer unto God after this manner, or with such like words, saying, O Lord, if it be not thy will that my son should so do; then I beseech thee send some strange token, to let me understand what thy good pleasure is therein, &c. So according to his petition, within a short space after, his neighbour's bull came into his pasture, and he having a very proper gelding, which was his felicity above every thing he had, the bull running upon him, did so wound and gore him, that immediately thereof his gelding died, and he thereby nothing amended. For although he knew and confessed, that it was the Lord's hand upon him for the sufferance of his son in that wicked vocation; yet would he not take him from it, but permitted him still to use and frequent the same against his own conscience.

At last the Lord sent upon him a great swelling in his legs, which did so grievously vex and trouble him, by reason it swelled upward, that at length, having thereby brought upon him a very strange sickness, he died most miserably, and so impatient a manner, that it terrified all good hearts to hear thereof. The Lord grant, for Christ's sake, that we may observe his judgments better, to his glory, and our comfort, Amen.

The HISTORY of ROBERT LAWSON.

ROBERT LAWSON was a single man, of the age of thirty years, and by vocation a linen-weaver, who was apprehended in the night, by one Robert Kererh, at the command of sir John Tyrrel, of Gipping-hall, in Suffolk, knight, and so was immediately carried to Eye-dungeon, in Suffolk, where he remained a certain time, and after was led to Bury. The cause of his being taken, was for that he would not go to church to hear mass, and receive their popish idol.

When these three aforefaid martyrs were carried to their death, namely Roger Bernard, Adam Foster, and Robert Lawson, of Bury, after they had made their prayer, being at the stake, and the tormentors attending the fire, they most triumphantly ended their lives, in such a happy and blessed condition, as did notably set forth their constancy and joyful end, to the great praise of God, and their commendation in him, and also to the encouragement of others in the same quarrel to do the like. The Lord of strength fortify us to stand as his true soldiers in what standing soever he shall think it good to place us, Amen.

In the examination of Roger Bernard, you heard a little before, how he was compared by the priests there to John Fortune, and called his scholar. This John Fortune, otherwise called Cutler, of Hintlesham, in Suffolk, was by his occupation a black-smith, whom they had before them in examination a little before, on the 20th day of April. In spirit he was zealous and ardent, in the scriptures ready, in Christ's cause stout and valiant, in his answers marvellous, and no less patient in his wrongful suffering, than constant in his doctrine. Whether he was burnt or died in prison, I cannot certainly find; but I rather suppose that he was burnt. Certain it is, howsoever, he was made away with, as he never yielded. What his answers and examinations were before Dr. Parker and the bishop, you shall hear, although not with his own mouth spoken, yet with his own hand written what he did say, as followeth.

FIRST, Dr. Parker asked me how I believed in the catholic faith.

And I asked him which faith he meant; whether the faith that Stephen had, or the faith of them that put Stephen to death.

Dr. Parker being moved, said, What an impudent fellow is this? You shall soon see anon, he will deny the blessed sacrament of the altar.

Then said Mr. Foster, I know you well enough. You are a busy merchant. How sayest thou by the blessed mass?

And I stood still and made no answer.

Then said Foster, Why speakest thou no, and make the gentleman an answer?

And I said, Silence is a good answer to a foolish question.

Then said Dr. Parker, I am sure he will deny the blessed sacrament of the altar also.

And I answered, I know none such but only the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Then said Dr. Parker, You deny the order of the seven sacraments. And why dost not thou believe in the sacrament of the altar?

And I answered, Because it is not written in God's book.

Then, said he, you will not believe unwritten verities.

And I answered, I will believe that those unwritten verities that agree with the written verities be true: but those unwritten verities that are of your own making, and inventions of your own brain, I do not believe.

Well, said Mr. Foster, you shall be whipped and burned for this gear.

Then answered I, If you knew how these words do rejoice my heart, you would not have spoken them.

Then said Mr. Foster, Away, thou fool, dost thou rejoice in whipping?

Yes, answered I, for it is written in the scriptures, and Christ saith, Thou shalt be whipped for my name's sake: and since the time that the sword of tyranny came into your hands, I heard of none that were whipped. Happy were I, if I had the maiden-head of this persecution.

Away with him then, said he, for he is ten times worse than Samuel: and so he was carried to prison again.

WHEN I came before the bishop, he asked me if I did not believe in the catholic church.

I answered, I believe that church whereof Christ is the head.

Then said the bishop, Dost thou not believe that the pope is supreme head of the church?

And I answered, No, Christ is the head of the true church.

Bishop. So do I believe also: but the pope is God's vicar upon earth, and the head of the church, and I believe that he hath power to forgive sins also.

Fortune. The pope is but a man, and the prophet David saith, "That no man can deliver his brother, nor make agreement unto God for him; for it cost more to redeem their souls, so that he must let that alone for ever."

And the bishop again fetching about a great circumstance, said, Like as the bell-weather weareth the bell, and is the head of the flock of sheep: so is the pope our head. And as the hives of bees have a master-bee that bringeth the bees to the hive again: so doth our head bring us home again to our true church.

Then I asked him, whether the pope were a spiritual man. And he said, Yea. And I said again, They are spiteful men; for in 17 months there were three popes, and one poisoned another for that presumptuous seat of Antichrist.

Bishop. It is maliciously spoken, for thou must obey the power and not the man. And thus was the pope denied to be supreme head. Well, what sayest thou to the ceremonies of the church?

And I answered, "All things that are not planted by my heavenly Father, shall be plucked up by the roots," saith our Saviour: for they are not from the beginning, neither shall they continue to the end.

Bishop. They are good and godly, and necessary to be used.

Fortune. St. Paul called them weak and beggarly.

Bishop. No, that is a lie.

I hearing that, said, that St. Paul writeth thus in the fourth chapter to the Galatians, "You foolish Galatians, (saith he) who hath bewitched you, that ye seek to be in bondage to these weak and beggarly ceremonies?" Now which of you doth lie, you or St. Paul? And also it is said, That works instituted, and enjoined without the commandment of God, pertain not to the worship of God, according to the text, Matth. xv. "In vain do men worship me with men's traditions and commandments." And St. Paul, "Wherefore do ye carry us away from the grace of Christ to another kind of doctrine?" And Christ openly rebuked the scribes, lawyers, pharisees, doctors, priests, bishops, and hypocrites, for making God's commandments of none effect, to support their own tradition.

Bishop. Thou liest, there is not such a word in all the scriptures, thou impudent heretic. Thou art worse than all other heretics; for Hooper and Bradford allow them to be good, and thou dost not. Away with him.

Here you may perceive how that the catholic church cannot err, but whatsoever they say must needs be true. And

And so my Lord bishop cannot lie, as it may appear to all men plainly in the next.

The THIRD EXAMINATION of JOHN FORTUNE, before the BISHOP of NORWICH.

THE next day I was brought before the said bishop again, where he preached a sermon upon the sixth chapter of St. John's gospel, from Christ's words, "I am the bread that came down from heaven," &c. And thereupon had a great bibles babble to no purpose. So in the end I was called before him, and he said to me:

Bishop. How believest thou in the sacrament of the altar? Dost thou not believe, that after the consecration, there is the real substance of the body of Christ?

Fortune. That is the greatest plague that ever came into England.

Bishop. Why so?

Fortune. If I were a bishop, and you a poor man as I am, I would be ashamed to ask such a question: for a bishop should be apt to teach and not to learn.

Bishop. I am appointed by the law to teach, you are not.

Fortune. Your law breaketh out very well: for you have burned up the true bishops and preachers, and maintained liars in their stead.

Bishop. Now you may understand that he is a traitor: for he denieth the higher powers.

Fortune. I am no traitor: for St. Paul saith, "All souls must obey the higher powers," and I resist not the higher powers concerning my body, but I must resist your evil doctrine wherewith you would infect my soul.

Then said a doctor, My lord, you do not well: let him answer shortly to his articles.

Bishop. How sayest thou? make an answer quickly to these articles.

Fortune. St. Paul saith, Heb. x. "Christ did one sacrifice once for all, and sat him down at the right hand of his Father," triumphing over hell and death, making intercession for sins.

Bishop. I ask thee no such question, but make answer to this article.

Fortune. If it be not God before the consecration, it is not God after: for God is without beginning and without ending.

Bishop. Lo, what a stiff heretic is this! He hath denied all together: how sayest thou? Is it idolatry to worship the blessed sacrament or no?

Fortune. God is a Spirit, and will be worshipped in spirit and truth.

Bishop. I ask thee no such question: answer me directly.

Fortune. I answer, that this is the God Mauzzim, that robbeth God of his honour.

Bishop. It is pity that the ground beareth thee, or that thou hast a tongue to speak.

Then said the scribe, Here are a great many articles.

Then said the bishop, Away with him: for he hath spoken too much.

The LAST EXAMINATION of J. FORTUNE.

WHEN I came to mine examination again, the bishop asked me if I would stand unto mine answers that I made before: and I said, yea; for I had spoken nothing but the truth. And after that he made a great circumstance upon the sacrament.

Then I desired him to stand to the text, and he read the gospel on Corpus Christi day, which said, "I am the bread which came down from heaven:" believest thou not this? and I said, Yea truly.

And he said, Why dost thou deny the sacrament?

Because your doctrine is false, said I.

Then, said he, how can that be false which is spoken in the scripture?

And I answered, Christ said, "I am the bread:"

and you say the bread is he. Therefore your doctrine is false.

And he said, Dost thou not believe that the bread is he? I answered, No.

Bishop. I will bring thee to it by the scriptures.

Fortune. Hold that fast, my lord: for that is the best argument that you have had yet.

Bishop. Thou shalt be burned like an heretic.

Fortune. Who shall give judgment upon me?

Bishop. I will judge an hundred such as thou art, and never be shriven upon it.

Fortune. Is there not law for the spirituality, as well as for the temporality?

And sir Clement Higham said, Yes, what meanest thou by that?

Fortune. When a man is perjured by the law, he is cast over the bar, and sitteth no more in judgment. And the bishop is a perjured man, and ought not to sit in judgment.

Bishop. How provest thou that?

Fortune. Because you took an oath in king Henry's days to resist the pope. So both spiritual and temporal are perjured, that here can be no true judgment.

Bishop. Thinkest thou to escape judgment by that? No: for my chancellor shall judge thee. He took no oath, for he was then out of the realm.

C. Higham. It is time to weed out such fellows as you are, indeed.

Bishop. Good fellow, why believest thou not in the sacrament of the altar?

Fortune. Because I find it not in God's book, nor yet in the doctors. If it were there, I would believe it with all my heart.

Bishop. How knowest thou it is not there?

Fortune. Because it is contrary to the second commandment: and seeing it is not written in God's book, why do you then rob me of my life?

Then the bishop having no more to say, commanded the bailiff to take him.

And thus much concerning the examinations of this man. Now whether he died in fire, or was otherwise prevented with death, as I said before, I am uncertain.

In the register of Norwich this I do find, that his sentence of condemnation was drawn and registered; but whether it was pronounced, is not expressed in the said register, according as the usual manner of the notary is so to declare, in the end of the sentence. Nevertheless this is most certain, that he never abjured nor recanted, howsoever it pleased the Lord by death to call him out of the world.

The DEATH of JOHN CARELESS, in the King's-Bench.

ABOUT the first of July, John Careless, of Coventry, weaver, died in the King's-Bench prison: who though he were by the secret judgment of Almighty God prevented by death, so that he came not to the full martyrdom of his body, yet is he no less worthy to be counted in honour and place of Christ's martyrs, than others that suffered most cruel torments; as well because he was for the same truth's sake a long time imprisoned, as also for his willing mind and zealous affection he had thereunto, if the Lord had so determined it, as may well appear by his examination before Dr. Martin. Which examination, because it contained nothing almost but wrangling interrogatories, and matters of contention, wherein Dr. Martin would enter into no communication about the articles of his accusation, but only urged him to detect his fellows, it is not therefore greatly material to express the whole, but only to insert so much as pertains to the question of predestination, which may bring some fruit to the reader.

FIRST, Dr. Martin calling John Careless to him in his chamber, demanded what was his name? To whom whom when the other had answered, that his name was John Careless, then began Dr. Martin to descant at his pleasure upon that name, saying, that it would appear by his condition, by that time he had done with him, that he would be a true careless man indeed. And so after a deal of unnecessary talk there spent about much needless matter, then he asked him where he was born.

Forsooth, saith Careless, at Coventry.

Martin. At Coventry? What, so far, man? How camest thou hither? Who sent thee to the King's-bench prison?

Careless. I was brought hither by a writ, I think; what it was I cannot tell. I suppose master Marshal can tell you.

Marshal. In good faith I cannot tell what the matter is; but indeed my lord chief justice sent him from the bar.

Martin. Well, Careless, I would thou shouldst play the wise man's part. Thou art a handsome man, and it is a pity but thou shouldst do well, and save that which God hath bought.

Careless. I thank your good mastership most heartily: and I put you out of doubt, that I am most sure and certain of my salvation by Jesus Christ; so that my soul is safe already, whatsoever pains my body suffer here for a little time.

Martin. Yea marry, you say truth. For thou art so predestinate to life, that thou canst not perish in whatsoever opinion thou dost die.

Careless. That God hath predestinated me to eternal life in Jesus Christ, I am most certain, and even so am I sure that his Holy Spirit (wherewith I am sealed) will preserve me from all heresies and evil opinions, that I shall die in none at all.

Martin. Go to, let me hear thy faith in predestination. For that shall be written also.

Careless. Your mastership shall pardon me herein. For you said yourself ere now, that you had no commission to examine my conscience. I will trouble myself with answering no more matters than I needs must, until I come before them that shall have more authority further to examine me.

Martin. I tell thee then I have a commission and commandment from the council to examine thee: for they delivered me thy articles.

Careless. Yea, I think indeed that your mastership is appointed to examine me of my articles, which you have there in writing, and I have told you the truth. I do confess them to be mine own fact and deed: but you do now examine me of predestination, whereof my articles speak nothing at all.

Martin. I tell thee yet again, that I must also examine thee of such things as be in controversy between thee and thy fellows in the King's-bench, whereof predestination is a part, as thy fellow N—— hath confessed, and thyself dost not deny it.

Careless. I do not deny it. But he that first told you that, might have found himself much better occupied.

Martin. Why, what if he had not told me, thinkest thou that I would not have known it? Yes, or else thou shouldst have withstood my commission. For I tell thee the truth, I may now examine thee of the blessed sacrament, or any other thing that I like, but that I would shew thee favour, and not be too hasty with thee at the first.

Marshal. Yea, indeed, Careless, Mr. Doctor hath a commission to examine you or any other of your fellows.

Martin. Yea, marry that I have, I tell thee the truth of it.

Careless. Then let your scribe set his pen to the paper, and you shall have it roundly, even as the truth is. I believe that Almighty God, our most dear loving Father, of his great mercy and infinite goodness, did elect in Christ.

Martin. Tush, what need of all that long circumstance? Write, I believe God elected; and make no more ado.

Careless. No, not so, Mr. Doctor: it is an high mystery, and ought reverently to be spoken of. And if my words may not be written as I do utter them, I will not speak at all.

Martin. Go to, go to, write what he will. Here is more business than needeth.

Careless. I believe that Almighty God, our most dear and loving Father, of his great mercy and infinite goodness (through Jesus Christ), did elect and appoint in him before the foundation of the earth was laid, a church or congregation, which he doth continually guide and govern by his grace and Holy Spirit, so that not one of them shall ever finally perish.

When this was written, Mr. Doctor took it in his hand, and read it, saying,

Why, who will deny this?

Careless. If your mastership do allow this, and other learned men when they shall see it, I have my heart's desire.

Martin. And do you hold no otherwise than is here written?

Careless. No verily, nor never did.

Martin. Write what he saith, Otherwise he holdeth not. So that was written.

Martin. It was told me also, that thou dost affirm, That Christ did not die effectually for all men.

Careless. Whatsoever hath been told you, it is not much material unto me. Let the tellers of such tales come before my face, and I trust to make them answer. For indeed I do believe that Christ did effectually die for all those that do effectually repent and believe, and for no other. So that was written also.

Martin. Now, fir, what is Trew's faith of predestination? He believeth that all men are predestinate, and that none shall be damned, doth he not?

Careless. No forsooth, that he doth not.

Martin. How then?

Careless. Truly I think he doth believe as your mastership and the rest of the clergy do believe of predestination, that we are elected in respect of our good works, and so long elected as we do them, and no longer.

Martin. Write what he saith, That his fellow Trew believeth of predestination as the papists do believe.

Careless. Ah, master Doctor, did I so term you? Seeing that this my confession shall come before the council, I pray you place my terms as reverently as I speak them.

Martin. Well, well, write that Trew is of the same faith as the catholics be.

Careless. I did not so call you neither; I wonder what you mean.

Martin. You said the clergy, did you not?

Careless. Yes forsooth did I. So then it was written of the clergy.

Martin. Now, fir, what say you more?

Careless. Forsooth I have no further to say in this matter.

Martin. Well, Careless, I pray thee prove thyself a wise man, and do not cast away thy life wilfully.

Careless. Now the Lord he knoweth, good Mr. Doctor, I would full gladly live, so that I might do the same with a safe conscience. And your mastership shall right well perceive that I will be no wilful man, but in all things that I stand upon I will have sure ground.

Martin. Now the Lord knoweth, good Careless, that I would gladly make some means to preserve thy life. But thou speakest so much of the Lord, the Lord; wilt thou be content to go with my lord Fitzwater into Ireland? Methinks thou art a handsome fellow, and would do the queen a service there. What sayest thou?

Careless. Verily, Mr. Doctor, whether I be in Ireland, France, or Spain, or any place else, I am ready to do her grace the best service that I can, with body, goods, and life, so long as it doth last.

Martin. That is honestly said, I promise thee every man will not say so. How say you, Mr. Marshal?

This man is meet for all manner of service. Indeed thou art worthy, Careless, to have the more favour.

Careless. Indeed, sir, I hope to be meet and ready unto all things that pertain unto a true christian subject to do. And if her grace or her officers under her do require of me to do any thing contrary to Christ's religion, I am ready also to do my service in Smithfield for not observing it, as my bed-fellow and other worthy brethren have done, praised be God for them.

Martin. By my troth thou art as pleasant a fellow as ever I talked with of all the protestants, except it were Tomson. I am sorry that I must depart from thee so soon; but I have such business now, that I can tarry with thee no longer. Well, yet thou canst not deny, but you are at variance among yourselves in the King's-bench, and it is so throughout all your congregation: for you will not be a church.

Careless. No, master Doctor, that is not so. There is a thousand times more variety in opinions among your doctors, which you call of the catholic church, yea, and that in the sacrament, for which there is so much blood shed now-a-days, I mean of your latter doctors and new writers; as for the old, they agree wholly with us.

Martin. No, Careless, this is not so; there thou art deceived.

Careless. Verily it is so, master Doctor; I am not deceived therein any thing at all, as it hath been, and is evidently proved by such as God hath indued with great learning.

Then he turned to the marshal, and whispered with him a while.

Turning to me again, he said, Farewel, Careless: for I can tarry no longer with thee now, my business is such.

Careless. God be with you, my good master Doctor, the Lord give your mastership health of body and soul.

Martin. God have mercy, good Careless, and God keep thee from all errors, and give thee grace to do as well as I would with myself.

Careless. I thank your good mastership: I pray God I may do always that which is acceptable in his sight. Whereunto they all said, Amen. And so I departed with a glad heart; God only have the whole praise, Amen.

It appeareth by the examination of the said John Careless, that he suffered two whole years imprisonment, having a wife and children. When he was in Coventry gaol, he was in such credit with the keeper, that upon his word he was let out to play in the pageant about the city with his companions, always returning punctually to prison again at the hour appointed.

After that, being brought to London, he was indued with such patience and constant fortitude, that he longed for nothing more earnestly, than the promotion of dying in the fire for the profession of his faith: but it pleasing God to prevent him by death in the prison, he was buried in the fields in a dunghill.

While he was prisoner in the King's-bench, he happened to be very much troubled in conscience, whereupon he wrote to Mr. Philpot, then in bishop Bonner's coal-house: upon occasion whereof, Mr. Philpot sent him an epistle of consolation, which is inserted before among Mr. Philpot's letters. Unto which epistle John Careless made the following answer.

L E T T E R I.

From Mr. JOHN CARELESS, in answer to the loving Epistle sent to him by Mr. JOHN PHILPOT.

A faithful friend is a strong defence; who so findeth such a one, findeth a treasure.

A faithful friend hath no peer; the weight of gold and silver is not to be compared to the goodness of his faith.

A faithful friend is a medicine of Life, and they that fear the Lord shall find him, Ecclesi. vi.

THE Father of mercy and God of all consolation, comfort you with his eternal Spirit, my most dear and faithful loving friend, good Mr. Philpot, as you have comforted me by the mighty operation of the same; the everlasting God therefore be praised for ever, Amen.

Ah, my dear heart, and most loving brother, if I should do nothing else day and night, so long as the days of heaven do endure, but kneel on my knees, and read psalms, I can never be able to render unto God sufficient thanks, for his great mercy, fatherly kindness, and most loving compassion extended unto me most vile, sinful, wicked, and unworthy wretch. O that the Lord would open my mouth, and give me a thankful heart, that from the bottom of the same might flow his continual praise. O that my sinful flesh (which is the cause of sorrow) were clean separated from me, that I might sing psalms of thanksgiving unto the Lord's name for ever; that with good Samuel's mother, I might continually record this noble verse following, which by the good experience I have found most true, praised be my God therefore.

"The Lord (saith that good woman) killeth and maketh alive; he bringeth down to hell, and fetcheth up again. Praised be the Lord for ever, yea, and praised be his name for that he hath given me true experience and lively feeling of the same. Blessed be the Lord God, whose mercy endureth for ever, which hath not dealt with me according to my deserts, nor destroyed me in his displeasure when I had justly deserved it. Oh, what reward shall I give again unto the Lord for all the great benefits that he hath done for my soul! I will gladly receive the cup of salvation at his hand, and will worship his name with prayer and with praise."

Ah, my dear heart, yea most dear to me in the Lord, think not this sudden change in me to be some fickle phantasy of my foolish head, (as indeed some others would surely suspect it to be) for doubtless it is the marvellous doing of the Lord, most merciful unto me his unworthy creature. God, for his great mercy's sake, give me grace to be more thankful unto him than I heretofore have been, and keep me that I never fall from his favour again.

And now, my dear brother, and most blessed messenger of the Lord, whose beautiful feet have brought many glad tidings to my soul; what shall I do or say unto you, in the least part to recompense the fatherly affection and godly care that you continually keep for me? O that God would give me the spirit of fervent prayer, that I might yet that way supply some little part of my duty toward you. Ah, my true loving friend, how soon did you lay aside all other business, to make a sweet plaister for my wounded conscience, yea, and that out of a painful pair of stocks, which place must needs be uneasy to write in; but God hath brought you into a strait place, that you might set my soul at liberty. Out of your pinching and painful seat, you have plentifully poured upon me your precious ointment, the sweet favour whereof hath greatly refreshed my tired soul. The Lord likewise refresh you, both body and soul, by pouring the oil of his gracious Spirit in your sweet heart.

Ah, good Jeremy, hath Phasor put thee into the stocks? why, now thou hast the reward of a prophet. Thy glory never began to appear until now. I doubt not but shortly, instead of Ahikam, the son of Shapham, Jesus the Son of the living God will come and deliver thee forth of the hands of all thine enemies, and also make good, against them and their antichristian synagogue, all the words that thou hast spoken in his name. The Lord hath made thee this day a strong defended tower, an iron pillar, and a brazen wall against the whole rabble of Antichrist: and though they fight against thee ever so fiercely, yet shall they not overcome thee, for the Lord himself is with thee to help and deliver thee: and he will rid thee out of the hands of the wicked, and will deliver thee out of the hands of the the tyrants. And in that you are not busy in casting pearls before swine, nor in giving the holy things unto dogs, you are much to be commended in my simple judgment. And sure I am that your circumspect and modest behaviour hitherto hath been as much to God's glory, and to the shame and confusion of your enemies, as any men's doings that are gone before you.

Wherefore my advice and most earnest desire is, with all other of your loving friends, that you still keep that order with those blood-thirsty sheep-biters, bishops I should say, that you have begun. For though in conclusion they will surely have your blood, yet shall they come by it with shame enough, and to their perpetual infamy whilst the world doth endure. They would indeed condemn you in private, to darken God's glory, if it might be: but Satan's thoughts are not unknown to you, and the depth of his subtilty is by you well foreseen. Therefore let them do whatsoever God shall suffer them to do: for I know all things shall turn to your benefit. Though you lie in the dark, sullied with the bishop's black coal-dust; yet shall you be shortly restored to the heavenly light, and be made as white as snow in Salmon, as the wings of a dove that is covered with silver wings, and her feathers like gold. You know the vessel, before it is made bright, is foiled with oil and other things, that it may scour the better.

O happy be you that you be now in the scouring-house; for shortly you shall be set upon the celestial shelf as bright as angels. Therefore, my dear heart, I will now, according to your loving request, cast away all care, and rejoice with you, and praise God for you, and pray for you day and night; yea, I will now, with God's grace, sing psalms of praise and thanksgiving with you. For now my soul is turned to her old rest again, and hath taken a sweet nap in Christ's lap. I have cast my care upon the Lord, who careth for me, and will be careless, according to my name, in that respect you would have me. I will leave out my unseemly addition as long as I live: for it can take no place where true faith and hope is resident. So soon as I had read your most godly and comfortable letter, my sorrows vanished away as smoke in the wind, my spirit revived, and comfort came again, whereby I am sure the Spirit of God was the author of it.

O my good Mr. Philpot, which art a principal pot indeed filled with most precious liquor, as it appeareth by the plenteous pouring forth of the same: O pot most happy, of the high Potter ordained to honour, which dost contain such heavenly treasure in the earthen vessel: O pot thrice happy, in whom Christ hath wrought a great miracle, altering thy nature, and turning water into wine, and that of the best, whereout the master of the feast hath filled my cup so full, that I am become drunken in the joy of the Spirit through the same. When martyrdom shall break thee, O vessel of honour, I know the fragrant savour of thy precious ointment will much rejoice the heavy hearts of Christ's true members, although the Judases will grudge and murmur at the same; yea, and burst out into words of slander, saying, It is but loss and waste.

Be not offended, dear heart, at my metaphorical speech; for I am disposed to be merry, and with David to dance before the ark of the Lord: and though you play upon a pair of organs not very comely or easy to the flesh, yet the sweet sound that came from the same, causeth me thus to do. O that I were with you in body, as present I am in spirit, that I might sing all care away in Christ: for now the time of comfort is come. I hope to be with you shortly, if all things happen right; for my old friends of Coventry have put the council in remembrance of me, not six days ago, saying, I am more worthy to be burned than any that was burned yet. God's blessing on their hearts for their good report. God make me worthy of that dignity, and hasten the time that I may set forth his glory.

Pray for me, dear heart, I beseech you, and desire all your company to do the same, and I will pray God for you all, so long as I live. And now farewell in Christ, thou blessed of God's own mouth. I will for a time to take my leave, but not my last farewell. Blessed be the time that ever I came into the King's-Bench, to be joined in love and fellowship with such dear children of the Lord. My good brother Bradford shall not be dead while you are alive: for verily the spirit of him doth rest on you in a most ample manure. Your letters of comfort unto me in each point do agree, as though the one were a copy of the other. He hath planted in me, and you do water; the Lord give good increase. My dear brethren and fellow-prisoners here, have them humbly and heartily commended unto you and your company, mourning for your misery, but yet rejoicing for your plenteous consolation and comfort in Christ. We are all chearful and merry under our crosses, and do lack no necessaries, praised be God for his providence and great mercy towards us for evermore, Amen.

LETTER II.

From Mr. JOHN CARELESS to his Wife.

AS by the great mercy of God, at the time of his good will and providence appointed, my dearly beloved wife, you and I were joined together in the holy and christian state of godly matrimony, as well to our great joy and comfort in Christ, as also to the increase of his blessed church and faithful congregation, by having lawful children by and in the same, with which God of his mercy hath blessed us, praised be his name therefore: even so now by his merciful will and divine ordinance, the time is come (so far as I can perceive) wherein he will, for his glory and our eternal comfort, dissolve the same, and separate us asunder again for a time. Wherefore I thought it good, yea, and my bounden duty, by this simple letter to provoke, stir, and admonish you, to behave yourself in all your doings, sayings, and thoughts, most thankfully unto our good God for the same. And therefore, my dear wife, as you have heartily rejoiced in the Lord, and oftentimes given God thanks for his goodness, in bringing us together in his holy ordinance: even so now I desire you, when this time of our separation shall come, to rejoice with me in the Lord, and to give him most hearty thanks, that he hath (to his glory and our endless advantage) separated us again for a little time; and hath mercifully taken me unto himself, out of this miserable world into his celestial kingdom; believing and hoping also assuredly, that God of his goodness, for his Son Christ's sake, will shortly bring you, and your dear children, thither to me, that we may most joyfully together sing praises unto his glorious name for ever. And yet once again I desire you, for the love of God, and as ever you loved me, to rejoice with me, and to give God continual thanks for doing his most merciful will upon me.

I hear say, that you do oftentimes repeat this godly saying, "The Lord's will be fulfilled." Doubtless it rejoiceth my poor heart to hear that report of you; and for the Lord's sake use that godly prayer continually, teach your children and family to say the same day and night: and not only say it with your tongues, but also with your heart and mind, and joyfully submit your will to God's will in very deed, knowing and believing assuredly, that nothing shall come to you or any of your's, otherwise than it shall be his almighty and fatherly good-will and pleasure, and for your eternal comfort and advantage. Which thing to be most true and certain, Christ testifieth in his holy gospel, saying, "Are not two little sparrows sold for a farthing, and yet not one of them shall perish without the will of our heavenly Father?" And he concludeth, saying, "Fear not ye therefore, for ye are better than many sparrows." As though he should have said, If God have such respect and care for a poor sparrow, which is not worth one farthing, that it shall not be taken in the lime-twigg, net, or pitfall, unless it be his good will and pleasure; you may be well assured, that not one of you (whom he so dearly loveth, that he hath given his only dear Son for you) shall perish, or depart out of this miserable life, without his almighty good will and pleasure.

Therefore,

Therefore, dear wife, put your trust and confidence wholly and only in him, and ever pray that his will be fulfilled, and not your's, except it be agreeable to his will; which I pray God it may ever be, Amen. And as for worldly things, take you no care, but be you well assured the Lord, your dear God and Father, will not see you nor your's lack, if you continue in his love and childly fear, and keep a clear conscience from all kind of idolatry, superstition, and wickedness, as my trust is that you will do, although it be with the loss and danger of this temporal life. And, good Margaret, fear not them that can but kill the body (and yet can they not do that until God give them leave), but fear to displease him that can kill both body and soul, and cast them into hell-fire. Let not the remembrance of your children keep you from God. The Lord himself will be a father and a mother, better than ever you or I could have been unto them. He himself will do all things necessary for them. He hath given his angels charge over them, therefore commit them unto him. But if you may live with a clear conscience, (for else I would not have you to live) and see the bringing up of your children yourself, look that you nurture them in the fear of God, and keep them far from idolatry, superstition, and other kind of wickedness; and for God's sake help them to some learning if it be possible, that they may increase in virtue and godly knowledge, which shall be a better dowry to marry them withal, than any worldly substance; and when they are come to age, provide them such husbands as fear God, and love his holy word. I charge you take heed that you match them not with papists; and if you live and marry again yourself (which thing I would wish you to do if need require, or else not), good wife take heed how you bestow yourself, that you and my poor children be not compelled to wickedness. But if you shall be well able to live God's true widow, I would counsel you to live so still, for the more quietness of yourself and your poor children. Take heed, Margaret, and play the wife woman's part. You have warning by others, if you will take an example. And thus I commit you and my sweet children unto God's most merciful defence. The blessing of God be with you, and God send us a merry meeting together in heaven. Farewel in Christ, farewel mine own dear hearts all. Pray, pray.

LETTER III.

From Mr. JOHN CARELESS to Mr. BRADFORD.

THE peace of God in Jesus Christ, the eternal comfort of his sweet Spirit, which hath surely sealed you unto eternal salvation, be with you, and strengthen you in your joyful journey towards the celestial Jerusalem (my dear friend, and most faithful brother Mr. Bradford), to the setting forth of God's glory, and to your eternal joy in Christ, Amen.

Ever since that good Mr. Philpot shewed me your last letter, my dear heart in the Lord, I have continued in great heaviness and perplexity; not for any hurt or discommodity that I can perceive coming towards you, unto whom doubtless death is made life and great felicity, but for the great loss that God's church here in England shall sustain by the taking away of so godly, worthy, and necessary an instrument as the Lord hath made you to be. O that my life, and a thousand more of such wretched lives might go for your's. O why doth God suffer me and such caterpillars to live, that can do nothing but consume the alms of the church, and take away you, so worthy a workman and labourer in the Lord's vineyard? But woe be to our sins and great unthankfulness, which is the greatest cause of the taking away such worthy instruments of God, as should set forth his glory, and instruct his people. If we had been thankful unto God for the good ministers of his word, we had not been so soon deprived both of it and them. The Lord forgive our great ingratitude and sins, and give us true repentance and faith, and hold his hand of mercy over us, for his dear Son Christ's sake. Take not away all thy true preachers out of this realm, O Lord, but leave us a seed, lest England be made like to Sodom and Gomorrah, when thy true Lots be gone.

But why go I about to mingle your mirth with my mourning, and your just joy with my deserved sorrow? If I loved you indeed, as I have pretended, I should surely rejoice with you most heartily, and praise God on your behalf from the very bottom of my heart. I should praise God day and night for your excellent election in and through his great mercy, and should give him most humble thanks for your vocation by his gospel, and your true knowledge in the same; I should earnestly praise him for your sweet justification, whereof you are most certain by God's grace and Spirit, and should instantly pray unto him for your glorification, which shall shortly ensue; I should rejoice and be glad to see you so dignified by the crown of martyrdom, and to be appointed to that honour, to testify his truth, and to seal it with your blood; I should highly extol the Lord, who hath given you a glorious victory over all your enemies, visible and invisible, and hath given you grace and strength to finish the tower that you have begun to build. Finally, if I loved you, I should most heartily rejoice and be glad to see you delivered from this body of sin, and vile prison of the flesh, and brought into that heavenly tabernacle where you shall be safely kept, and never offend him more.

This and much more should I do, if I had a good heart towards God, or you his dear child. But, alas! I am an hypocrite, and do seek nothing but mine own advantage; I would have God's everlasting providence give place to my peevish will and purpose, although it were to the hindrance of his glory, and your sweet comfort. God forgive me my horrible ingratitude, sins, and offences against him: and, good brother, do you forgive me my great negligence and unthankfulness towards you, and henceforth I promise you, I will put my will to God's will, and pray that the same may be fulfilled in you, as long as you be on this earth; and when you are taken hence, I will most heartily praise the Lord for you, so long as I have my being in this world. Ah, my dear heart, now I must take my leave of you, and as I think, my last farewell in this life, but in the life to come I am right well assured we shall merrily meet together, and that shortly I trust. And in taking of my leave of you, my dear heart in the Lord, I shall desire you faithfully to remember all the sweet messages that the Lord our good God and most dear loving Father hath sent you by me his most unworthy servant, which as they are most true, so shall they be most truly accomplished upon you eternally; and for the more assurance and certificate thereof to your godly conscience, he hath commanded me to repeat the same unto you again, in his own name and word.

Therefore now give ear and faithful credence. Harken, O ye heavens, and thou earth give ear, and bear me witness at the great day, that I do here faithfully and truly the Lord's message unto his dear servant, his singularly beloved and elect child, John Bradford. John Bradford, thou art a man so specially beloved of God, I pronounce and testify unto thee in the word and name of the Lord Jehovah, that all thy sins, whatsoever they be, be they ever so many, so grievous, or so great, be fully and freely pardoned, released, and forgiven thee, by the mercy of God in Jesus Christ, thine only Lord and sweet Saviour, in whom thou dost undoubtedly believe. Christ hath cleansed thee with his blood, and clothed thee with his righteousness, and hath made thee in the sight of God his Father, without spot or wrinkle; so that when the fire doth it's appointed office, thou shalt be received (as a sweet burnt sacrifice) into heaven, where thou shalt joyfully remain in God's presence for ever, as the true inheritor of his everlasting kingdom, unto which thou wast undoubtedly predestinate and ordained by the Lord's infallible purpose and decree, before the foundation of the world was laid. And that this is most true that I have said, I call the whole Trinity, the Almighty and Eternal Majesty of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, to my record at this present; whom I humbly beseech to confirm

Now with a merry heart and joyful spirit, something mixed with lawful tears, I take my farewell of you, my own dear brother in the Lord, who will send us shortly a merry meeting in his kingdom, that we may both sing praises together unto him with his holy angels and blessed spirits for ever and ever. Farewel, thou blessed in the Lord, farewell in Christ, depart unto thy rest in the Lord; and pray for me for God's sake.

As I had made an end of this simple letter, I heard some comfort both of good Mr. Philpot's servant and your's; but, alas, I do scarcely believe them. Well, I will hope in God, and pray all night that God will send me some comfort to-morrow, let me hear four words of comfort from you, for God's sake. The blessing of God be with you now and for ever, Amen.

Your's for ever in the Lord Jesus,

J. CARELESS, living in hope against hope.

In reading this letter of John Careless to Mr. Bradford above prefixed, wherein he maketh so much mention of a certain letter of his sent to him, and of the exceeding great consolation he received of the same, thou wilt wish, peradventure (good loving reader) in thy mind, to have some sight also of the said letter of Mr. Bradford; wherefore to satisfy thy desire, or rather to prevent thy petition, I have hitherto annexed the same, to the intent thou mayst not only understand the contents thereof, but also receive fruit thereof to thy consolation likewise. The purport of the letter here followeth.

LETTER IV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mr. CARELESS.

ALmighty God our dear Father, through and for the merits of his dearly beloved Son Jesus Christ, be merciful unto us, pardon us our offences, and under the wings of his mercy protect us from all evil, from henceforth and for ever, Amen.

Dear brother Careless, I heartily pray you to pray to God for me, for the pardon of manifold sins and most grievous offences, which need no other demonstration unto you than this, namely, that I have behaved myself so negligently in answering your godly triple letters, which are three witnesses against me. God lay not them, nor any other to my charge to condemnation, though to correction, not my will, but his be done. Concerning your request of absolution, my dearest brother, what shall I say, but even as truth is? that the Lord of all mercy, and Father of all comfort, through the merits and mediation of his dear Son thy only Lord and Saviour, hath clearly remitted and pardoned all thy offences whatsoever they be, that ever hitherto thou hast committed against his majesty: and therefore he hath given to thee as to his child, dear brother, John Careless, in token that thy sins are pardoned; he (I say) hath given thee a penitent and believing heart, that is, a heart which desireth to repent and believe.

Wherefore, my good brother, be merry, glad, and of good cheer, for the Lord hath taken away thy sins; thou shalt not die. Go thy ways; the Lord hath put away thy sins. The East is not so far from the West, as the Lord hath now put thy sins from thee. Look how high the heavens are in comparison of the earth, so far hath his mercy prevailed towards thee his dear child, John Careless, through Christ the beloved. Say therefore with David, Praise the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me praise his holy name: for he hath forgiven thee all thy sins; as truly he hath. And hercof I desire to be a witness. God make me worthy to hear from you the like true message for myself. Mine own dearly beloved, you have cause to thank God most heartily that he hath given you such repentance and faith; the Lord increase the same in you, and me a most miserable wretch, whose heart is harder than an adamant stone, or else I could not thus long have stayed from writing unto you. If I live and may, I purpose and promise you to make amends. Pray for me, my most dear brother, I heartily beseech you, and forgive me my long silence. God our Father be with us for ever, Amen.

Your's in the Lord,

J. BRADFORD.

The fifth Letter is from Mr. John Careless to his faithful brethren in Newgate, who had been condemned to die for the testimony of the truth; in which he more particularly addresses himself to his faithful loving brother Tyms, rejoicing in their firmness and constancy, and patience in sufferings, and declaring his own readiness to follow them. He particularly mentions brother Drake also, and the four other martyrs from Essex; and finally committing them all to God's most merciful defence, whose quarrel they had defended, whose cause they had promoted, whose glory they had set forth, and whose name they had constantly confessed, and that they were going to take their places under the altar, with Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Rogers. Hooper, Saunders, Farrar, Taylor, Bradford, Philpot, and many others.

The sixth Letter is addressed also from Mr. John Careless to Mr. Whittle, Mr. Green, and other prisoners at that time in Newgate, who had been condemned, and were ready to be burnt for the testimony of Jesus, and the truth of the gospel. In the same strain of joy and satisfaction he praises the magnanimity and courage, and extols in elevated strains the honour which God has bestowed upon them, in counting them worthy to suffer for his sake; and then pathetically ejaculates, "Oh that it were the good will of God, that the good hour were now come, that I might go with you." To his brother Green he thus feelingly writes, "Happy art thou to be appointed to die for his sake! Although thou here go forth sowing thy good fruit with tears, the time shall come that thou shalt reap with joy and gladness the fruits of everlasting life, without ceasing." And, after congratulating the other prisoners, who were shortly to become martyrs, he thus addresses, as a faithful sister, Joan Warne alias Lashford, in these words; "Thy trial hath been great; thy victory in Christ hath been notable. Thou hast overcome many a sharp shower and storm. Shortly shalt thou arrive at the haven of quiet rest, and receive the reward due to a constant martyr. Thou shalt go home to thy heavenly Father, and possess for ever the inheritance which Christ hath purchased for thee, where thy earthly parents be still looking for thee, who have triumphed over Antichrist most victoriously. O blessed parents of happy children, who have shewn such an example as the like hath been seldom seen! I salute thee, dear sister of like constant mind, whose constant example is worthy of continual memory. Praised be God for you mine own sweet sisters, who hath made you play such wise virgins' parts. He hath plentifully poured the oil of his Spirit into the lamp of your faith, so that the light thereof shall never be extinct. You shall enter with your bridegroom into everlasting joy, wherunto you were chosen in him from the beginning.

LETTER VII.

THE everlasting peace of God in Jesus Christ, with the continual joy, comfort, and strength of his sweet Spirit, be multiplied, and daily more and more increased in your good heart (my most faithful and dear brother Tyms), to the full quieting of your conscience, and beating back all the fiery darts of the wicked, that you may shortly receive the glorious crown of victory, and in the same triumph over all your enemies, for evermore, Amen.

I cannot express the exceeding great joy and consolation of my poor heart, considering the marvellous works of God most graciously wrought upon you, not only in proving you and trying your faith by his great and huge crosses both inwardly and outwardly, but also in giving you so great consolation and constancy in the midst of the same. Faithful is God, and true of his promises, who hath said, "That he will never suffer his chosen children to be tempted above their strength, but in the midst of their temptation will make an out-scape for them," by such means as may make to his glory and their everlasting consolation. My dear heart, great cause have you to be of good comfort; I see in you as lively a token of God's everlasting love and favour in Jesus Christ, as ever I perceived in any man. In respect whereof, I do even in my heart love, honour, and reverence you, beseeching God for his glorious name's sake, in the bowels and blood of our Lord and only Saviour Jesus Christ, to finish his good work in you, as I doubt not but he will do, according to his infallible promises; yea, I am well assured thereof, forasmuch as you have so effectually received his Holy Spirit into your heart as a pledge, and a sure seal of your eternal redemption, and a testimony of your adoption in Christ Jesus. For which cause Satan so fore envieth you, that he hath now bent all his fierce ordnance against you, thinking thereby utterly to destroy the invincible fort of your faith, founded most firmly upon the immovable rock Christ, against which neither the devil, sin, nor hell-gates shall ever prevail.

Therefore, mine own bowels in the Lord, be not discomforted for this your conflict, which doubtless shall greatly increase your crown of glory, triumph, and victory; but take a good heart unto you, and buckle boldly with Satan, both in himself and his subtle members. It is the very divine ordinance of God, that all his regenerate people shall be tempted, proved, and tried, as we see by the example of our Saviour Christ; who, as soon as he was baptized, was straitways led by the Holy Ghost into the wilderness, there to be tempted of the devil. But there got he such a glorious victory over Satan, that he could never since finally prevail against any of his poor members, but in every assault that he maketh, either inwardly or outwardly getteth a foil, and taketh shame: so that now he rageth with all the rage possible, especially because he knoweth his time is but short. St. James testifieth that he is but a very coward, that he will soon flee if he be faithfully resisted. And as for his tempting tools, the Lord hath made them manifest unto us, so that he cannot deceive us though he assaults us; for as St. Paul saith, "his thoughts are not unknown to us," as it doth in you largely appear, praised be the Lord's name therefore.

You see, dear brother, that now to molest you and such as you are, that be even passing from this vale of misery, he hath but two ways or two pieces of ordnance to shoot at you, with which he cannot hurt you, because you have two bulwarks to defend you. The first of these terrible guns that Satan hath shot at you, is the very same that he continually shooteth at me, that is to say, fear and infidelity; for the ugliness of death and horror of my sins, which be so many, grievous, and great. But this pellet is easily put away with the sure shield of faith, in the most precious death and blood-shedding of our dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, whom the Father hath given unto us wholly to be our's for evermore, and with him hath given us all things, as St. Paul saith; so that though we be ever so great sinners, yet Christ is made unto us holiness, righteousness, and justification. He hath clothed us with all his merits, mercies, and most sweet sufferings, and hath taken unto him all our misery, wretchedness, sin, and infirmity. So that if any should now be condemned for the same, it must needs be Jesus Christ, which hath taken them upon him. But indeed he hath made satisfaction for them to the uttermost jot; so that for his sake they shall never be imputed to us, if they were a thousand times as many as they are. This do you most effectually feel and know (dear brother) a great deal better than I can tell you, blessed be God therefore.

And now Satan, seeing that he cannot prevail with his boisterous battery against this bulwark of faith, which doth so quench all his fiery darts, that they can do you no harm, but rather do you good service to cast you down, under the mighty hand of God, that he may take you up by his holy grace and power, and so you may render him all the glory by Jesus Christ (which thing the enemy can in no wise abide), therefore he shooteth off his other piece most pestilent, to provoke you to some part of your trust and confidence in yourself, and in your own holiness and righteousness, that you might that way rob God of his glory, and Christ of the honour and dignity of his death.

But blessed be the Lord God, you have also a full strong bulwark to bear back this pestiferous pellet also, even the pure law of God, which proveth the best of us all damnable sinners in the sight of God, if he would enter into judgment with us according to the severity of the same, and that even our best works are polluted and defiled in such sort as the prophet describeth them. With which manner of speaking our free-will pharisees are much offended; for it felleth all men's righteousness to the ground (I had like to have said to the bottom of hell), and extolleth only the righteousness of Jesus Christ, which is allowed before God, and is freely given to all those that firmly believe, as blessed be God you do.

Ah, my good brother Tyms, Satan hath put his hand in a wrong box when he beginneth to tempt you either to vain glory or mistrust; for you are an old beaten soldier, and have had good experience of these kinds of temptations, both by yourself and others, whom you know were well beloved of God. Be of good cheer therefore, dear heart, be of good cheer, for now Satan hath wrought all his malice, he hath done all that he can, and hath shot off all his last pieces, wherewith he had thought to have done most mischief; but now he seeth he cannot prevail (the strong tower of our faith being so invincible), he will pluck up all his tents, and get him to some other place to practise the same assaults, and then will the angels of God come and minister unto you the most sweet and heavenly consolations of the Holy Ghost. To him therefore who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we can desire or think, I do most heartily commit you, with all the rest of your godly fellow prisoners, who comfort, strengthen, and defend you with his grace and mighty operation of his Holy Spirit, as he hath hitherto done, that you having a most glorious victory over the subtle serpent, and all his wicked seed, may also receive the crown of glory and immortality prepared for you before the foundations of the world were laid, and is so surely kept for you in the hands of him whose promise is infallible, that the devil, sin, death, or hell, shall never be able to deprive you of the same. The blessing of God be with you now and for evermore, Amen. Pray for me.

Your own for ever,

JOHN CARELESS.

LETTER VIII.

From JOHN CARELESS to his dear and faithful Brother, AUGUSTINE BERNHER.

THE peace of God in Jesus Christ, the help, comfort, and assistance of his Eternal Spirit be with you, my dear and faithful brother Augustine, and with all the rest of my good brethren and sisters of the houses of Baxterley and Manceter (which mourn for the misery of God's people), to your everlasting consolation in him, Amen.

Right glad I am to hear (my dear and faithful brother Augustine) that God of his great mercy and infinite goodness hath yet so graciously delivered and preserved you out of your enemies hands, beseeching Almighty God also from the bottom of my heart, to be your continual defence unto the end, as hitherto he hath most graciously been, that you may live and die both to God's glory, the advantage of his church, and to the increase of your own everlasting joy and comfort in him.

Know you, dear brother, that I have received your letter, for which I heartily thank you. Indeed I think it very short, although it seemeth something sharply to rebuke in the beginning, for the breach of my promise in not writing to you this long time. Well, brother, I am content to bear it with patience, considering that you are troubled otherwise (the Lord comfort you and all heavy hearts); neither will I spend ink and paper for my purgation in this point. God knoweth whether I be so mindless of my promise as it appeareth in your sight I am. Your request I will truly perform to the uttermost of my power, as gladly as any poor wretch shall do in the world, and I thank God I have done no less of a long time. And as my poor prayer shall be a handmaid to wait upon you which way soever you ride or go; so I beseech you that my simple counsel may take some place in you, in this time of your pilgrimage, which you pass in no small peril. God keep and preserve you for his name's sake.

I do not disallow, but much praise and commend hearty boldness in discharging your conscience, when any one of God's people needeth your help in any point. But yet I would not have you thrust yourself in danger, when you can do them no good, or leastwise when they may well enough spare that good you would do them: for if you shall then chance to be taken, you shall not only be no comfort unto them, but also a great discomfort, adding sorrow unto their sorrow.

I do not persuade you to absent yourself from any place where your presence of necessity is required; for in all such places I know, God will preserve you as he hath hitherto wonderfully done, praised therefore be his name: or if it shall please him to permit you in any such place to be taken, I know he will most sweetly comfort your conscience with this consideration, that it is the very providence and appointment of God, that you should there and then be taken up for a witness of his truth unto the world: but I cannot allow, nor be contented that you should rashly or negligently thrust yourself into that place where your wicked enemies do continually haunt, yea, and lay wait for you, when no necessity of yourself, nor of any other of God's people, doth require your company. If they need any of your godly counsel, you may write unto them that thing that you think good; which I dare say will be sufficient unto them. For (continual thanks and praises be given unto the everlasting God) there is none of those that are cruelly condemned for God's truth, that now are weaklings; for they have manfully passed through the pikes, and they have boldly stood in the brunt of the battle, and therefore I reckon the worst is past with them already. So that now and then a godly letter from you to them shall do as much good as your company can do, and perchance more too; for writing sticketh longer in the memory than words do, yea though your letters were as short to them as your last was to me, so that the same were something sweeter, and not altogether so sharp.

This, dear brother, is the simple counsel which I would gladly have you observe, partly for that I heartily pray for your preservation for the advantage of Christ's church, and partly for that I unfeignedly wish the peace, comfort, and tranquillity of your own conscience, which I know will be quickly ready to accuse you, if you do any thing wherein you have not the word of God for your warrant. For as in a glass that is clear, a small mote will soon appear: even so the good conscience of God's chosen children, being more clear than chrystal, will soon accuse them at the least fault they do commit; whereas the wicked worldlings have their conscience so clogged and corrupted through the custom of sin, that they cannot once see or perceive their shameful deeds and wicked works, until God set the same before them for their utter destruction, and then they immediately despair. But seeing that God hath given you a clear conscience, and a pure, sharp, quick, and lively sight in your soul, I would wish you to beware that you do nothing unadvisedly, but upon a good ground. For an accusing conscience is a sore thing when death doth approach, and then Satan will not stick to tell you that you have too much tempted God when peradventure you have done nothing so at all. For this cause, I say, partly I have thought it good to admonish you (as I have done often) to be circumspect according to the counsel of Christ, which biddeth you beware of men. Other things I have not to write, for I know this bearer can certify you of all things at large, better than I can declare it by writing.

I beseech you, good Augustine, help me forwards with your hearty prayers, for I trust I have but a small time to tarry in this troublesome world. Dr. Story told our marshal, that we should all be dispatched so soon as he came from Oxford, whither he and other bloody butchers be gone to make slaughter of Christ's sheep that lie there appointed to be slain. God, for Christ's sake, put them and such like beside their cruel purpose, if it be his good will and pleasure, Amen, good Lord. I pray you give my most hearty commendations to my dear sister and faithful friend, good Mrs. Mary Glover. I beseech God be her comfort, as I doubt not but he is. I am very glad to hear that she doth so joyfully and so patiently bear this great cross that God hath laid upon her. I pray God strengthen her, and all his other saints to the end, Amen. Commend me unto my dear and faithful sister Elizabeth B. I thank her most heartily for my napkin, and so I do your dear brother for my shirt. Truly, that day that we were appointed to come to our answer before the commissioners (who had sent word the same morning, that they would come to the King's-Bench by eight of the clock, and the house and all things were trimmed and made ready for them), I got that shirt on my back, and that napkin in my hand, and methought they did help to harness me, and arm me well to go to fight against that bloody beast of Babylon. And trust me, truly if they had come, I would have struck three strokes the more for your two sakes, as well as God would have enabled me to set them on, as by God's grace I will not fail to do at the next skirmish that I come to. Wherefore I pray you pray for me, that I may be strong and hardy to lay on a good load. Oh that I might so strike him down, that he should never be able to rise again. But that stroke belongeth only unto the Lord, to strike at his coming, which I trust will be shortly. O hasten it, good Lord, and shorten these sorrowful and sinful days, for thy great mercy's sake.

Farewel, my dear and faithful loving brother. The Lord defend, keep, and preserve you from the power of your enemies, visible and invisible, and send us a most joyful and merry meeting here or elsewhere, as it shall please his goodness to appoint us.

In the mean time I shall most earnestly desire you to pray for me, for I never had more need in my life, and doubtless you shall never want my poor prayer, if it shall please God to accept the prayer of so sinful a wretch as I am. The Lord impute not my sins to me, for Jesus Christ's sake; unto whose most merciful defence I do most heartily commit you. The blessing of God be with you now and for ever, Amen. I pray you give my most hearty commendations unto Mr. John Glover. I do not forget him in my daily prayers, and I trust he doth remember me.

Your poor brother, always mindful of you in my prayer, John Careless, prisoner, abiding God's pleasure.

L E T T E R IX.

From Mr. JOHN CARELESS to HENRY ADLINGTON, Prisoner in Lollard's Tower.

THE everlasting peace of God in Jesus Christ, the continual aid, strength, joy, and comfort of his most pure, holy, and mighty Spirit, with the increase of faith and lively feeling of his mercies be most effectually wrought in your heart, my dear and faithful loving brother Adlington, and in the hearts of all your other godly fellow-prisoners, to the full finishing of that good work, which the Lord hath most graciously begun in you; that the same may be to the advancing and setting forth of his glory, the advantage of his poor afflicted church, and to your own eternal joy and comfort in him, Amen.

My most dear and faithful loving brother in the Lord, I with all the rest of my loving brethren here with me, do most humbly and heartily recommend us unto you with all faithful remembrance of you in daily prayers, giving God earnest thanks on your most happy behalf, for that he hath given you such hearty boldness and christian constancy in the faithful confession of his everlasting verity. Blessed be God for thee, my dearly beloved brother, who hath vouchsafed thee worthy of so great dignity, as to suffer for his sake, and setting forth of his glory. Oh, glad in heart mayst thou be, to whom it is given, not only to believe in thy Lord and Christ most lively, but also to suffer for his sake, as one of his silly sheep appointed to the slaughter. Be of good comfort therefore, my good brother, for your calling unto the cross of Christ was after a marvellous manner. Surely it was only the Lord's appointment, and therefore he will perform his own work in and upon you, to the great magnifying of his glory, and comfort of your brethren, whose hearts are mightily refreshed, to hear how heartily you have behaved yourself hitherto.

This present day I received a letter from you, at the reading whereof my brethren and I were not a little comforted, to see your conscience so quieted in Christ, and your continuance so stedfast in him; which things be the special gifts of God, not given unto every man, but to you his darling elect and chosen in Christ, and such as you be. And whereas you do require to know my simple mind concerning your answer unto Dr. Story and the chancellor; truly I say you did answer them very well: for there are but two sacraments indeed, that is to say, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, as you have full well answered them, praised be God for his good gifts, who chuseth the weak to confound the strong, and the foolish to confound the worldly wise. If, when you come before them again, they do ask you what a sacrament is; say you, that a sacrament, being administered according to Christ's institution, is a visible grace, and hath the promise of God's mercy annexed unto it, available to all such as do worthily receive it, and not unworthily worship it, as they would have us to do, contrary to God's commandment. And these properties belonging to Christ's true sacraments, cannot be applied unto any one of those five sacraments which they have invented of their own brain, since Antichrist began to reign, to blind the people withal.

I perceive, dear heart, that upon Friday they do intend to condemn you, and give you your judgment. Therefore I think they will have no great reasoning with you, but bid you answer them directly, either yea or nay, to all such things as they have to charge you withal, which they have gathered of you since you came into their cruel hands. But if they will needs make words with you, because you are but a simple man, and therefore perchance they will be the busier with you to trouble you with many questions, to encumber your knowledge, and then seem to triumph over you and that truth that you do hold; if (I say) they do this, as perchance for some evil purpose they will, then be you so plain and as short as you can, saying roundly unto them these or such like words as nigh as you can:

Be it known unto you, that I in all points do believe as it becometh a true christian, and as I have been truly taught in the days of the good king Edward, of such godly preachers and prophets sent of God, as have sealed their doctrine with their blood, from whom I will dissent in no point: for I am a poor man without learning, but I am commanded of God to follow the counsel of his constant preachers, and so intend to do, God giving me grace and assistance thereto.

As for you, I know you to be none of Christ's shepherds, but ravening wolves, which come to kill and scatter the flock of Christ, as the Lord said you should; and doth will us to beware of you and your poisoned doctrine, bidding us to judge you according to your fruits, whereby all men may see and know what ye are, that will not be wilfully blind. But the good shepherds have given their lives for the defence of Christ's flock; and I am commanded to follow their faithful and godly example, and to confess with them one truth, even to the fire, if God shall see it good; and this as a true christian, I have hitherto done, and henceforth by God's grace intend to do.

And if the same God shall suffer you to take away my life, as you have done their's, I am contented therewith: his will be done, for that only is good. But of this be you sure, the Lord will shortly call you to account for all the innocent blood that is shed within this realm; which you have brought into a most woeful case, and made many a heavy heart in the same, and more I perceive you will make so long as the Lord for our sins will suffer you to prosper, until the time that your iniquities shall be full ripe. But then be you sure the Lord will sit in judgment upon you, as well as you do now upon his saints, and will reward you according to your deservings; to whom with my whole heart I commit my cause, and he will make answer for me, when the full time of my refreshing cometh. In the mean space, I will keep silence with this that I have said, trusting that I have sufficiently discharged my conscience in confessing my faith and religion to you, declaring of what church I am, even of the catholic church of Jesus Christ, which was well known to be here in England in our late good king Edward's days, by two special tokens which cannot deceive me, nor yet suffer me to be deceived; that is to say, the pure preaching of his holy word, and the due administration of his holy sacraments, which is not to be seen in your Romish church, and therefore it cannot justly be called the church and spouse of Christ. I believe in the Holy Trinity, and all the other articles of the christian faith contained in the three creeds; and finally all the canonical scripture to be true in every sentence. And I detest all sects both of the Arians and Anabaptists, or any other that divide themselves from the true church of Christ, which is his mystical body, the ground and pillar of truth, and the very house of the living God. And if for these things you take away my life, and make yourselves guilty of my blood, you may; for I am in your hands as the sheep brought to the shambles, abiding the grace of the butcher. And be you sure judgment sleepeth not, but when you cry peace, peace, and all is safe, then shall your plagues begin like the sorrow of a woman travailing with child, according to Christ's infallible promise.

This kind of answer, my dear heart, it will be best for you to make; and by God's grace I do intend to take the same order myself in time to come, when the Lord shall vouchsafe me worthy of that great dignity, whereunto he hath called you. And if they shall laugh you to scorn, as I know they will, saying, Thou art a fool, and an unlearned ass-head, and art able to make answer to nothing, &c. care you not for it, but still commit your cause unto God, who will make answer for you, and tell them that they have been answered again and again of divers godly and learned men; but all will not help: for you have one solution of all manner of questions, even a fair fire and faggots, this will be the end of your disputations. Therefore I pray you trouble me no more, but do that which you are appointed, when God shall permit the time. I am no better than Christ, his apostles, and others of my good brethren that are gone before me.

This kind of answer will have most effect against them, and edify the people that stand by, so that the same be done coolly, with sobriety, meekness, and patience: as I heard say our sweet brethren Thomas Harland and John Oswald did at Lewes, in Suffex, to the great rejoicing of the children of God that were in those parts: and I hear say, that they were dissolved from this earthly tabernacle at Lewes on Saturday last, and were condemned but the Wednesday before; so that we may perceive the papists have quick work in hand, that they make such haste to send us home to our heavenly Father. Therefore let us make ourselves ready to ride in the fiery chariot, leaving these mantles and old cloaks behind us for a time, which God shall restore us again in a more glorious wise.

My good brother Henry, you shall understand that

bragging John T—— hath beguiled his keepers (who trusted him too well), and is run away from them, and hath brought the poor men into great danger by the same. The one of them is cast by the council into the Gatehouse at Westminster, the other is fled out of the country for fear.

Thus you may see the fruits of our free-will men, that made so much boast of their own strength. But that house which is not built surely upon the unmoveable rock, will not long stand against the boisterous winds and storms, that blow so strongly in these days of trouble.

But, my dearly beloved brother, blessed be God for you, and such as you, who have played the parts of wife builders. You have digged down past the sand of your own natural strength, and beneath the earth of your own worldly wisdom, and are now come to the hard stone and unmoveable rock Christ, who is your only keeper; and upon him alone have you built your faith most firmly, without doubting, mistrust, or wavering. Therefore neither the storms nor tempests, winds, nor weathers that Satan and all his wily workmen can bring against you, with the very gates of hell to help them, shall ever be able once to move your house, much less to overthrow it; for the Lord God himself, and not man, is the builder thereof, and hath promised to preserve and keep the same for ever. Unto his most merciful defence therefore I do heartily commit you and all your good company, desiring him for his sweet Son Jesus Christ's sake, to confirm and strengthen you all, that you may be constant unto the very end; and that after the final victory is once gotten, you may receive the never-fading crown of glory of God's free gift, through his great mercy in Jesus Christ our only Saviour. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour, glory, praise, thanks, power, rule, and dominion for ever and evermore, Amen. The blessing of God be with you all.

JOHN CARELESS.

LETTER X.

From Mr. JOHN CARELESS, returning Thanks to a faithful Friend of his, by whom he had received much Comfort in his inward Trouble.

BLESSED be God the Father of all mercy, for the great comfort and christian consolation which he hath so mercifully ministered unto my poor afflicted heart by your means, my most dear and faithful brother. Truly methinketh your words, our rather God's words by you uttered, have a wonderful power and efficacy working in my heart at the hearing and reading of them. Rejoice therefore, my dear brother, and be thankful unto God; for verily he both is and will be mightily magnified in you, and that divers and many ways, both to the strengthening of them that stand in his truth, and also to the raising of such as are fallen from the same. God make me thankful for you, and on your behalf; for verily great is the goodness of God towards me, in giving me acquaintance in faithful love and amity with you; God's name therefore be praised for ever, and he perform all his merciful promises unto you, as I doubt not but he will, for his sake in whom you trust.

I thank my God most heartily, and also you my good brother, for that you are careful for me in your faithful prayers, remembering my just deserved sorrows, as though they were your own, and labouring so much to solace the same. Ah, my gracious God, what am I, for whom thou and thy dear children should be so careful? O sweet Lord, forgive me my great ingratitude and sin, and grant that I may never abuse thy great benefits. O let the love of thine elect, who love me for thy sake, be a sure sign and token, yea, a most firm testimony and seal to my sinful conscience of thine everlasting love and mercy towards me in Christ; as verily it would and ought to be, if mine infidelity did not hinder it. O circumscribe therefore the foreskin of my heart, that I may with lively faith behold thy great love towards me in all thine elect, that I may always be thankful for the same, and love thee and them again most heartily and unfeignedly.

Ah, my dear heart, how sweetly and how truly, yea how godly and how comfortably have you rehearsed the sweet saying of Solomon concerning prosperity with true and godly friends? I will join with it the sentence that goeth a little before, for doubtless it may be well verified on you. "A sure friend (saith the wise man, in Eccles. vi.) will be unto thee even as thine own soul, and deal faithfully with thy household-folk. If thou suffer trouble and adversity, he is with thee, and hideth not his face from thee. A faithful friend is a strong defence: whoso findeth such an one, findeth a treasure. A faithful friend hath no peer: the weight of gold is not to be compared to the goodness of his faith. A faithful friend is a medicine of life, and they that fear the Lord shall find him," &c. Lo, my dear heart in the Lord, here is a lively image or description of you; for verily such an one have I always found you unto me, not only sorrowing for my great sorrow, but also oftentimes making me merry and joyful, with such joys as the world cannot feel. Now let the world brag of its feigned friendship; but I will boast of this true friendship in God, and esteem it a greater treasure than all transitory things. And as for my mourning, dear brother, God hath made you to turn it unto mirth; for God hath put you instead of them to be my comfort, whom he hath in his great mercy taken away. I trust henceforth to leave the mourning for my great loss, and to praise God for gaining unto himself so great glory by his chosen children. God make me a true mourner of Sion, both for mine own sin and wickedness, and also to see his honour defaced, that I may be made meet and apt to bear the joyful and comfortable message that your beautiful feet shall bring me. God bless thee, my dear heart, and faithful loving brother, and increase his good gifts of grace in thee, as he hath most happily begun, that you may daily more effectually feel and lively perceive the certainty of God's grace wherein you stand, and firmly testify the same to the conversion or confusion of all gainers, and to the comfort and confirmation of all God's dear children, Amen. Farewel, mine own sweet brother, farewell as mine own heart.

Your own in Christ,

JOHN CARELESS.

In the letters of William Tyms, ye heard much mention made of Agnes Glascock. This Agnes Glascock, through infirmity, and her husband's persuasions, was allured to go to mass. For which cause she falling into great sorrow and repentance, was raised up again by the comfortable letters of William Tyms and John Careless, as before you may read; and after that was constant in the more sincere profession of the verity, and in danger of persecution for the same; unto whom John Careless wrote this following letter.

LETTER XI.

From JOHN CARELESS to AGNES GLASCOCK.

THE everlasting peace of God in Jesus Christ, the continual aid, strength, and comforts of his most pure, holy, and mighty Spirit, be with you, my dear and faithful sister Glascock, to the good performance of that good work which God hath so graciously begun in you, to his glory, the profit of his poor afflicted church, and to your own eternal comfort in him, Amen.

In our Lord I have my most humble and hearty commendations unto you, my dear sister and most faithful mother Glascock, with all remembrance of you in my daily prayers, giving God most hearty laud, praise, and thanks for you, and on your behalf, in that he of his great mercy hath hitherto so mightily strengthened you, constantly cleave unto your captain Christ, notwithstanding the great assaults and manifold temptations that you have had to the contrary. Doubtless, dear heart, it cannot be expressed what joy and comfort it is unto my very soul, to see how mighty the Lord hath magnified himself in you, whom he will shortly glorify with himself, as he hath done others of his sweet saints that are gone before you. Rejoice therefore and be glad; for verily you have good cause, if you diligently consider the great dignity that God hath called you unto, even now in your old age, to be one of his worthy witnesses unto the world; and I think you shall with me and other your brethren in bonds, seal the Lord's verity with the testimony of your blood. Surely, sweet sister, this is the greatest promotion that God can bring you or any other unto in this life; and an honour that the highest angel in heaven is not permitted to have.

Therefore happy are you, O faithful daughter of Abraham, that the Lord will now prefer you before many others, yea, or any others of your age that I do know in England. O faithful and virtuous matron, which wilt not be moved from the sure rock Christ, upon whom you have so firmly built your house, that neither storms nor tempests, neither yet hell-gates, or any other temptations, shall ever be able to prevail against it. Full well doth it appear by your constant continuance, that you have played the part of a wise builder, in counting the cost beforehand, belonging to the finishing up of your tower. And I doubt not but through God's gift, you have sufficient to the performance thereof, that the hypocrites of their part shall have no just cause to triumph against you, or to mock you, saying, Lo, this woman began to build, but is not able to make an end. Therefore go on boldly and fear not; for God is faithful, as St. Paul saith, who will not suffer you to be tempted above your strength, but he will either give you grace and strength, to stand unto the death (which is the gate and entrance into life,) or else he will make such an out-scape for you, as shall be to the setting forth of his glory; which above all other things, we that are his chosen children ought to seek, yea even with the loss of our own lives, being yet well assured that the same shall not be shortened one minute of an hour before the time that God hath appointed.

Cast therefore, dear sister, all your care upon the Lord, who, as St. Peter saith, careth for you. Great is his providence for you, and mighty is his love and mercy towards you. With his grace he will defend you, and with his Holy Spirit he will evermore guide you, wherewith he hath surely sealed you unto the day of redemption; he hath also given you the same in earnest for the recovery of the purchased possession, which he hath prepared for you before the foundation of the world was laid. Be strong therefore, and take a good heart, as I hear say you be. God for ever be blessed for you, who hath so grafted his love in your good heart, that nothing is able to separate you from the same, but will rather chuse to suffer adversity with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasure of sin for a little season. O happy woman, that canst find in thy heart to esteem the rebukes of Christ to be greater riches than all the treasures of the world, as good Moses did. Doubtless, great is your reward in heaven; which you shall shortly receive of his free gift, and not of any deserving.

Thus, dear mother Glascock, I have been bold to trouble you with my rude and simple letters, desiring you to take them in good part, being done in great haste, as it doth appear, but yet proceeding from a poor heart which floweth over in love towards you, as my daily prayers for you can testify; which I trust shall supply that part of my duty towards you, that my pen now wanteth. I thank you, dear heart, for all your loving tokens, and for the great kindness you have hitherto shewed unto my poor brother Tymes, and his wife and children, with all others of God's people, to whom you daily do good: the Lord recompense the same sevenfold into your bosom, as I doubt not but he will, according to his infallible promises. I pray you have my hearty commendations unto your husband. I beseech the Lord strengthen him in the confession of his truth (as my trust is that he will), that we may all joyfully rest with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God; unto which may he bring us, that with his most precious blood hath bought us. The blessing of God be with you now and for ever, Amen.

JOHN CARELESS.

LETTER XII.

From JOHN CARELESS, containing a brief Admonition to MRS. AGNES GLASCOCK, found in a Book of her's, when she came to the Prison to visit him.

THERE is nothing that the holy scripture throughout doth so much commend unto us, as true faith and stedfast truth in the promises of God's eternal mercies towards us in Jesus Christ. For from the same, as forth of the chief fountain and well-spring of life, do flow all kinds of virtues and godly fruits, especially true love towards God, in which we ought purely to serve him all the days of our life; and also christian charity towards our neighbours, as well to help them at all needs, as also not to hurt them by any means. Therefore pray earnestly for the increase of faith and lively feeling of God's mercy; for all things are possible unto him that can undoubtedly believe. Faith is that thing which assureth us of God's mercy, and whereby we vanquish all the fiery darts of the devil; our victory that overcometh the world; the knife that killeth and mortifieth the flesh: and finally, that which setteth us at peace with God, and quieteth our consciences always before him, and maketh us merry and joyful under the cross, with many more things than I can now express. Pray therefore for faith, in faith. And for the Lord's sake beware of popery and popish idolatry, the idol of the wicked mass, and other idolatrous service. Make not your body, which is a member of Christ, a member of Antichrist. Remember that we shall receive of God according to that we do in the body, be it good or evil. Therefore glorify God in your body, which is dearly bought. Betray not the truth, lest the Lord deny you. If God be God, follow him. You cannot serve two masters. I write not this as doubting you, but by the way of admonition. God keep you from all evil.

My sister dear, God give you grace,
With stedfast faith in Christ his name,
His gospel still for to embrace,
And live according to the same.
To die therefore think it no shame,
But hope in God with faithful trust;
And he will give you praise with fame,
When you shall rise out of the dust.
For which most sweet and joyful day,
To God with faith your prayer make:
And think on me, I do you pray,
Who now hath wrote this for your sake.
And thus to God I you betake,
Who is your castle and strong rock;
He keep you sleeping and awake,
Farewel, dear mistress A. Glascock.

LETTER XIII.

From JOHN CARELESS to MRS. AGNES GLASCOCK, comforting her in her Repentance, after she had been at Mass, proper to be read by all those who have fallen, and are willing to rise again

THE peace of God in Jesus Christ, the eternal comforts of his sweet Spirit be with you, and strengthen and comfort you, my dear and faithful sister, Amen.

Although the perilous days be come, whereof Christ prophesied, that if it were possible the very elect should be deceived; yet let the true faithful christians rejoice and be glad, knowing that the Lord himself is their keeper, who will not suffer one hair of their heads to perish without his almighty good will and pleasure, neither will he suffer them to be further tempted than he will give them strength to bear; but will in the midst of their temptation make a way for them to escape out; so good and gracious a God is he to all his chosen children children. And though sometimes he do let his elect stumble and fall, yet (no doubt) he will raise them up again to the further increase of their comfort, and to the setting forth of his glory and praise. Which thing (my dear and faithful loving sister, I trust shall be well verified on you. For I do hear say, that by the manifold allurements, inticements, procurements, yea, and inforcements that you, dear heart, have had, your foot hath chanced to slip out of the way, to the great discomfort of your soul, and the heaviness of your heart. But, my good sister, be of good cheer, for the Lord will not so leave you, but he will raise you up again, and make you stronger than ever you were: so that your fall shall turn to his glory and your profit. For if you had not by this proved the experience of your own strength, or rather your own weakness, you would have stood too much in your own conceit, or perchance have gloried in yourself and have despised and condemned other weak persons that have committed the like offence. Therefore now you may see what the best of us all can do, if God leaves us to ourselves. Which thing ought to move you to be diligent to call earnestly upon God for the grace and strength of his Holy Spirit, (without which we are not able to stand one hour) and to be most thankful for the same when you have it, and then to be more circumspect in time to come.

Therefore (dear sister) seeing that you have done otherwise than the word of God and your own conscience would allow; yet, dear heart, do not think that God will cast you clean away, but know that he hath mercy enough in store for them that truly repent and believe in him, although the sins of them were as many in number as the sands in the sea, and as great as the sins of the whole world. Therefore, good sister, beware in any wise, that you do not once mistrust the promise of God's mercy towards you; but know for a very surety, that all your sins be utterly forgiven you for Christ's sake, be they ever so many, so grievous, or so great.

But now, dear heart, take heed, and beware that you do not cloak that sin, and increase the same daily, in communicating with the wicked in their idolatry, and devilish doings at their den of thieves. Do not, I say, dear sister, be at any of their Antichristian service, lest by little and little you utterly lose a good conscience, and at length esteem it for no offence; as alas, a great number do at this day, to the great peril of their souls. The Lord be merciful to them, and give them grace to repent in time, and turn to the Lord, and then they shall be sure to find mercy at the Lord's hand, as doubtless you have done, praised therefore be his name.

Ah, my dear sister, you may now see the words of Christ verified upon yourself, that a man's greatest foes shall be they of his own household; for your husband hath gotten you to do that, which all the tyrants in the world could never have made you to do. Doubtless he may be sorry for it. God give him grace to repent, or else, without doubt, it will be laid to his charge one day, when he would not by his will hear it for all the goods in the world. Well, I think my brother Tymes will write him a letter shortly that will touch his conscience, if he has any conscience at all.

But now again to you, dear sister. The thing that is done cannot be undone, and you are not the first that hath offended, neither are you so good and so holy, as hath at any time slipped out of the way. Therefore I would not have you to be so much discomforted as I hear say you be, as though God were not as able to forgive you your offence, as he was to forgive his dear saints that offended him in times past; or as though God were not as merciful now, as ever he was. Whereas in very deed, there is with the Lord (as the prophet saith) mercy and plentiful redemption, and his mercy far surmounteth all his works: and he never faileth any that put their whole trust and confidence in him, how great an offender, or how wicked a trespasser soever he be: no, he maketh their falls and backslidings many times to turn to their greater profit and advantage, and to the setting forth of his glory; as doubtless, dear sister, your's shall do, if you put your whole faith, hope, and trust only in his infinite and eternal sweet mercies.

O what a subtle, crafty, lying serpent is that Satan our old enemy? that when he seeth that he cannot make us to continue in our wickedness to do him service, would then bring us into a doubting and mistrusting of the mercy of God, which is the greatest offence that can be; yea, infidelity is the root and original of all other sins. Therefore (my sweet sister) give no place to that cruel adversary of mankind, who hath been a liar and a murderer from the beginning, but stedfastly believe the Lord, who hath sent you word by me his most unworthy servant, that all your sins be pardoned, forgiven, and clean released for Jesus Christ's sake our only Lord and Saviour. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour, glory, praise, thanks, power, rule, and dominion for ever and ever, Amen. Farewel, my dear sister, be of good cheer. Believe in the Lord, and you shall live for ever. The Lord increase your faith, Amen, Amen.

Your poor brother, and prisoner from the Lord,
JOHN CARELESS.

LETTER XIV.

From Mr. JOHN CARELESS to a faithful MINISTER of the LORD, containing certain fruitful PRECEPTS on MATRIMONY.

I beseech the same everlasting Lord (my dear and faithful brother,) that blessed young Tobias with his wife Sarah, and brought them together in due time with reverence and fear, preserve and bless you both, and your seed after you, that they may increase the number of the faithful by thousands and thousands. And as the Lord of his great mercy and fatherly providence hath been always careful for you, and now hath for your comfort accomplished his good work in coupling you with a faithful mate: so see that you be thankful for his providence towards you, that it may every way in you be an increase of love and godliness, yea of christian joy and gladness in these sorrowful days, but yet so, that you mourn with the true mourners of Sion, and be sorry, (yet in measure) for the hurt of the same. Pray also in faith for her prosperity, that the Lord may build up the walls of Jerusalem again.

Oh that the Lord would turn Sion's captivity as the rivers into the south! Then should our hearts be made glad, and our mouths filled with laughter. Then would the heathen hypocrites say, The Lord hath done much for them. O, the Lord hath done great things for us already, whereof let us heartily rejoice, and praise his name therefore. For though we now sow in tears, yet we shall be sure to reap with gladness: and as we now go forth weeping, bearing forth good seed, so shall we come again with joy, and bring our sheaves full of corn. Yea, the death of the martyrs (which is most precious in his sight) shall be the life of the gospel, in spite of the papists' hearts.

Pray for me (dear heart) that I may be counted worthy to sow some seed amongst the sweet saints of the Lord, that I may reap the same again, without ceasing, at the harvest. It is now sowing time of the year, men say in the country, and I think I shall make an end of sowing before all March be past; for I hear say I shall prove how my plough will enter into the stony ground of the hard-hearted papists, within these four days. I hope to hold fast, and not to look back, neither for fear nor flattery, until I have made an end of sowing, and then will I set me down and rest me, and ask them all no leave, and look for the lively fruit and increase thereof with joy and gladness.

My dear brother, the time approacheth near (for which I praise God) that I must put off this sinful tabernacle, and go home to my heavenly Father, where divers of my brethren are already looking and wishing for me. I beseech you therefore that you will help me forward with your faithful prayers, as I know you do, for I do feel the comfort and advantage thereof.

That you have observed my simple counsel I am right glad, and I trust in the Lord God, you shall find comfort in the same. And that you may so indeed, I have been so bold to write these few words unto you, because I shall see you no more in this corruptible life; therefore mark them well. First, and above all things, you must be very circumspect to keep the band of love, and beware that there never spring up the root of bitterness between you. If at any time there happens to arise any cause of unkindness between you, as it is impossible always to be free from it, see that you weed up the same with all lenity, gentleness, and patience, and never suffer yourself nor your wife to sleep in displeasure.

If you have cause to speak sharply, and sometimes to reprove, beware that you do not the same in the presence of others, but keep your words until a more convenient time, (which is the point of a wise man, saith Solomon) and then utter them in the spirit of meekness, and the groaning spirit of perfect love; which you must also let sometimes to cover faults, and wink at them if they be not intolerable. Whatsoever loss and mischance shall happen unto you, take it patiently, and bear it merrily; and though the same should come partly through your wife's negligence, yet let it rather be a loving warning to take heed in time to come, than a cause of sorrow for that which is past, and cannot be holpen. I know by mine own experience, that we are in this life subject to many inconveniences, and that of nature we are prone to displeasure, and ready to think unkindness for every little trifle, and especially with our best friends, yea soonest with our loving wives, who be most loth to displease us.

But let us beware of this cankered corruption, and consider that we ought most of all in love to bear with them according to Christ's example towards his congregation, for whom he gave himself, to cleanse it, &c. I had thought to have treated this matter at large, but even now I am intermitted, and otherwise hindered. I doubt not but you know your duty therein a great deal better than I can describe it unto you; and as you know it, so will do it: but I love to be bold with you. I intend to write to your wife very shortly, and to take my last farewell of you for ever in this world. And thus in great haste I am now constrained to make an end. The blessing of God be always with you. Pray, pray, pray with faith.

Your own for ever,

JOHN CARELESS.

L E T T E R XV.

From Mr. JOHN CARELESS to ELIZABETH, Wife of the aforesaid MINISTER, containing certain godly PRECEPTS of MATRIMONY pertaining to her DUTY.

THE everlasting peace of God in Jesus Christ, the continual aid, strength, and comfort of his most holy and mighty Spirit, with increase of knowledge, faith, and perfect feeling of God's eternal mercy, be with you, my dear and faithful loving sister, and with your godly and loving husband and my dear and faithful brother, to the full performance of that good which he hath so graciously begun in you, that in all things you may be made rich and blessed in him, and your seed after you, now and ever, Amen.

As I have been long desirous to write unto you, (my dear heart in the Lord) not only being thereto bound of duty, but also often provoked by him to whom I owe myself and all that I am able to do (I mean even that blessed of the Lord's own mouth, whom God hath joined with you in that holy and christian state of matrimony); even so at the last I have obtained time and occasion in some part to perform that which I have long purposed. And forasmuch as the Lord of his great mercy and fatherly care and providence over you his dear child, hath now graciously accomplished that good work amongst many others, which I (as a friend of the bridegroom) have full heartily wished, and often prayed for; I think it good, yea, and my bounden duty, to treat of such things as may be profitable to preserve mutual love and faithful amity between you, which I know Satan will chiefly labour to diminish, if he cannot altogether destroy the same, lest by many joyful occasions you should be provoked continually to praise God for his good gift, which that enemy hath by all means sought to hinder you from.

As for all other things, I know you are sufficiently instructed, and have also a most learned companion, who is well able further to teach you if need do require: but in this particular I know my experience is more than his. Therefore (my good sister) first and before all things see that you diligently consider, that as every good and perfect gift pertaining to soul and body, is given from above, and cometh down from the Father of Lights; even so to whomsoever the Lord dealeth any of his benefits, of them he doth chiefly require always a thankful heart for the same, for else he will either take away his good gifts again, or turn the same to their great disadvantage, and in the end to the increase of their damnation: so detestable in his sight is the sin of ingratitude. But to such as be thankful for his benefits, he doth not only to the old ever add new, but also maketh the goodness of his former gifts ever more and more to increase, until by them they are fully persuaded and thoroughly certified of his everlasting love in Christ Jesus, which is eternal life itself: so much doth he of his great mercy delight in a thankful heart.

Therefore I do yet once again earnestly request you, that above all things you be thankful to God for his benefits not only for your election, creation, redemption, and preservation; but also for his other temporal gifts, wherewith he hath indued you; amongst which the chief and most excellent is (as testifieth the Holy Ghost) your good, faithful, and loving husband. For as the wife man faith, goods and possessions may come to a man by the death of his friend, but a good wife is the gift of God, which the Lord will give for a good portion to such as fear him.

And the like is of a good husband, as the Lord hath now given you, praised be his holy name. He hath not given you an ignorant, froward, churlish, brawling, wasteful, rioting, drunken husband, wherewith he hath plagued many others (as he might also have done you); but he hath given you a most godly, learned, gentle, loving, quiet, patient, thrifty, diligent, and sober husband, who will nourish, cherish, keep, and defend you, instruct you and teach you, yea care and provide for you and your children (which he will also by him give you) such things as be necessary for you. He hath not dealt so with every body; and yet he hath done this much more for you, my dear sister, and will thereto increase love and joy between you. For as he delighteth in the love and godly agreement of man and wife together; so it is he only that maketh them and all the whole household to be only of one mind. Unto which his gracious work he requireth your diligence, and will use you as his instrument and mean, the more effectually to accomplish the same. And therefore I now require you to observe this my simple counsel, which I have here written as a testimonial of my good will towards you, because I think in this life I shall never more see you.

Now as I have shewed you how you should be thankful unto God for his good gifts, so I exhort you, and as much as in me lieth, charge you to be evermore thankful unto your dear and loving husband, who hath given himself unto you, who is a more precious jewel in the church of God, than perchance you are yet aware of. Think yourself unworthy to be matched with such an instrument of God; and also reverence evermore the gifts of God in him, and seek with true obedience and love to serve him, in recompence of his true and painful heart towards you. Be loth in any wise to offend him, yea rather be careful and diligent to please him, that his soul may bless you. If at any time you shall chance to anger him, or to do or speak any thing that shall grieve him, see that you never rest until you have pacified him and made him merry again.

If at any time he shall chance to blame you without a cause, a cause, or for that you cannot do therewith (which thing happeneth sometimes to the best man living), see that you bear it patiently, and give him no uncomely or unkind word for it; but always look upon him with a loving and chearful countenance, and rather take the fault upon you than seem to be displeased.

Be always merry and chearful in his company, but not with too much lightness. Beware in any wise of swelling, pouting, or louting, for that is a token of a cruel and unloving heart; except it be in respect of sin, or in the time of sickness.

Be not sorrowful for any adversity that God sendeth; but beware that nothing be spilt or go to waste through your negligence. In any wise see that you be quick and cleanly about his meat and drink, and prepare him the same according to his diet in due season. Go cleanly and well-favouredly in your apparel, but beware of pride in any wise.

Finally, in word and deed shew yourself wise, humble, merry, and loving towards him, and also towards such as he doth love, and then you shall lead a blessed life. I could speak of many things, which I have learned and proved true by experience; but I know that you will do in all things much better than I can teach you, because you have that anointing that teacheth you all things, who hath also given you an heart to obey and serve him. Yet I trust you will not be offended for this which I have written, but rather accept my good will towards you, whom I love in the Lord, as well as I do my daughter Judith.

Thus as mine own soul I commend you both to God, desiring him to bless you with all manner of spiritual blessings in heavenly things, and also with the dew of heaven, and fatness of the earth, that in all things you may be made rich in Jesus Christ our Lord and only Saviour. The Lord increase and bless the fruit of your bodies, that your children may stand round about your table, thick, fresh, and lusty, like the olive branches. God give you both a long life, that you may see and bless your children's children, unto the third and fourth generation, and teach them the true fear and love of God, and that faith for which they shall be accepted in his sight.

God let you see the prosperity of Sion, for whose lying in the dust let your hearts mourn. The Lord make perfect your love together in him, and always increase the same, and bring you both in peace to your graves, at a good age. And now I bid you both most heartily farewell; and I think I shall now take my leave of you for ever in this life. I beseech you both to aid me with your continual prayers, (as I will not forget you in mine) that I may have a joyful victory through Jesus Christ: to whose most merciful protection I do most heartily for ever commend you to be kept unblameable until his coming. Which I beseech him to hasten for his mercy's sake.

Your own unfeigned, JOHN CARELESS, prisoner of the Lord.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of JULIUS PALMER, a learned and virtuous young MAN, sometime FELLOW of MAGDALEN COLLEGE, in OXFORD; with two other MARTYRS, named JOHN GWIN, and THOMAS ASKIN, burnt together at a Place called the SAND-PITS, in NEWBURY, about the 16th of July.

The HISTORY of JULIUS PALMER.

AS all the works of God are wonderful in calling all sorts of men to confirm his truth, and to bear witness to his assured and infallible word, which the adversaries have depraved and corrupted with their false glosses, to establish the fleshly kingdom of Antichrist, and to purchase security in the world, which possession they seek, and by all possible means endeavour to keep; rather cursing with the thunderbolt of excommunication, burning, hanging, drowning, racking, scourging, and persecuting by secret practice, and open violence, the simple sheep of our Saviour Christ, that their talle forged packing should be detected, their estimation impaired, their kitchen cooled, and their rents, revenues, goods, lands, and possessions abated: I say, as God's works are admirable in choosing some of all sorts to confess his gospel; so there is no one example, in the whole godly fellowship of martyrs, more remarkable and amazing than this, that a person, who in all the days of king Edward, was a papist in the university of Oxford, so rigid and obstinate, that he utterly abhorred all godly prayer, and sincere preaching; and he himself as little respected; and, as it were, pointed at, by almost all those with whom he lived: that such a person, I say, should suffer persecution and death by the papists for the truth of the gospel in the reign of queen Mary (as he readily and zealously did), is very admirable and surprising.

He was born in Coventry, where also his parents dwelt. His father had sometime been mayor of the city, and occupied merchandize, although he was an upholsterer by business. How he was brought up in his young and tender years, from his first entering, we know not, but as we have learned, he was sometime scholar to Mr. Harley of Magdalen-college in Oxford; by whose diligence, and the goodness of his own capacity, he became a toward young scholar in prose and verse. For he had a very prompt and ready memory, a wit sharp and pregnant. He spake Latin with great facility of utterance, and wanted not competent knowledge in the Greek tongue; insomuch that divers times he supplied the room of the Greek reader in his house. He was a subtle disputer, both in the public schools, and also at home. He used to say, that he was never so pleasantly occupied, as when he came to the hard debating of profound questions in philosophy; so that he hath oftentimes watched and spent the whole night in the discussing and searching out the truth of deep and difficult questions. And this he used to do sundry times with divers of his equals.

In familiar talk he greatly delighted, for the exercise of his learning, to defend the contrary to that which was affirmed, yet with modesty, and without all ostentation. For he greatly abhorred all cavilling, all frivolous talk, and unfavoury babbling. He was not captious, but would reason so soberly, and with such probability, that even his adversaries would no less marvel at the dexterity of his invention, than at his comely and decent behaviour in prosecuting the same.

And although he applied to divinity very late, it appeareth that he recompensed the small time of his study with the greatness of his diligence bestowed in the same, and his late coming to the truth with his earnest and zealous proceeding therein. For by the secret inspiration of God's Holy Spirit inwardly working in his heart, he gave an apparent signification in his young years, that if God had spared his life longer, he would have grown to such maturity and ripeness of judgment, as thereby he would have been an ornament to Christ's church, and an honour to his country.

And somewhat to speak of his civil behaviour, he was of manners courteous without curiosity, of countenance chearful, without high looks, of speech pleasant, without affectation, he was affable and lowly as any child, and yet quick-spirited, and vehement in reasoning. He practised no deceit toward any man, for he was of such simplicity, that he was apter to be deceived than to deceive, and he was so great a contemner of all reproaches, that he would say, None were to be counted valiant, but such as could despise injury.

In private study he was so indefatigable, that he arose ordinarily every morning at four of the clock, and went to bed before ten at night. Insomuch that as he grew in years and understanding, so he came to be a bachelor of arts, and at length for the hope appearing in him, to the preferment of a fellowship in Magdalen-college, where also he was admitted to the office of a reader in logic, Anno 1550. Now if he had at the first favoured sincere religion; so much as he followed his book, then had we the less matter to note in him. But indeed he was so much (as is before said) addicted to the Romish faith, that his company and conversation in the same house was altogether with such as were utter enemies to the gospel of Christ. If he came to common prayer at any time, it was by violence and compulsion, for otherwise he came not. Sermons would he hear none himself, nor yet suffer his scholars to resort unto them by his good will: for he was fully persuaded, that they might be better occupied at home. The preachers themselves he did both disdain and despise, and all such as were setters-forth of sound doctrine beside. For which contumacy and stubbornness, he was so often called before the officers of the college, and punished sometimes by the purse, sometimes by the lack of his commons, and otherwise by certain tasks, and exercises of learning enjoined unto him, that divers supposed him to have endeavoured, of set purpose, continually to seek occasion, whereby he might be accounted a sufferer for the fanatical religion of the Romish church.

In the end, not long before the death of king Edward, certain slanderous libels and railing verses were privily fixed to the walls and doors in sundry places of the college against the president, which was then Dr. Haddon, whereby was administered further matter of trouble to Palmer. For whereas it was well known that he and some of his companions had a very little time before spoken contumelious words against the president, it could not be now avoided, but that thereby arose a vehement surmise and suspicion, that he conspiring with others, had contrived, made, and scattered abroad the said slanderous writings. Great inquisition was made in the college, to search out the author of so malicious and despiteful a deed, but nothing could be found and proved against Palmer or any of his companions. Now Palmer being hereupon examined by the officers, did not only with stout courage deny the fact to have been his, but also spake further many reproachful words touching the said officers, and sent the same to them in writing, whereby he was by them adjudged to be an unworthy member of that society. And so for this and other popish pranks (continuing obstinate still) he was expelled the house.

After he was thus expelled, he was obliged for his maintenance to apply himself to be a teacher of children in the house of sir Francis Knolles, in which trade he continued until the coming in of queen Mary. And when her visitors were sent to Magdalen-college, under a title of reformation (whereas all things were better before), that is, displace several of the fellows that were learned, and to put right catholics (as they called them) in their rooms; then came this Julius Palmer, waiting to be restored to his living again, of which he had been deprived before, thinking by good right to be restored by them, whose faith and religion (as he said) he did to the uttermost of his power defend and maintain. And indeed at length he obtained the same. Then after he was restored again to his house in queen Mary's reign, God dealt so mercifully with him, that in the end he became of an obstinate papist, an earnest and zealous protestant.

Concerning whose conversion to the truth, for the more credit to be given to the same, we have here inserted a letter written by one Mr. Bullingham, fellow, in some part of king Edward's time, with the said Palmer, then also of the same religion with him, and toward the latter end of the said king's reign a voluntary exile in France for popery; in queen Mary's days likewise a chaplain unto Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester; and after the coming in of queen Elizabeth, such an one as for his own obstinacy was discharged from all his livings by her majesty's commissioners: and yet now (God be praised for it) a most constant professor and earnest teacher of the word of God. This man, at the request of a certain friend of his in London, being desirous to know the certain truth thereof, wrote unto him concerning this Julius Palmer. The copy of which letter we thought good here to insert, because the parties being alive can testify the same to be true, if any man shall doubt thereof.

A LETTER

From Mr. BULLINGHAM to his FRIEND.

MASTER BULLINGHAM, I wish you and all your's continual health in the Lord. Hitherto have I not written any thing unto you concerning Julius Palmer, that constant witness of God's truth, for that his doings and sayings known unto me, were worn out of my remembrance; and to write an untruth, it were rather to deface and blemish, than to adorn and beautify him. After his conversion to the most holy gospel, I never saw his face. Wherefore the less have I to certify you of. But so much as seemeth to me to serve most unto the purpose, here I commend unto you; and in witness that my sayings are true, I subscribe my name, willing and beseeching you to publish the same to the whole world, &c. At the time I Bullingham intended to forsake England, and fly into France for the wicked pope's sake, (which came to pass indeed, for I was in Roan for a time) this Julius Palmer and Richard Duck brought me onwards in my journey till we came to London: where on a day, Julius Palmer and I walked to St. James's, the queen's palace; and as we leaned at the great gate of that palace, Palmer spake thus unto me:

"Bullingham, you know in what misery and calamities we are fallen for the pope and his religion. We are young men, abhorred of all men now presently, and like to be abhorred more and more. Let us consider what hangeth over our heads. You are departing into a strange country, both friendless and moneyless, where I fear you shall taste of sorer sauces than hitherto you have done. And as for me, I am at my wit's end. The face of hell itself is as amiable unto me, as the sight of Magdalen-college; for there I am hated as a venomous toad. Would God I were raked under the earth. And as touching our religion, even our consciences bear witness that we taste not such an inward sweetness in the profession thereof, as we understand the gospellers taste in their religion: yea, to say the truth, we maintain we know not what, rather of will than of knowledge. But what then? rather than I will yield unto them, I will beg my bread."—So Palmer bequeathed himself to the wide world, and I passed over into Normandy. At my return into England, my chance was to meet Palmer in St. Paul's, where a rood was set up. (This our meeting was in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, and our miserable departure not long before the end of king Edward's days.) Then after our greeting, thus said Palmer: Bullingham, is this our God, for whom we have smarted? No, Palmer (quoth I) it is an image of him. An image! (quoth he) I tell thee plainly, Bullingham, John Calvin, whose institutions I have perused since our departure, telleth me plainly by God's word, that it is an idol, and that the pope is Antichrist, and his clergy the filthy sink-hole of hell, and now I believe it; for I feel it sensibly. O that God had revealed these matters unto me in times past. I would have bequeathed this Romish religion, or rather irreligion, to the devil of hell, from whence it came. Believe them not Bullingham. I will rather have these knees pared off, than I will kneel to yonder block of wood (meaning the rood). God help me, I am born to trouble and adversity in this world. Well, Palmer, (said I) is the wind in that corner with you? I warrant you it will blow you to little ease, at the end. I will never have to do with you again. So I left Palmer walking in St. Paul's, who through the element of fire is exalted above clouds, where eternal rest is prepared for persecuted martyrs. Thus much is true, and let it be known, that I Bullingham affirm it to be true. More I have not to say. In these words and deeds it appeareth that God had elected him.

From Bridgewater, April 26, 1562,

By me, JOHN BULLINGHAM.

When he was by the visitors restored to his college, although he began something to favour and taste of God's Parson. Do you not read likewise, Whosoever invocateth the name of the Lord shall be saved? Ergo, Do none but the godly call upon him? Therefore you must mark how St. Paul answereth you. He saith, That the wicked do eat the true body to their condemnation.

As Palmer was bent to answer him at the full, the parson interrupted him, crying still, What sayest thou to St. Paul?

Palmer. I say that St. Paul hath said no such words.

Parson. See, the impudent fellow denieth the plain text: He that eateth and drinketh the body of the Lord unworthily, is guilty of judgment.

Palmer. I beseech you lend me your book.

Parson. Not so.

The Sheriff. I pray you lend him your book.

So the book was given over to him.

Palmer. Your own book hath, Qui manducat hunc panem, &c. He that eateth this bread.

Parson. But St. Jerome's translation hath Corpus, Body.

Palmer. Not so, Mr. Parson, and God be praised that I have in the mean season shut up your lips with your own book.

Jeffrey. It is no matter whether you write Bread or Body, for we are able to prove that he meant the Body. And whereas you say, they eat it spiritually, that is but a blind shift of descant.

Palmer. What should I say else?

Jeffrey. As the holy church saith, really, carnally, substantially.

Palmer. And with as good scripture, I may say grossly or monstrously.

Jeffrey. Thou speakest wickedly. But tell me, Is Christ present in the sacrament, or no?

Palmer. He is present.

Jeffrey. How is he present?

Palmer. The doctors say, Modo ineffabili, In a manner not to be expressed. Therefore why do you ask me? Would to God you had a mind ready to believe it, or I tongue able to express it unto you.

More of his examination in that time and place is not come to our hands; wherefore we must leave it. In the mean season we are credibly informed of this, that sir Richard Abridges, the same day after dinner, sent for him to his lodging, and there, in the presence of divers persons yet alive in Newbury and elsewhere, friendly exhorting him to revoke his opinion, to spare his young years, wit and learning. If thou wilt be conformable, and shew thyself corrigible and repentant, in good faith, said he, I promise thee before this company, I will give thee meat and drink, and books, and ten pounds yearly, so long as thou wilt dwell with me. And if thou wilt set thy mind to marriage, I will procure thee a wife and a farm, and help to furnish and fit thy farm for thee. How sayest thou?

Palmer thanked him very courteously, and made him further answer concerning his religion somewhat at large, but very modestly and reverently; concluding in the end, that as he had already in two places renounced his living for Christ's sake, so he would with God's grace be ready to surrender and yield up his life also for the same, when God should think proper.

Then said Mr. Winchcomb, Take pity on thy golden years, and pleasant flowers of lusty youth, before it be too late.

Palmer. Sir, I long for those springing flowers, that shall never fade away.

Winchcomb. If thou be at point, I have done with thee.

Then was Palmer commanded again to the Blind-house, but the other two men were led again the same afternoon to the consistory, and there was condemned, and delivered to the secular power of the sheriff there present, sir Richard Abridges.

It is reported also, that Dr. Jeffrey offered Palmer a good living, if he would outwardly shew himself conformable, keeping his conscience secret to himself, or at least to declare that he doubted which was the truest doctrine. But I cannot affirm it for a surety.

The next morning, the 16th of July, Palmer was required to subscribe to certain articles, which they had drawn out, touching the cause of his condemnation: in the front whereof were heaped together many heinous terms, as horrible, heretical, damnable, devilish, and execrable doctrine. To these words Palmer refused to subscribe, affirming that the doctrine which he professed was not such, but good and sound doctrine.

Jeffrey. You may see, good people, what shifts these heretics seek, to escape burning, when they see justice administered unto them. But I tell thee, this stile is agreeable to the law, and therefore I cannot alter it.

Palmer. Then I cannot subscribe to it.

Jeffrey. Wilt thou then crave mercy, if thou likest not justice, and revoke thy heresy?

Palmer. I forsake the pope and his popelings, with all popish heresy.

Jeffrey. Then subscribe to the articles.

Palmer. Alter the epithets, and I will subscribe.

Jeffrey. Subscribe and qualify the matter with thine own pen. So he subscribed. Whereupon Dr. Jeffrey proceeded to read the popish sentence of his cruel condemnation, and so was he delivered to the charge of the secular power, and was burnt the same day in the afternoon, about five o'clock.

Within one hour before they went to the place of execution, Palmer in the presence of many people, comforted his companions with these words. Brethren, said he, be of good cheer in the Lord, and faint not. Remember the words of our Saviour Christ, where he saith, "Happy are you when men revile you and persecute you for righteousness' sake. Rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven. Fear not them that kill the body, and be not able to touch the soul. God is faithful, and will not suffer us to be tempted further than we shall be able to bear." We shall not end our lives in the fire, but make a change for a better life. Yea, for coals, we shall receive pearls. For God's Holy Spirit certifieth our Spirit, that he hath even now prepared for us a sweet supper in heaven for his sake who suffered for us.

With these and such like words, he did not only comfort the hearts of his weak brethren that were with him appointed as sheep to be slain, but also wrested out plentiful tears from the eyes of many that heard him. And as they were singing a psalm, came sir Richard Abridges, the sheriff, and the bailiffs of the town, with a great company of armed men, to conduct them to the fire. When they were come to the place appointed for their suffering, they all three fell to the ground, and Palmer, with an audible voice pronounced the 31st psalm; but the other two made their prayers secretly to Almighty God.

And as Palmer began to arise, there came behind him two popish priests, exhorting him to recant and save his soul. Palmer answered and said, Away, away, tempt me no longer. Away, I say, from me all you that work iniquity; for the Lord hath heard the voice of my tears. And so forthwith they put off their raiment, and went to the stake and kissed it. And when they were bound to the post, Palmer said, Good people, pray for us, that we may persevere to the end. And for Christ's sake beware of popish teachers, for they deceive you.

As he spake this, a servant of one of the bailiffs threw a faggot at his face, so that the blood gushed out in divers places. At which the sheriff was very angry, and called him a cruel tormentor, and with his walking-staff broke his head, that the blood likewise ran down about his ears. When the fire was kindled, and began to take hold upon their bodies, they lifted up their hands towards heaven, and quietly and cheerfully, as though they had felt no smart, they cried, Lord Jesus strengthen us, Lord Jesus assist us, Lord Jesus receive our souls. And so they continued without any struggling, holding up their hands, and knocking their hearts, and calling upon Jesus until they had ended their mortal lives.

An Account of the Trouble of PETER MOON and his Wife, and of other godly Protestants, at Bishop HOP-TON'S Visitation in Ipswich.

IN the year 1556, a visitation was held by Dr. Hop-ton, then bishop of Norwich, and Miles Dunning, his chancellor, at Ipswich, in Suffolk, where divers godly protestants, through the accusation of evil men, were much troubled; among whom were Peter Moon, a taylor, and his wife: they were accused of disobedience to the law, in not coming to church, and refusing to partake of such Romish observances as at that time were used.

And first the said Peter Moon was commanded to come before the bishop, where he was examined of three several articles, viz. 1. Whether the pope were supreme head. 2. Whether king William and queen Mary were right heirs to the crown. 3. And whether in the sacrament of the altar was the very body of Christ substantially and really there present.

Unto which the said Peter Moon being timorous and weak, fearing more the face of man than the heavy wrath of God, affirmed, and in a manner granted unto their demands.

Thus as this spiritual father was commending his carnal child, and rather preferring him to hell-fire, than unto the sincere word and commandments of God, one of the portmen of the same town, named Smart, an earnest member of their Romish law, perceiving the bishop thus, as it were, at an end with the said Moon, and so he like to be discharged, said unto the bishop, My lord, I have a good opinion of the man, and that he will be conformable; but, my lord, he hath a perilous woman to his wife. For she never came to church yet since the queen's reign, except it were at even-song, or when she was churched, and not till mass were done. Wherefore your good lordship might do a good deed to cause her to come before you, and to see if you could do any good. And therefore I beseech your good lordship to command him to pray her to come before your lordship.

At which words Moon was somewhat moved, in that he said, Command him to pray her to come before your lordship. And he said unto him, under my lord's correction I speak, I am as able to command her to come before my lord, as you are to command the worst boy in your house. Yea, my lord, said the other, I cry your lordship mercy: I have informed your lordship with an untruth, if this be so. But if he be so able as he saith, he might have commanded her to have come to church in all this time, if it had pleased him. Well, said the bishop, look you come before me at afternoon, and bring your wife with you; I will talk with her.

As my lord's dinner at that time was serving up, Moon departed, and tarried not to take part thereof, having such an hard breakfast given him before to digest. At afternoon Moon delayed and waited his time, be-thinking when he might most conveniently come, especially when his accuser and his wife should not have been there. And according to the commandment came with his wife, which was not so secretly done, but his accuser had knowledge thereof, and came with all expedition in such post-speed, that he was in a manner breathless when he entered the bishop's chamber.

The bishop hearing that Moon and his wife were come, called for them, and said to Moon, Is this your wife, Moon? Yea, my lord, said he. O good lord, said the bishop, how a man may be deceived in a woman! I promise you a man would take her for as honest a woman, by all outward appearance, as can be. Why, my lord, said Moon's wife, I trust there is none than can charge me with any dishonesty, as concerning my body; I defy all the world in that respect.

Nay, quoth the bishop, I mean not as concerning the dishonesty of thy body; but thou hadst done better to have given the use of thy body unto twenty sundry men, than to do as thou hast done. For thou hast done as much as in thee lieth, to pluck the king and the queen's majesties out of their royal seats through thy disobedience, in shewing thyself an open enemy unto God's laws, and their proceedings.

Then the bishop began to examine the said Moon again with the aforesaid articles, and his wife also. And she hearing her husband relent, did also affirm the same, which turned to their great trouble of mind afterward. Dunning, the bishop's chancellor, then came up in great haste, and brought news to the bishop, that there was such a number of heretics come from Boxford, Lanham, and the cloth country, that it would make a man out of his wits to hear them: and there are among them both heretics and anabaptists, said he. And thus Dr. Dunning with his blustering words interrupting Moon's examination, went down again as the devil had driven him, to take order what should be done with them.

The bishop beginning to bewail the state of the country, in that it was so infected with such a number of heretics, and rehearsing partly their opinions to those that were at that time in the chamber, Moon's wife had a young child which she nursed herself, and the child being brought into the yard under the bishop's chamber, cried so that she heard it; and then said, My lord, I trust you have done with me. My child crieth beneath, I must go give my child suck, with such like words. And the bishop being (as it were) out of mind to talk with them any more, said, Go your way, I will talk with you in the morning; look you, be here again in the morning: with this they both departed.

And beneath in the stone-hall of the same house, the chancellor Dunning being very busy about his bloody business, espied Moon and his wife coming, and must needs pass by the place where he stood, and said, Nay, soft, I must talk with you both; for ye are as evil as any that are here to-day. To whom Moon's wife answered, My lord hath had us in examination, and therefore you shall have nought to do with us. Nay, quoth he, ye shall not so escape, I must talk with you also. Unto whom Moon answered, My lord hath taken order with us, and therefore we are as his lordship hath appointed, and must repair again before him to-morrow.

So Moon departed and his wife without hurt of body: but afterwards when they, with Peter the apostle, beheld the face of Christ, they were sore wounded in their consciences, ashamed of their doings, and also at the door of desperation. Inasmuch that when he came home to his house, and entering into a parlour alone by himself, considering his estate, and seeing where a sword of his did hang against a wall, he was earnestly allured by the enemy Satan to have taken it down, and therewith to have slain himself: but God, which casteth not away the penitent sinner, repenting his fall with a sincere heart, defended his unworthy servant from that temptation, and hath (I trust) left him to the amendment of life by the assistance of his Holy Spirit, and to make him one among the elect that shall be saved.

The morrow they both remained and kept house with no small grief of conscience, waiting and looking with fear when to be sent to the bishop, rather than offering their diligence to keep the bishop's appointment: but God so wrought, that when the time drew near that they feared the bishop's call, the bells rung for his departure out of town. For which they were not only glad, but also many a good heart in Ipswich rejoiced and gave thanks to God. God for his mercy grant, that our sins may never deserve to provoke God's anger, lest the like days should come again. And if they so do, God make us, with all other weaklings, strong and worthy soldiers

God's truth, by conference and company of certain godly and zealous men abroad, in the time of his expulsion, especially at the house of sir Francis Knolles; yet he was not thoroughly persuaded, but in most points continued for a while either blind, or else doubtful. Neither could he chuse, but utter himself in private reasoning from time to time, both in what points he was fully resolved, and also of what points he doubted. For such was always his nature, both in popery and in the gospel, utterly to detest all dissimulation; insomuch, that by the means of his plainness, and for that he could not flatter, he suffered much trouble, both in king Edward's and also in queen Mary's time. Whereas he might at the first have lived in great quietness, if he could have dissembled, and both done and spoken against his conscience, as many stirring papists then did. And likewise he might have escaped the flames in queen Mary's time, if he would either have spoken, or kept silence against his conscience, as many weak gospellers did. But Palmer could in no wise dissemble.

Now, within a short time, God so wrought in his heart, that he became very inquisitive, to hear and understand how the martyrs were apprehended, what articles they died for, how they were used, and after what manner they took their death. Insomuch that he spared not, at his own charges to send over one of his scholars, in company with a bachelor of that house, to Gloucester, to see and understand the whole order of bishop Hooper's death, and to bring him true report thereof. Which thing some think he rather did because he was wont in king Edward's time to say, that none of them all would stand to death for their religion. Thus he learned with what great, extreme, and horrible cruelty the martyrs of God were tried, and how valiantly they overcame all kind of torments to the end. Whereof he himself also did see more experience afterwards, at the examination and death of those holy confessors which were burnt at Oxford before his eyes: insomuch that the first hope which the godly conceived of him, was at his return from the burning of bishop Ridley and bishop Latimer. At which time, in the hearing of divers of his friends, he broke out into these or such like words, O raging cruelty! O tyranny tragical, and more than barbarous!

From that day forward he studiously endeavoured to understand the truth, and therefore with all speed he borrowed Peter Martyr's commentaries on the first to the Corinthians, of one of Magdalen's yet alive, and other good books of other men. And so through hearty prayer, and diligent search and conference of the scriptures, at length he believed and embraced the truth with great joy; and so profited in the same, that daily more and more, he declared it both in word and deed: insomuch that ever afterwards he loved the truth as much as he before hated it, when it pleased God to open his eyes, and to reveal unto him the light of his word. And now again when he should come to church in those days of popery, there to be occupied among the rest, in singing of responds, reading of legends, and such like stuff allotted to him, he had as much pleasure, he said, to be at them, as a bear to be baited and worried with dogs. When he came, it was (as it appeared) more to avoid displeasure and danger, than for any good will, and ready affection.

At length, through God's grace, he grew up to such maturity and ripeness in the truth, that he spared not to declare certain sparks thereof in his outward behaviour. For when he should keep his bowing measures at the Confiteor (as the custom there was) in turning himself to and fro, sometimes eastward, sometimes westward, and afterwards knock his breast at the time of elevation, against these idolatrous adorations his heart did so vehemently rise, that sometimes he would absent himself from them, and sometimes being there, he would even at the sacring (as they termed it) get him out of the church to avoid those ungodly gestures, and idolatrous adoration. To be short, perceiving after a while, that he was greatly suspected as well as disrespected by Mr. Cole, the president then being, and divers others who before had been his friends, and finding great torment of conscience daily growing upon him, in his conversation with idolaters; and also seeing that his new life and old way of living could not well quietly stand together, he prepared himself to depart the house. For he thought it not best to abide the danger of expulsion, as he did at first, seeing the heat of the times increasing apace. And being demanded at that time by a particular friend (who would gladly have persuaded him to stay there longer) whither he would go, or how he would live, he made his answer, Domini est terra, & plenitudo ejus; that is, The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. Let the Lord work, I will commit myself to God and the wide world.

Here I think it expedient, before I write of the painful surges that he suffered after he came abroad into the perilous gulfs and deep sea of this wretched wide world, first, to rehearse one or two examples of his outward behaviour, at such times as he had recourse to the college, after his last departure, whereby the reader may yet better understand his simplicity and plainness, and how far wide he was from all cloaked dissimulation in God's cause, which certain godless persons have fought maliciously to charge him withal. Being at Oxford at a certain time, in Magdalen college, and having knowledge that the Spanish friar John (who succeeded Dr. Peter Martyr in the office of divinity lecturer) would preach there that present Sunday, he would not at the first consent to be present at it. At length a friend of his, a fellow of that house, persuaded him so much, that he was content to accompany his said friend to the church. But suddenly, as the friar vehemently inveighed against God's truth, in defending certain popish heresies, Palmer, having many eyes bent and directed towards him, departed from amongst the midst of the auditory, and was found in his friend's chamber weeping bitterly. Afterwards, being asked why he slipped away on such a sudden, O, said he, if I had not openly departed, I should have openly stopped mine ears; for the friar's blasphemous talk, in disproving, or rather depraving the verity, made mine ears not to glow, but my heart worse to smart than if mine ears had been cut from my head.

It chanced another time, that the same friend of his, named Mr. Shipper, being then butler of the house, asked him to dinner in his chamber. Palmer not knowing what guests were also thither invited and bidden, happened there (contrary to his expectation) to meet with the aforesaid friar, with whom were present Dr. Smith, Dr. Tresham, and divers other papists, whose company Palmer could not well bear: and therefore whispering to his friend in the ear, he said he would be gone, for that was no place for him: I will go, said he, to the butler's table in the great hall. The butler understanding his mind, desired him of all friendship not so to depart, alledging that it was the next way to betray himself, and as it were on purpose to cast himself into the briar, with many other persuasions, as the shortness of time would permit. In the end he condescended to his request, and tarried. Now as he came to the fire-side, the friar saluted him cheerfully in Latin, for he could not speak English. Palmer with all amiable countenance gently returned it; but when the friar offered him his hand, he casting his eye aside, as though he had not seen it, found matter to talk to another standing by, and so avoiding it; which thing was well marked by some, not without great grudge of stomach.

After they were set and had well eaten, the friar with a pleasant look offering him the cup, said, Propino tibi, juvenis erudite, that is, I drink to you, learned young man. Palmer at that word, blushing as red as scarlet, answered, Non agnosco nomen, domine, that is, I acknowledge no such name, O sir. And therewith taking the cup at his hand, he set it down by him, as though he would have pledged him anon, but in the end it was also well marked, that he did it not. When dinner was done, being sharply rebuked by the said butler his friend, for his so unwise, uncivil, and unseemly behaviour (as he termed it), he made answer for himself, and said, Oleum coram non demulcet, sed frangit caput meum, meum, that is, The oil of these men doth not supple, but breaketh my head.

Another time, which was also the last time of his being at Oxford, not long before his death, one Barwick an old acquaintance of his, being sometime clerk of Magdalen's and then fellow of Trinity-college, a rank papist, began to reason with him in his friend's chamber afore said, and perceiving him to be zealous and earnest in the defence of the verity, he said unto him, in the hearing of Mr. Thomas Parry, and others there present: Well, well, now thou art stout, and hardy in thine opinion, but if thou wert once brought to the stake, I believe thou wouldst tell me another tale. I advise thee beware of the fire, it is a shrewd matter to burn. Truly, said Palmer, I have been in danger of burning once or twice, and hitherto, I thank God, I have escaped it. But I judge verily, it will be my end at the last, welcome be it, by the grace of God. Indeed it is a hard matter for them to burn, that have the mind and soul linked to the body, as a thief's foot is tied in a pair of fetters: but if a man be once able, through the help of God's Spirit, to separate and divide the soul from the body, for him it is no more mastery to burn, than for me to eat this piece of bread.

Thus much by the way concerning his plainness, without dissimulation, and how he feared not openly to shew himself more grieved in heart to hear the word of God blasphemed, than to suffer any worldly pains. Now let us proceed in our story, and faithfully declare both the occasion and manner of his death.

Within a short time after he had yielded up his fellowship in Oxford, he was through God's providence (who never faileth them that first seek his glory) placed schoolmaster by patent in the grammar-school of Reading, where he was well accepted by all those that feared God, and favoured his word, as well for his good learning and knowledge, and also for his earnest zeal and profession of the truth. But Satan, the enemy of all godly attempts, envying his good proceedings, and prosperous success in the same, would not suffer him long there to be quiet. Wherefore he stirred up against him certain double-faced hypocrites, who by dissimulation and crafty insinuation had crept in, to understand his secrets under pretence of a zeal to the gospel. Which men he (suspecting no deceit) right joyfully embraced, making them privy to all his doings. For as he himself was then fervently inflamed with the love of heavenly doctrine, so he had an incredible desire by all means possible to allure and encourage others to the profession of the same.

These faithful and trusty brethren, so soon as they had found good opportunity, spared not in his absence to rifle his study of certain godly books and writings; amongst which was his Replication to Morewine's verses, touching Winchester's epitaph, and other arguments both in Latin and English, written by him against the popish proceedings, and especially against their unnatural and brutish tyranny, executed towards the martyrs of God. When they had thus done, they were not ashamed to threaten him that they would exhibit the same to the council, unless he would without delay depart out of their coasts, and give over the school to a friend of their's. The truth of this story appeareth in part, by a letter written with his own hand, out of prison, eight days before he was burnt; which, because it is of certain credit, and came to our hands, therefore we are the bolder to avouch it for a truth.

Thus then was this silly young man, for the safeguard of his life, forced to depart on a sudden from Reading, leaving behind him in the hands of his enemies his goods, and one quarter's stipend, and so he took his journey towards Ensham, where his mother then dwelt, hoping to obtain at her hands certain legacies due to him by his father's last will, which he should have received certain years before; and taking his journey by Oxford, he requested certain of his friends to accompany him thither. His mother understanding his state and errand by Mr. Shipper and his brother (whom he had sent before to intreat for him), as soon as she beheld him on his knees, asking her blessing, as he had been accustomed to do: Thou shalt, said she, have Christ's curse and mine wheresoever thou goest. He pausing a little, as one amazed at so heavy a greeting; at length said, O mother, your own curse you may give me, which God knoweth I never deserved, but God's curse you cannot give me, for he hath already blessed me. Nay, said she, thou didst go from God's blessing into the warm sun, when thou wert banished for an heretic out of that worshipful house in Oxford, and now for the like knavery, art driven out of Reading too. Alas, mother, said he, you have been misinformed. I was not expelled nor driven away, but freely resigned of mine own accord. And heretic I am none, for I stand not stubbornly against any true doctrine, but defend it to my power. And you may be sure, they use not to expel nor banish, but to burn heretics (as they term them.) Well, quoth she, I am sure thou dost not believe as thy father and I, and all our forefathers have done: but as we were taught by the new law in king Edward the Sixth's time, which is damnable heresy.

Indeed I confess, said he, that I believe that doctrine which was taught in king Edward's days, which is not heresy but truth, neither is it new, but as old as Christ and his apostles. If thou art at that point, said she, I require thee to depart from my house, and out of my sight, and never take me more for thy mother hereafter. As for money and goods I have none of thine, thy father bequeathed nought for heretics. Faggots I have to burn thee, more thou gettest not at my hands. Mother, said he, whereas you have cursed me, I again pray God to bless you, and prosper you all your life long; and with like soft talk, sweet words, and abundance of tears trickling down his cheeks, he departed from her, wherewith he so mollified her hard heart, that she hurled an old angel after him, and said, Take that to keep thee a true man.

Thus poor Palmer, being destitute of worldly friendship, and cruelly repelled by her whom he took to have been his surest friend, knew not which way to turn his face. Soon after, when he had bethought himself, it came to his mind to return secretly to Magdalen-college, upon the assured trust and affiance, that he had a secret friend or two in that house. At which time, by the suit of one Alane Cope, then fellow of the house, he obtained letters commendatory from Mr. Cole, president there, for his preferment to a school in Gloucestershire. So he getteth him away, committed by his friends to God's divine protection, of whom some accompanied him as far as Ensam Ferry, and some to Burford.

Afterward as he went alone musing and pondering of matters, it came in his head (as he writeth in an epistle to one of his friends) to leave his appointed journey, and to return privately to Reading, trusting there by the help of friends to receive his quarter's stipend, and convey his goods to the custody of some trusty body. To Reading he cometh, and taketh up his lodgings at the Cardinal's Hat, desiring his hostess instantly to assign him a close chamber, where he might be alone from all resort of company. He came not so closely, but that this viperous generation had knowledge thereof. Wherefore without delay they laid their heads together, and consulted what way they might most safely proceed against him, to bring their old cankered malice to pass. And soon it was concluded, that one Mr. Hampton (who then bare two faces under one hood, and under the colour of a brother played the part of a dissembling hypocrite) should resort to him under the pretence of friendship, to feel and fish out the cause of his repair to Reading.

Palmer, as he was a simple man, and without all wrinkles of cloaked deceit, opened to him his whole intent. But Hampton earnestly persuaded him to the contrary, declaring what danger might ensue if this were attempted. Against his counsel Palmer replied very much, and as they waxed hot in talk, Hampton flung away in a fury, and said, As he had fished, so should he fowl for him. Palmer not yet suspecting such devised mischief, as by this crooked and pestiferous gene-generation was now in brewing against him, called for his supper, and went quietly to bed. But quiet he could not long rest there; for within a short space after, the officers and their retinue came rushing in with lanthorns and bills, requiring him in the king and queen's name to make himself ready, and quietly to depart with them; and led him away as a lamb to the slaughter, and committed him to ward, whom the keeper, as a ravening wolf greedy of his prey, brought down into a vile, stinking, and dark dungeon, prepared for thieves and murderers, and there he left him for a time, hanging by the hands and feet in a pair of stocks, so high, that well near no part of his body touched the ground. In this cave or dungeon he remained about ten days under the tyranny of this unmerciful keeper.

After this he was brought before the mayor of Reading, and there, by the procurement of certain false brethren, divers grievous and enormous crimes were laid to his charge, as treason, sedition, surmised murder, and adultery.

To whom Palmer answered, that if such horrible and heinous crimes might be proved against him, he would patiently submit himself to all kinds of torments that could be devised. But O ye cruel blood-suckers, (saith he) ye follow the old practices of your progenitors, the viperous and wolfish generation of pharisees and papists: but be ye well assured, that God already seeth your subtle devices and crafty packing, and will not suffer the outrageous fury of your venomous tongues and fiery hearts to escape unpunished.

All this while no mention was made of heresy or heretical writings.

Their greatest Proofs against him were these:

FIRST, That Palmer said, the queen's sword was not put into her hand to execute tyranny, and to kill and murder the true servants of God.

Item, That her sword was too blunt toward the papists, but toward the true christians it was too sharp.

Item, That certain servants of sir Francis Knolles and others, resorting to his lectures, had fallen out among themselves, and were like to have committed murder, and therefore he was a sower of sedition, and a procurer of unlawful assemblies.

Item, That his hostess had written a letter unto him, (which they had intercepted) wherein she required him to return to Reading, and sent him her commendations, by the token that the knife lay hid under the beam, whereby they gathered that she had conspired with him to murder her husband.

Item, That they found him alone with his hostess by the fire-side in the hall, the door being shut to them forsooth.

When the evidence was given up, the mayor dismissed them and went to dinner, commanding Palmer to the cage, to make him an open spectacle of ignominy to the eyes of the world; it being given out, that he was so punished for his evil life and wickedness already proved against him.

In the afternoon Palmer came to his answer, and did so mightily and clearly deface their evidence, and defend his own innocency, proving also that the said letters were forged by themselves, that the mayor himself was much ashamed that he had given such credit to them, and so much borne with them, so that he sought means how they might convey him out of the country privily.

But here among other things this is not to be passed over in silence, that one John Galant, a zealous professor of the gospel, a little after this came to the prison, and found him somewhat better treated than before. When he beheld him, O Palmer, saith he, thou hast deceived divers men's expectation: for we hear that you suffer not for righteousness' sake, but for your own demerits.

O brother Galant, saith he, these are the old practices of that Satanical brood. But be you well assured, and God be praised for it, I have so purged myself, and detected their filthhood, that from henceforth I shall be no more molested therewith. And there, having pen and ink, he wrote somewhat whereby part of his story here rehearsed, is well confirmed. But now to these bloody adversaries.

After this, when they saw the matter frame so ill-favouredly, fearing that if he should escape secretly, their doing would tend no less to their shame and danger, than to the mayor's dishonesty, they devised a new policy to bring to pass their long hidden and festered malice against him, which was by this extreme refuge. For whereas before they were partly ashamed to accuse him of heresy, seeing they had been counted earnest brethren themselves; and partly afraid, because they had broken up his study, and committed theft; yet now, lest their iniquity should have been revealed to the world, they put both fear and shame aside, and began to rip up the old sore, the scar whereof had been but superficially cured, as you have heard; and so to colour their former practices with the pretence of his reformation in religion, they charged him with the writing that they had stolen out of his study.

Thus Palmer was once again called out of the prison to appear before the mayor, and Bird the official, and two other justices, to render an account of his faith before them, and answer to such articles and informations as were laid against him. And when they had gathered of his own mouth sufficient matter to intrap him, they devised a certificate, or bill of instructions against him, to be directed to Dr. Jeffrey; who had determined to hold his visitation the next Tuesday at Newbury, which was the 16th of July. And thus were the false witnesses and bloody accusers winked at, and the innocent delivered to the lion to be devoured. When it was therefore concluded that Palmer should be sent over to Newbury, the said letters testimonial were conveyed over together with him; the contents whereof shall partly appear hereafter; in the mean time I think it good here to rehearse one example among others, both of charitable affection towards him, and of his modesty correspondent to the same.

Mr. Rider, of Reading, a faithful witness of God's truth, hearing how cruelly Palmer had been dealt withal in the prison, and pined away for the lack of necessaries, and how evidently he had proved himself innocent before the officers, of such crimes as were objected against him, he sent to him his servant secretly the night before his departure to Newbury, with a crooked groat in token of his good heart towards him, requiring him to let him understand if he lacked necessaries, and he would provide for him. Palmer answered, The Lord reward your matter for his benevolence towards me a miserable object in this world, and tell him, that (God be praised) I lack nothing.

In the morning before they took their journey, Thomas Askin, alias Roberts, being fellow-prisoner with him in Christ's cause, sitting at breakfast, and beholding Palmer very sad, leaning to the window in a corner of the house, asked why he came not to breakfast. Because I lack money, said Palmer, to discharge the shot. Come on man, quoth he, God be praised for it, I have enough for us both. Which thing when Mr. Rider heard of, it cannot be expressed how much it grieved him that Palmer had deceived him with so modest an answer.

Thus to Newbury they came on Monday night, and forthwith they were committed to the comfortable holtry of the blind house, where they found John Gun, their faithful brother in the Lord. Now when they came before the consistory of Dr. Jeffrey, and how Palmer was examined, it doth in part appear by this examination hereunto annexed, which, although it be not perfectly and orderly penned, as the report goeth it was spoken, nor perchance altogether in such form of words, yet as exactly as we are able to compact and dispose it, being gathered out of several notes of Richard Shipper, Shipper, John Hunt, John Kirry, of Newbury, Richard White, of Marlborough, who were eye-witnesses, and present at the hearing thereof.

The SECOND EXAMINATION of JULIUS PALMER, at NEWBURY, in the HEARING of more than three hundred PERSONS.

ON the 16th of July, in the year 1556, four or five seats were prepared in the choir of the parish church of Newbury, for the visitors, whose names here ensue. Dr. Jeffrey, for the bishop of Sarum, Sir Richard Abridges, knight, and then high sheriff of the county, sir William Ramsford, knight, John Winchcomb, esquire, and the parson of Inglefield. After the prisoners were presented, the commission read, and other things done in order accordingly, Dr. Jeffrey called to Palmer, and said, Art thou that jolly writer of three-half-penny books that we hear of?

Palmer. I know not what you mean.

Jeffrey. Have you taught Latin so long, that now you understand not English?

To this he answered nothing.

Then Dr. Jeffrey standing up, said, We have received certain writings and articles against you, from the right worshipful the mayor of Reading, and other justices, whereby we understand, that being convented before them, you were convicted of certain heresies.

First, That you deny the supremacy of the pope's holiness.

Secondly, That there are but two sacraments.

Thirdly, That the priest sheweth up an idol at mass; and therefore you went to no mass, since your first coming to Reading.

Fourthly, That there is no purgatory.

Last of all, That you are a fower of sedition, and have sought to divide the unity of the queen's subjects.

Sheriff. You were best see first what he will say to his own handy-work.

Jeffrey. You say truth. Tell me, Palmer, art thou he that wrote this fair volume? Look upon it.

Palmer. I wrote it indeed, and gathered it out of the scripture.

Jeffrey. Is this doggish rhyme your's also? Look.

Palmer. I wrote this, I deny it not.

Jeffrey. And what say you to these Latin verses, entitled, Epicedion, &c. Are they your's too!

Palmer. Yea, sir.

Jeffrey. Art thou not ashamed to affirm it? It came of no good spirit, that thou didst both rail at the dead, and slander a learned and catholic man yet alive.

Palmer. If it be a slander, he hath slandered himself: for I do but report his own writing, and open the folly therein declared. And I reckon it no railing to inveigh against Annas and Caiaphas being dead.

Jeffrey. Sayest thou so? I will make thee recant it, and wring peccavi out of thy lying lips, before I have done with thee.

Palmer. But I know, that although of myself I be able to do nothing, yet if you and all mine enemies, both bodily and spiritual, should do your worst, you shall not be able to bring that to pass, neither shall you prevail against God's mighty Spirit, by whom we understand the truth, and speak it so boldly.

Jeffrey. Ah, are you full of the Spirit? Are you inspired with the Holy Ghost?

Palmer. Sir, no man can believe, but by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. Therefore, if I were not a spiritual man, and inspired with God's Holy Spirit, I were not a true christian: Qui Spiritum Christi non habet, hic non est ejus; that is, He that hath not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his.

Jeffrey. I perceive you lack no words.

Palmer. Christ hath promised not only to give us store of words necessary, but with them such force of matter, as the gates of hell shall not be able to confound or prevail against.

Jeffrey. Christ made such a promise to his apostles; I hope you will not compare yourself with them.

Palmer. With the holy apostles I may not compare, neither have I any affiance in mine own wit or learning, which I know is but small: yet this promise I am certain pertaineth to all such as are appointed to defend God's truth against his enemies, in the time of their persecution for the same.

Jeffrey. Then it pertaineth not to thee.

Palmer. Yes, I am right well assured, that through his grace it appertaineth at this present to me, as it shall (I doubt not) appear, if you give me leave to dispute with you before this audience; in defence of all that I have there written.

Jeffrey. Thou art but a beardless boy, yesterday an upstart out of the schools, and darest thou presume to offer disputation, or to encounter with a doctor?

Palmer. Remember, Mr. Doctor, "The Spirit breatheth where it pleaseth him," &c. And again, "Out of the mouth of babes hast thou ordained strength." And in another place, "Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." God is not tied to time, wit, learning, place, nor person. And although your wit and learning is greater than mine, yet your belief in the truth, and zeal to defend the same, is no greater than mine.

Register. Sir, if you suffer him thus impudently to trifle with you, he will never have done.

Jeffrey. Well, you shall understand, that I have it not in commission at this present to dispute with you, neither were it meet that we should call again into question such articles as are already discussed; and perfectly defined by our mother the holy church, whom we ought to believe without why or wherefore, as the creed telleth us. But the cause why you be now called hither, is, that you might be examined upon such articles as are administered against you, and such matter as is here contained in your hand-writing, that it may be seen whether you will stand to it, or no. How say you to this?

Palmer. By your holy church you mean the synagogue of Rome, which is not universal, but a particular church of shavelings. The catholic church I believe, yet not for her own sake, but because she is holy, that is to say, a church that grounded her belief upon the word of her spouse Christ.

Jeffrey. Leave railing, and answer me directly to my question. Will you stand to your writing, or will you not?

Palmer. If you prove any sentence therein comprized not to stand with God's word, I will presently recant it.

Jeffrey. Thou impudent fellow, have I not told thee that I came not to dispute with thee, but to examine thee?

Here the parson of Inglefield pointing to the Pyx, said, What seest thou yonder?

Palmer. A canopy of silk brodered with gold.

Parson. Yea, but what is within it?

Palmer. A piece of bread in a clout, I suppose.

Parson. Thou art as froward an heretic as ever I talked with.

Here much was spoken of Confiteor, and other parts of the mass.

Parson. Do you not believe that they which receive the holy sacrament of the altar, do truly eat Christ's natural body?

Palmer. If the sacrament of the Lord's supper be administered as Christ did ordain it, the faithful receivers do indeed spiritually and truly eat and drink in it Christ's very natural body and blood.

Parson. The faithful receivers? You cannot blear our eyes with such sophistry. Do not all manner of receivers, good and bad, faithful and unfaithful, receive the very natural body in form of bread?

Palmer. No, sir.

Parson. How prove you that?

Palmer. By this place, He that eateth me, shall live for me.

soldiers to encounter with the spiritual enemies, the world, the flesh, and the devil; and boldly to stand to the confession of Christ and his gospel, saying with the apostles, "Whether it be right in the sight of God, that we should obey you more than God, judge ye."

A tragical and most lamentable History, or an Account of the cruel Murder of three Women and an Infant, viz. the Mother, her two Daughters, and the Child, in the Isle of Guernsey, July 18th, 1556.

OF all the singular and tragical histories in this book, nothing can be more barbarous, if any thing can come up to the inhumanity of this execution upon three women and one infant, whose names be these following; Catherine Cawches, the mother; Gulliemine Gilbert, the daughter; Perotine Mafsey, the other daughter; and an infant, the son of Perotine.

Before I come to the story itself, it will be necessary, for the better explaining of it, to relate the circumstances, from whence this cruelty did originally spring, which was as followeth.

The 17th day of May, in the year 1556, in the isle of Guernsey (which is a member of England), in a town there called St. Peter's Port, was a naughty woman named Vincent Goffet, who being evil disposed, went (the day aforesaid) to the house of one Nicholas le Conronney, dwelling in the town of the said St. Peter's Port, about ten of the clock at night, and there taking a key of the house (lying under the door) entered into a chamber toward the street, where she espied a silver cup within a cupboard, took it away, and so conveyed herself out of the house again. Who immediately after this fact was done, (whether by counsel, or by what occasion else I know not) brought the cup to the abovesaid Perotine Mafsey, an honest woman, dwelling in the said town, desiring her to lend her sixpence upon the same.

Perotine seeing the cup, and suspecting (as the truth was) the same to be stolen, answered, that she would not take it: yet nevertheless, having knowledge of the owner thereof, took it to restore it again to whom it did belong; and to the end she should not carry it to another, gave her sixpence immediately. Where moreover is to be noted, that Thomas Effart saith and testifieth, that knowledge was given by the said Perotine to Conronney touching the stealing of this cup, who soon upon the misliking thereof charged the said Vincent Goffet of the trespass; who being apprehended and examined upon the same, immediately confessed the fact, desiring to have one sent with her (which was Collas de Loutre) with sixpence to fetch the cup again, which he accordingly did.

The next day following, the king's officers being informed of the premises by one Nicholas Cary, of the said town, constable, assembled the justices there to inquire and examine further, as well upon the fact of Vincent Goffet, as upon other griefs and things there amiss. So that after declaration made by the officers and constable before the justice, for that the said constable did report to have found a certain vessel of pewter in the house of the aforesaid Perotine Mafsey (who then dwelt with her mother Catherine Cawches, and her sister Guillemine Gilbert,) which vessel did bear no mark, and especially for that there was a pewter dish, whereof the name was scraped out, their bodies upon the same were attached and put in prison, and their moveable goods taken by inventory. Within a few days after these things thus done and past, these three poor women, abiding thus in durance in the castle, made their supplication to the justices to have justice ministered unto them, viz. If they had offended the law, then to let them have law: if not, beseeching to grant them the benefit of subjects, &c. which supplication put up, they were thereupon appointed to come to their answer the fifth day of June in the year aforesaid. Upon which day, after strict examination of the matter, and the honest answering of the cause by the said good women, at last they submitted themselves to the report of their neighbours, that they were no thieves, nor evil disposed persons, but lived truly and honestly, as became christian women to do, notwithstanding the false report of their accusers.

So the cause being thus debated, after the inquiry made by the king's officers, they were found by the said neighbours not guilty of what they were charged with, but had always lived as honest women amongst them; saving only that to the commandments of the holy church they had not been obedient, &c. Upon this trial and verdict of their neighbours, it was, in fine, adjudged, first, that the said Vincent Goffet, being attainted of felony, and condemned for the same, should be whipped, and after her ear being nailed to the pillory, should so be banished out of the isle without further punishment. As touching the other three women, the mother with her two daughters, for their not coming to church, they were returned prisoners again into the castle the first of July. And thus far concerning the true discourse of this matter, with all the circumstances and appurtenances of the same, in every point, as the case stood, according to the faithful tenor and testimony of the Guernsey men, written with their own hands both in the French and English tongue. Wherein you see what false surmised matter was pretended against these women, and nothing proved, and how by the attestation of their neighbours they were fully cleared of the fact, and should by the temporal court have been dismissed, had not the spiritual clergymen picked matter of religion against them, exercised such extremity in persecuting these miserable prisoners, that in no case they should escape their bloody hands, till at length they had brought them (as you shall hear) to their end. For, after the time of this declaration abovementioned made by the neighbours, whereby they were purged of all other things, and being then known of their not coming to church, the bailiff's lieutenant and the justices thinking the matter not to pertain to them, but to the clergy, forthwith wrote their letters or mandate under their signets to the dean, whose name was James Amy, and curates of the said isle: the contents whereof here follow.

LETTER

Sent from the Bailiffs, Lieutenant, and Jurates of St. Peter's-Port, to the Dean and Curates of the Isle of Guernsey.

MASTER Dean and justices in your court and jurisdiction, after all amicable recommendations, pleaseth you to know that we are informed by the deposition of certain honest men, passed before us in manner of an inquiry; in which inquiry Catherine Cawches and her two daughters have submitted themselves in a certain matter criminal: wherein we are informed that they have been disobedient to the commandments and ordinances of the same, against the will and commandment of our sovereign lord the king and queen. Whereof we send you the said matter, forasmuch as the matter is spiritual, to the end you may proceed therein after your good discretions, and as briefly as you can possible, and also that it pertaineth to your office, recommending you to God, who give you grace to do that which pertaineth to right and justice. Written the first day of the month of July, in the year of our Lord 1556.

After these letters and information thus addressed to Jaques Amy, dean, and the other clergy, the said women were again convented before the justice aforesaid, with his assistants. In the presence of whom they, being examined of their faith, concerning the ordinances of the Romish church, made their answer that they would obey and keep the ordinances of the king and queen, and the commandments of the church, notwithstanding what they had said and done the contrary in the time of king Edward the Sixth, in shewing obedience to his ordinances and commandments before. After which answer taken, they were returned again to prison, prison, until the others had an answer of their letter from the dean and his accomplices. During which time, the dean and curate gave their information touching the said women, and delivered the same to the bailiff and jurates, condemning and reputing them for heretics, the women neither hearing of any information, neither being ever examined at any time before of their faith and religion. Whereupon, when the said bailiff and jurates understood that the said dean and curates had not examined the women of their faith, they would not sit in judgment on that day, but ordained the women to come first before the dean and curates to be examined of their faith. And so the officers, at the commandment of the justices, did fetch and present them before the said dean and curates; which being done, they were examined apart, and then returned to prison again.

The fourteenth day of the said month of July, in the year aforesaid, after the examination above-mentioned before Elier Goffelin, bailiff, in the presence of Thomas Devicke, Pierres Martin, Nicholas Cary, John Blundel, Nicholas de Lisle, John Laverchaunt, John le Fever, Pierres Bonamy, Nicholas Martine, John de la March, jurates; sir James Amy, dean, and the curates, did deliver before the justice, under the seal of the dean, and under the signs of the curates, a certain act and sentence, the sum whereof was, that Catherine Cawches and her two daughters were found heretics, and such they reputed them, and have delivered them to justice, to do execution according to the sentence; the tenor of which here followeth:

"In the year of our Lord 1556, July 13, at the church of St. Peter's Port, in the isle of Guernsey, inquiry being made by us the dean and curates, concerning the catholic faith and the sacraments of the church, viz. of baptism, confirmation, penance, orders, marriage, eucharist, and extreme unction, as also about ecclesiastical ceremonies, and the honour and worship of the virgin Mary and the saints, also of the mass, and its efficacy; where Catherine Cawches, and her two daughters, Perotine and Guillemine, being called together, and separately, according to law; and although often desired and exhorted to confess their faults and ask pardon, yet they obstinately denied whatever they had formerly said vilely and dishonestly against the catholic faith, the sacraments of the church, and other ecclesiastical ceremonies; wherefore their denial, attestation, and deposition, being heard, and we seeing, considering, and well weighing the evidence against them; as also the opinions of the curates and vicars there assisting, have found and do declare the said Catherine and Perotine, as also Guillemine, to be guilty of heresy; wherefore we command them back from whence they came."

Thomas le Coll,
John Alles,
William Panquet,

Peter Tardise,
John Manatiel.

When this was done, the king's officers were commanded to go to the castle to fetch the said women, to hear the sentence against them in the presence aforesaid. And they appearing before them, said in the ears of all the auditory, that they would see their accusers, and know them that have deposed against them, because they might make answers to their sayings and personages, and to have their libel accordingly; for they knew that they had not offended the majesties of the king and queen, nor of the church, but intirely would obey, serve, and keep the ordinances of the king and queen, and of the church, as all good and true subjects are bound to do. And for any breach of the king's and queen's laws that they had done, they required justice. Notwithstanding all which their reasons and allegations, the said poor women were condemned, and adjudged to be burnt until they were consumed to ashes, according to a sentence given by Elier Goffelin, bailiff: of which sentence the substance here followeth:

"Catherine Cawches, Perotine Massey, and Guillemine Gilbert, are all condemned and judged this day to be burned, until they be consumed to ashes in the place accustomed, with the confiscation of all their goods, moveables and heritages, to be in the hands of the king and queen's majesties, according and after the effect of a sentence delivered in justice by the dean and the curates, the 17th day of July, 1556, in which they have been approved heretics." In the presence of Thomas Devicke, Pierres Martin, Nicholas Cary, John Blundel, Nicholas Devise, John le Merchant, &c. jurates.

After which sentence pronounced, the said women appealed to the king and queen, and their honourable council, saying, That against reason and right they were condemned, and for that cause they made their appeal; notwithstanding they could not be heard, but were delivered by the said bailiff to the king and queen's officers, to see the execution done on them according to the said sentence.

The time then being come when these innocents should suffer, in the place where they should consummate their martyrdom were three stakes set up. At the middle post was the mother, the eldest daughter on the right hand, the youngest on the other. They were first strangled, but the rope brake before they were dead, and so the poor women fell into the fire. Perotine, who was then great with child, did fall on her side, where happened a rueful sight, not only to the eyes of all that stood there, but also to the ears of all true-hearted christians that shall read this history. For as the belly of the woman burst asunder by the vehemency of the flame, the infant, being a fair man-child, fell into the fire, and being immediately taken out by one W. House, was laid upon the grass.

Then was the child carried to the provost, and from him to the bailiff, who gave order, that it should be carried back again and cast into the fire. And so the infant baptized in his own blood, to fill up the number of God's innocent saints, was both born and died a martyr, leaving behind to the world, which it never saw, a spectacle wherein the whole world may see the Herodian cruelty of this graceless generation of popish tormentors, to their perpetual shame and infamy.

Now forsomuch as this story, perhaps for the horrible strangeness of the fact, will be hardly believed by some, but rather thought to be forged, or else more amplified by me than truth will bear me out, therefore to discharge my credit herein, I have not only foretold thee a little before, how I received this story by the faithful relation both of the French and English, of them which were there present witnesses and lookers on, but also have hitherto annexed the true supplication of the said inhabitants of Guernsey, and of the brother of the said two sisters, complaining to the queen and her commissioners, concerning the horribleness of the act; which supplication for the more evidence, hereunder followeth.

To the Right Honourable the Queen's most gracious Commissioners, for the bearing and determining of Matters of Religion, and Causes Ecclesiastical.

MOST lamentably and wofully complaining, sheweth unto your gracious and honourable lordships, your poor and humble orator Matthew Cawches, of the isle of Guernsey, that where James Amy, clerk, dean of the isle aforesaid, assisted by the curates there, against all order, law, and reason, by colour of a sentence of heresy, pronounced against Catherine Cawches, the sister of your honours said supplicant, and Perotine and Guillemine her two daughters, did cause the said Catherine, being a poor widow, and her said two daughters, most cruelly to be burned, although the said persons, nor any of them, did hold, maintain, or defend any thing directly against the ecclesiastical laws then in place, under the reign of the late queen Mary, but in all things submitted themselves obediently to the laws then in force: and yet the cruelty of the said dean and his accomplices, in perpetrating such murder as aforesaid, raged so far, that whereas, whilst the said persons did consume with violent fire, the womb of the said Perotine being burnt, there did issue from her a goodly man-child, which by the officers was taken up and handled, and after in a most despitel manner thrown into the fire, and there also with the innocent mother cruelly burnt: in tender consideration whereof, and forasmuch as this bloody murder was not in due form of any law, or in any manner according to justice, but of mere malicious hatred, as the true copy of the whole proceeding in this matter, by the said dean and his accomplices, here ready to be shewed to your honours, will make very plain and manifest: may it therefore please your good and gracious lordships, of the zeal that you bear to justice, and for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake, to have due consideration in justice of such horrible murder, so crully committed as aforesaid, according to the right demerit thereof. And that it may please your honourable lordships to order and decree also, that all the goods of the said parties, by pretence aforesaid wrongfully taken as confiscate, may be delivered to your said poor beseecher, to whom of right they do belong. And your honours' said suppliant will daily pray to God for your long preservation, to his glory, and your everlasting health.

This supplication being presented in manner aforesaid to the queen's honourable commissioners, in the year 1562, such order therein was taken, that the matter being returned again down to the said country, further to be examined, the dean was committed to prison, and dispossessed of all his livings. So that in conclusion, both he, and all other partakers of that bloody murder, whether of conscience, or for fear of the law, were driven to acknowledge their trespasss, and to submit themselves to the queen's mercy. The tenor of whose several submissions, as they are left in the Rolls, I thought proper here to publish to the world, for a memorial of the truth of this story.

ELIER GOSSELINE, of the parish of St. Peter le Port, in Guernsey, merchant, Nicholas Cary, the elder, John Merchant, Peter Bonamy, of the parish of St. Martin, and Nicholas Martin, son of John, having humbly submitted themselves to the queen's most excellent majesty, acknowledging their erroneous judgments, as well against Catherine Cawches, and Guillemine and Perotine her two daughters, and the infant of the said Perotine, executed by fire for supposed heresy, as also for the acquitting of Nicholas Norman, a wilful murderer, and other matters contained in their several submissions; pray the pardon of the queen's majesty for the said crimes and others committed in their several submissions.

John Blundel, the elder, of the parish of St. Saviour, within the isle of Guernsey, upon like submission, and acknowledging of his offence, prayeth like grace and pardon for his consent given to the execution of the said three women.

Richard Devicke, of the parish of St. Peter le Port, merchant, prayeth like grace and pardon for his consent and judgment given for the acquitting of the said Norman, according to his supplication and submission late presented by Peter Bonamy, the same Devicke, and Peter Pelley, of the parish of St. Peter le Port, merchant.

The said Peter Pelley prayeth the benefit of the said pardon to be extended unto him, according to his submission in the said supplication.

James Amy, clerk, prayeth the benefit of the said pardon for his sentence with the clergy against the said women, according to his submission.

Thomas Effart, of the parish of St. Peter le Port, humbly prayeth, as procurator lawfully constituted by the chapter, bailiff, and jurates, that the same pardon may extend to acquit all the inhabitants of the said isle of their arrears, &c.

The Copy of the Queen's Pardon to them of Guernsey.

THE Queen, to all un'o whom these presents shall come, greeting. Be it known unto you, that We of Our special favour, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have pardoned, remitted, and forgiven; and for Us, Our heirs, and successors, by these presents do pardon, remit, and forgive, Elier Gosseline, of the parish of St. Peter's Port, within the said island of Guernsey, merchant; John Blundel, the elder, of the parish of St. Saviour, in the aforesaid island of Guernsey, merchant; Nicholas Cary, the elder, of the aforesaid parish of St. Peter's Port, within the said isle of Guernsey, merchant; John Merchant, of the said parish and island, gentleman; Nicholas Martin, son of John, of the said parish of St. Peter's Port, within the aforesaid island of Guernsey, merchant; Richard Devicke, of the said Parish of St. Peter's Port, within the aforesaid island of Guernsey, merchant; Peter Pelley, of the said parish of St. Peter's Port, in the aforesaid island of Guernsey, merchant; and James Amy, of the parish of St. Saviour, within the said island of Guernsey, clerk; and to all of them jointly and separately, whether by any other name or names, surnames or additional name or surname of trades, arts, or places, the same Elier, Nicholas Cary, John, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Peter and James, are known, called, or named, or by any other name, surname, or additional name, or surname of degree, trade, art, or place, any of the said Elier, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard, Peter and James are known, called, or named, or lately were known, called, or named, all and all manner of murder, man-slaughter, felony, and felonious killings of Catherine Cawches, and Guillemine and Perotine, daughters of the said Catherine, of every one of these, and the accessaries of them, and all and singular felonies, insultings, strikings, woundings, burnings, transgressions, offences, riots, routs, unlawful meetings, assemblings, gatherings together, plottings, conspiracies, accessory helps, combinings, procurings, abettings, strengthenings and supportings, concealments, forfeits, contempts, assaultings, neglects, and whatever other evil deeds done appertaining to the murder, man-slaughter, and felonious killing of the aforesaid Catherine, Guillemine, and Perotine, or any of them, in any part or concern by the aforesaid Elier, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, or any one or more of them, by reason, or occasion of the murder, man-slaughter, or felonious killing of the aforesaid, done or practised, and that so fully and intirely, and in so ample a manner and form as if every one of the aforesaid Elier Gosseline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, had separately Our letters patent of pardon.

Also we have pardoned, remitted, and forgiven, and by these presents do pardon, remit, and forgive, for Us, Our heirs and successors, the aforesaid Elier Gosseline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, James Amy, and every one of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, their neglects, all and all manner of incroachments, breakings and enterings, by all or some of them, or by the proxies, agents or ministers of all or any of them, in all and singular our manors, lands, tenements, possessions, and hereditaments whatsoever, and wheresoever lying within the aforesaid island of Guernsey, lately chauntries, guilds, cloisters or colleges of Our's, or any one or more of Our predecessors, before the 17th of November, in the first year of Our reign, done, performed or committed; and all and singular debts, returns, accompts, arrears, collections, receivings, detainings, and duties of grain, and other returns, outgoings, or profits whatsoever, to Us or any one of Our predecessors for the said said chauntries, guilds, cloisters or colleges, one or all of them, in whatever manner before the aforesaid 17th day of November, in the first year of Our reign, owing, belonging, or appertaining.

We have pardoned, remitted and forgiven, and of Our special favour, certain knowledge, and mere motion to the aforesaid, for Us, Our heirs and successors, by these presents do pardon, remit and forgive the aforesaid Elier Gosseline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, and Richard Devicke, and each of them, the freedom, flight, escape, and restoring to his liberty Nicholas Norman, lately of the parish of St. Saviour within the aforesaid island, yeoman, of man-slaughter or murder lately judged, attainted and convicted, being for the killing or murdering of John Breghault, of the said parish of St. Saviour, within the island aforesaid, husbandman, but all and all manner of felonies, crimes, offences, punishments, deaths, penalties, forfeits, contempts, neglects, ignorance, and other faults and offences whatsoever, touching or in any manner concerning the aforesaid escape, flight, and setting at liberty of the aforesaid Nicholas Norman, by the aforesaid Elier Gosseline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, and Richard Devicke, or any one or more of them, before this present day, after what manner soever practised, done, committed or happened.

Also, We have pardoned, remitted, and forgiven, and by these presents, of Our certain knowledge and mere motion, for Us, Our heirs and successors, do pardon, remit, and forgive the aforesaid Elier Gosseline, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, all and all manner of riots, routs, unlawful meeting, and gatherings together to the disturbance of Our peace, by the aforesaid Elier, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, or any one or more of them before this in whatsoever manner within the aforesaid island, practised, committed, done, or perpetrated, &c.

THUS have you the true narration of this history, discoursed without corrupting or falsifying any part or sentence thereof, no less faithfully on my part reported, than I received of them, who dwelling in the same isle, and being present the same time, were best acquainted with the matter, and have given sufficient evidence not only to me, but also to the queen's highness's commissioners, concerning the same, as both by the letter of the bailiff, by the sentence of the dean, by the supplication of the plaintiff, and submission of the parties, and likewise by the queen's pardon granted unto them, may well appear.

By all which proofs and circumstances thus debated, it remaineth manifest for all men to perceive, what cruelty and wrong was wrought against these poor women above specified, and no less matter offered, in a case so unjust, justly to expostulate, or rather to wonder at the hard hearts of these men, but especially of the Romish clergy of Guernsey, who professing the gospel of peace and charity, should after the example of Christ, walk in the steps of meekness and mercy, and yet contrary, not only to all christian charity and good nature, but also against all order of equity or humanity, were so extreme and rigorous to condemn them to the burning fire, under the pretended colour of heresy. Who if they had been heretics indeed, yet mercy would have corrected the error, and saved life: equity would have considered man's frailty and weakness, at least true justice would have heard both the parties advisedly, and also substantially have surveyed the cause, and not have thundered out the sentence of death so hastily as they did: yea, and though they had been heretics indeed, yet true christian charity would have stretched farther, and at least have given them leisure and respite of time to reclaim themselves. But now, what is here to be said? they being no heretics at all, as neither it could then, nor yet can be proved. For if king Edward's religion (which was objected to them) were heresy, yet were they then no heretics, when they revoked the same; and if queen Mary's religion were heresy, then were they much more heretics themselves, who condemned them for heresy.

But most of all we have herein to wonder at Mr. Harding, who in his late Rejoinder, written against the bishop of Salisbury, notwithstanding all these evidences and demonstrations so certain and manifestly appearing, yet goeth about first to deny the story, terming it to be a fable; and afterwards being forced to fly from denying it, to admit the story, he strives to turn it another way; and seeking by all means to clear the clergy from the spot of cruelty, transferreth the whole blame only upon the women that suffered, but principally upon poor Perotine, whom he specially chargeth with two capital crimes, viz. whoredom and murder.

And first, touching his accusation of whoredom, let us hear how he proveth this matter: "Because (saith he) by story it is granted, that she was with child: and yet the historiographer doth not declare (neither durst for shame) who was her husband or father to the child," &c. As though the historiographer, being occupied in setting forth the persecution of God's people, suffering death for the religion and doctrine of Christ, were bound, or had nothing else to do but to play the sumner, and to bring forth who were husbands to their wives, and fathers to their children, which new-found law of history was never required before, nor observed by any writers. If Mr. Harding now shall exact of me, first let him begin with himself, and shew us (as wise as he is) who was his own father, if he can. And yet I think not contrary but his mother was an honest woman. And no less also do I think of this Perotine aforesaid; whereof more shall be said (God willing) hereafter.

But in the mean time here cometh in the cavilling objection of Mr. Harding, who beareth the reader in hand, as though "for shame I durst not, or of purpose would not express it," &c. My answer whereunto is this: First, To express every minute of matter in every story occurrent, what story-writer in the world is able to perform it? Secondly, Although it might be done, what reasonable reader will require it? Thirdly, Albeit some curious readers would so require it, yet I suppose it neither requisite nor convenient to be observed. And, fourthly, What if it were not remembered by the author? what if it were to him unknown? what if it were of purpose omitted, as a matter not material to the purpose? Many other causes besides might incur, which the reader knoweth not of. And shall it then by and by be imputed to shame, whatsoever in every narration is not expressed? or doth Mr. Harding himself, in all his sermons, never omit any thing that might conveniently be inferred? Who was the husband of this Perotine, the historiographer hath not expressed, I grant: and what thereof? Ergo, thereupon concludeth he, That for shame I durst not. Nay, I may marvel rather, that he durst not for shame utter such untidy arguments, or so asseverantly pronounce of another man's mind and purpose, which is as privy to him, as then it was to me unknown what was her husband's name. And though it had been known, what was that material in the story to be uttered? or what had it relieved the cruel parts of them, who burned both the mother and infant together, though the infant's father had been expressed? And how then did I for shame conceal that which was not in my knowledge at that time (if I would) to express, nor in my suspicion to misdeem?

Nevertheless, if he be so greatly desirous (as he pretendeth) to know of me who was this infant's father, I will not stick with Mr. Harding, although I cannot swear for the matter, yet to take so much pain for his pleasure to go as near as I may. For precisely and determinately to point out the right father, either of this or any child, I suppose, neither will Mr. Harding require it of me, neither is he able peradventure himself, being asked, to demonstrate his own. And yet, as much as I may, to satisfy his dainty desire herein, and partly to help the innocency of the woman concerning this demand, demand, Who should be the infant's father? Who, say I, but his own mother's husband: the name of which husband was David Jores, a minister, and married to the said Perotine, in king Edward's time, in the church of our Lady's Castle parish, at Guernsey; the party which married them being named Mr. Noel Regner, a Frenchman, and yet alive, witness hereunto, and now dwelling in London, in St. Martins-le-grand.

Thus then, after my knowledge, I have shewed forth, for Mr. Harding's pleasure, the right husband of this Perotine, and what was his name, who was also alive, his wife being great with child, and partaker of the persecution of the same time, and a schoolmaster afterwards in Normandy, &c. Now if Mr. Harding can take any such advantage hereof to disprove what I have said, or be so privy to the begetting of this child, that he can prove the said David Jores, who was the right husband to this wife, not to be the right father to this infant, let him shew herein his cunning by what mighty demonstrations he can induce us to think the contrary; and as I shall see his reason, I shall shape him an answer in such sort (I trust) that he will perceive, that whoredom, wheresoever I may know it, shall find no support by me; I wish it might find as little amongst the chaste catholics of Mr. Harding's church.

From this I proceed to the second part of his infamous accusation, wherein he chargeth her of murder. A strange case, that she which was murdered herself with her child, and died before him, should yet be accused to murder the child. Murder, doubtless, is an horrible iniquity in any person; but the mother to be the murderer of her own infant, is a double abomination, and more than a monster, so far disagreeing from all nature, that it is not lightly to be surmised of any one, without vehement causes of manifest probation.

Wherefore to try out this matter more thoroughly, touching this murdering mother, let us see, First, What hand did she lay upon the child? None. What weapon had she? None. Did she then drown it, or cast it into some pond, as we read of the strumpets at Rome, whose children's heads were taken up in pope Gregory's mote by hundreds, when priests began first to be restrained of lawful wedlock? Or else did she throw it by the walls into some private corner, as I am credibly certified, that in the eighth year of queen Elizabeth, certain scalps and other young infants' bones were found and taken out with a stick in the hole of a stone wall, in Lenton Abbey, by certain gentlemen within the county of Nottingham, James Baruffe, Richard Loveit, and W. Lovelace, walking in the prior chamber; witness the said W. Lovelace, with others who saw the bones aforesaid? Or otherwise, did she take any hurtful drink to poison the child within her, as commonly it is reported few nunneries to have been in England, wherein such a tree hath not been growing within their ground, meet for practising of such a purpose? Neither so, nor so. What then? did she purposely and wittingly thrust herself into jeopardy, to the destruction of her child, when she needed not, as Pope Joan, when she might have kept her bed, would needs adventure forth in procession, where both she and her infant perished in the open street?

Well, then, thus much by this hitherto alledged and granted, we have gotten this woman here to be accused of murdering her own child, who neither laid hand upon it, nor used weapon against it; neither used any other practice in drowning, hanging, breaking, burying, poisoning, or any other wilful means, whereby to destroy it. And how then? By what manner of way was this woman a murderer of her young babe? Forsooth (saith Mr. Harding) when she was accused and condemned to be burnt, she did not claim the benefit of her belly, whereby the life both of herself for the time might have been delayed, and the child preserved.

Whether she did or no, I have not perfectly to say; no more, I suppose, hath Mr. Harding. However, this is certain, and by witness known, that she uttered no less to her spiritual father in confession. And what if she had opened the same to the judges? They would (saith he) have spared her life for the time, and so the innocent had been preserved. And how is Mr. Harding sure of this, more than was the life spared of the young lady, and sometime the mistress, of Mr. Harding, who suffered notwithstanding she was reported of some to be with child; because the law (saith he) is beneficial to women in her case, claiming the benefit thereof.

The law so giveth, I grant. But it followeth not therefore, whatsoever the law giveth or prescribeth, the same to be put in execution.

But many times the law goeth as it pleaseth them which have the handling of the law. As for example; the law willeth none to be condemned by sentence of death for heresy, which the first time revoke their opinion, and yet contrary to this law, they condemned her unlawfully. Again, the like law, none to be executed for heresy, before the writ be sent down De Comburendo, and yet contrary to this law, without any such writ, as far as I yet understand, they burnt her most cruelly. And what law then was here to be looked for of these men, who in their doings herein seemed neither to observe law, nor to regard honesty, nor much to care for charity? And although she had claimed ever so much the privilege of the law, what had that availed with those men, whose hunting altogether (as by their own proceedings may appear) seemed to be for the household goods of these unfortunate women, which after their death they immediately incroached into their own hands.

But be it admitted, that she neither demanded this benefit of the law, nor that the judges would ever have denied her if she had so done; yet it had been the part of a grave accuser, before he had descended into such a railing action of murder against a poor woman now dead and gone, first to have advised wisely with himself whether it might be, that she had no such intelligence what benefit the law would have given, in case it had been required. For not unlike it is, and well may be thought, rather yea than no, that the simple woman, brought up all her life-time in her mother's house, in an obscure island, and in such an out-corner of the realm, far off from the court, and practice of English laws, never heard before of any such benefit of the law; and therefore, upon mere simplicity, and for want of skill, required it not, because she knew not what to require. Peradventure also her senses might be so astonished with the greatness and suddenness of the fear, that it was out of her remembrance. Certainly it had been the duty of the judges, who knew the law, and could not be ignorant of her case, to have questioned her thereof, and to have helped her simplicity in that behalf. Or, at least, if they had disdained, yet it had been the priest's part, as her spiritual father, and privy thereunto, either to have instructed her, or to have staid the execution of her death, in order to preserve the child.

But Mr. Harding denieth all this; and, to aggravate the matter, inferreth, that she not of any simple unskillfulness of the law, "but only of mere wilfulness, for avoiding of worldly shame, concealed her turpitude, and so became a murderer of her babe," &c. These are the words of Mr. Harding, written by him not of any sure ground, but only upon his catholic conjecture; for other demonstration certainly to prove this true, he bringeth none. Wherefore, to answer conjecture by conjecture, thus I reply to him again: That in case she had been asked the question by the judges and inquisitors, whether she had been with child, and then denied the same; or if she, by any other colourable means, had cloaked her being pregnant, whereby it should not appear, this accuser might have spoken probable advantage against her. Now, as she was never demanded of their parts any such question, nor did ever deny any such matter; so to answer this man with as good probability, I hold, that in case they had required that matter of her, she would never have denied it. And therefore whereas she is accused for her not uttering of her being with child; why may she not, not, by as good reason, again be defended for not denying the same?

But she should have uttered it, saith he. It had been well done, said I; and I would she had: but yet that is not the question between him and me, what she should have done, but why she did it not. Mr. Harding, wandering in his blind surmises, fancieth the cause only to be, "for hiding her dishonesty, and for that she would not shame the gospel." To this effect tendeth all his accusation.

Perotine being big with child, at her condemnation did not shew it to the judges:

Therefore, she did it to conceal her turpitude, and because she would not shame the gospel.

But here this accuser must understand, if he has not forgot his logic, that such arguments which do truly hold a signis, do always presuppose, that the signs which go before the things signified, must be necessary, perpetual, and firm, as is between causes natural and their effects. Otherwise, if the signs be doubtful, voluntary, or accidental, there is no firm consequent can proceed therefrom.

Now, if the said accuser should be put to his proof, how to justify his sequel to be true by evident demonstration, that she did it only for covering her dishonesty, I suppose verily he should be found to say more than he is able to make good, and in conclusion should be brought into the like case as were the pharisees, who coming to accuse the adulterers before Christ, went away mute, with as much shame out of the temple, as the woman came in, having not one word to answer. For a man to pronounce assuredly upon the secret thought and intent, either of man or woman, farther than by utterance of speech is to him signified, passeth his capacity, and is to be left only to him, who is a God searching the heart and the reins.

But forasmuch as Mr. Harding worketh, as I said, by surmises, confirming every thing to the worst, let us see what may be surmised as much to the contrary, concerning the quality of this surmised murder; wherein divers things are to be considered, as hereunder followeth.

The first conjecture is this, That such manner of women, who for worldly shame are disposed to murder their children, have other ways to compass that wickedness, than by keeping silence. Now, concerning Perotine's going to be burnt, neither could this silence save her; if she would, from worldly shame; nor is it to be thought any such intent ever to be in her, as to murder her child; as appeared in her mother's house, where if she had continued her time out, she intended no less but honestly to be brought to bed, and to nurse her child, not caring for the shame of the world, nor fearing any slander to the gospel. Whereby may be urged that no intent of murder was ever in her thought.

For how is it likely that she, who had gone so long with child, almost to the full time of her deliverance, and never thought nor wrought any hurt to the infant all that time, should now, going to her death, mind more hurt to her child, than she did before, hoping herself to live?

Secondly, How knoweth Mr. Harding to the contrary, but that she was known in the town to be with child, and went boldly abroad without note of any shame, before the time she came in trouble? Which being true, shame then could be no cause why she should conceal her child more after condemnation than she did before she was condemned.

Thirdly, Admit the case it was not known before, what advantage thereby should arise to her, being appointed to die, by concealing her being pregnant? She should have avoided (saith Mr. Harding) the public shame and slander of the world, in that none should have known her to be with child. First, what shame was it for a married wife to be noted to be with child? Again, what profit had that been to her, to avoid the shame and fame of the world, being now condemned to die?

Fourthly, How is it like, that for shame she meant to conceal that from the world, which both knew she should not live in the world, and also should suffer that kind of death whereby her child could not be hidden from the sight of the world, though she had gone about ever so much to conceal it?

Fifthly, How is it to be thought that any woman going to such a sharp punishment of fire to be consumed, would let for any worldly shame to rescue her own life from so bitter a torment, at least so long as she might, beside the safeguard also of her child, if by any means she had known a remedy?

Sixthly, Forasmuch as Mr. Harding doth so heinously charge her with the wilful murdering of her own natural child, let all indifferent consciences consider this, what was the cause that moved her so willingly to recant as she did, but partly to save her own life, and especially the poor innocent. Whereby it is manifest to be understood, what a motherly affection she had to save her infant, if the father of the spirituality had not been so cruel, against all order of law, to cast both her and her child away, notwithstanding her said recantation.

Seventhly and lastly, When Mr. Harding hath inveighed all he can against this poor woman, yet it is all the same but a bye-matter from this principal purpose pretended, supposing thereby, through his depraving of her, to justify and excuse the pope's holy clergy, who wrought her death. Which will not be: for whatsoever her life was besides, yet forasmuch as the cause of her death and condemnation was neither for theft, whoredom, nor murder, but only and merely for religion, which deserved no death; I therefore having in my story no further to deal, as I said before, so do I say again, that the cause of her condemnation was wrongful, her death was cruel, the sight of the babe rueful, and the proceeding of the judges unlawful: the whole story is pitiful; and the priests and clergy were the principal authors. All which being considered and well expended, I trust Mr. Harding may stand well contented: or, if he thinks murder to be a thing which ought not to be lightly passed over, let him then find out murder where it is, and tell us truly, without affection of partiality, where the true murder lieth, whether in the poor woman, who, with her child, was murdered, or in them, who, without all law and conscience, brought them both to death.

Briefly and finally to conclude with this man, whatsoever the woman was, she is now gone. To bite so bitterly against the dead, is little honesty. And tho' the accusation had in it some truth, yet this accusation here needed not. The same being false, is too unmerciful: at least, being doubtful, and unknown to him, charity would have judged the best; humanity would have spared the dead, and if he could not afford her his good word, yet he might have left her cause unto the Lord, who shall judge both her and him. To pray for the dead he findeth in his mass, but to backbite the dead, he neither findeth in his mass, mattins, nor even-song: and no doubt but in his Dirige and commendations he commendeth many a one, less deserving to be commended than this woman, let catholic affection be set aside. And though the merits of her cause deserved not his commendations, yet she never deserved at Mr. Harding's hand such unmerciful treatment after her departure. Cruelty she suffered enough alive, without Mr. Harding adding to her former afflictions: notwithstanding he hurteth not her, but himself; nor staineth her honesty so much as he blemisheth his own. It hath been the manner of learned men, in time past, ever to be more ready with their defending oration, than to accuse. If they did at any time accuse, it was when forced: neither did they accuse any but such as were alive, and then only in such matters where either the common-wealth or themselves were vehemently affected.

Now if this grieve him so greatly, because in my story I have termed her to be a martyr, let him consider the cause wherefore she suffered, being neither for felony, murder, nor whoredom, but only for the religion religion in king Edward's time received; and when he hath confuted that religion, I shall cross her out of the book and fellowship of martyrs. In the mean time, my exhortation to Mr. Harding shall be this:

First, That if he must needs become a writer in these furious and outrageous days of ours, he will season his vein of writings with more mildness and charity, and not give such example of railing to others.

Secondly, That he will moderate his judging and condemning of others with more equity and indifferency; and not be so rash and partial. For if she be accounted a murderer, who so carefully went about, by recantation, to save both herself and child from the fire; what is to be said of them who so cruelly condemned her, and caused both her and her infant to be burned, although she had (as I said) recanted. Yet so partial is he, that in all this invective, crying out so intemperately against the woman and child that were burned, he spake never a word of their condemners and true murderers indeed.

Thirdly, Forasmuch as Mr. Harding is here in hand with infanticide, and casting away young children's lives, I would wish, that as he hath sifted the doings of this woman to the uttermost, who was murdered, instead of being a murderer; he would look with an indifferent eye on the other side, upon them of his own clergy, and see what he could find amongst those wilful contemners of immaculate marriage. I do not accuse any of incontinency whose lives I know not; but there is one above that well knoweth and seeth all things, be they ever so secret to man, and most certainly at length will pay home with fire and brimstone, when he seeth his time.

I say no more, and not so much as I might, following herein the painters, who when their colours will not serve to express a thing that they mean, shadow it with a veil. But howsoever the matter goeth with them, whether they may or may not be suspected touching this crime aforesaid of infanticide; most sure and manifest it is that they are more than worthily to be accused of homicide in murdering the children and servants of God, both men and women, wives and maids, old and young, blind and lame, mad and unmad, discreet and simple innocents, learned and unlearned, and that of all degrees, from the high archbishop to the clerk and sexton of the church, and that most wrongfully and wilfully, with such effusion of innocent christian blood, as crieth up daily to God for vengeance.

And therefore Mr. Harding, in my mind, should do well to spare a little time from his invectives, wherewith he impeacheth the poor protestants of murder, whom they have murdered themselves, and exercise his pen with more fruitful matter, to exhort these spiritual fathers first to cease from murdering their own children, to spare the blood of innocents, and not to persecute Christ so cruelly in his members as they do: and furthermore, to exhort in like manner these Agamists, and wilful rejecters of matrimony, to take themselves to lawful wives, and not to resist God's holy ordinance, nor encounter his institution with another contrary institution of their own devising, lest perhaps they being prevented by fragility, may fall into danger of such inconveniences above hinted; which if they be not in them I shall be glad; but if they be, it is not their railing against the poor protestants, nor yet their secret auricular confession, that shall cover their iniquities from the face of the Lord, when he shall come to reveal the hidden things of darkness, and judge the world by fire.

And thus, for lack of further leisure, I end with Mr. Harding; having no more at this time to say unto him, but with him to fear God, to embrace his truth, to remember himself, and to cease from this uncharitable railing, especially against the dead, which cannot answer him; or if he will needs continue still to be such a vehement accuser of others, yet that he will remember what belongeth to the part of a right accuser: First, That his accusation be true; Secondly,

That no blind affection of partiality be mixed with it; Thirdly, Whosoever taketh upon him to carp at, and impeach the crimes of others, ought themselves to be sincere and upright, and to see what may be written in their own foreheads.

Whoredom and murder are grievous offences, and worthy to be accused: but to accuse of murder the parties that were murdered, and to leave the other persons untouched that were the true murderers, is the part of an accuser, who deserveth himself to be accused of partiality.

As verily I think by this woman, that if she had been a catholic papist, and a devout follower of their church, as she was a protestant, she had neither been condemned by them alive, nor accused by Mr. Harding when dead. But God forgive him, and make him a good man, if it be his will.

An Account of three MARTYRS, burnt at GREENSTEAD, in SUSSEX.

NEAR about the same time that these three women, and the infant, were burnt at Guernsey, suffered three likewise at Greenstead, in Sussex, two men and one woman; the names of whom were Thomas Dungate, John Foreman, and Mother Tree, who for righteousness' sake gave themselves to death and torments of the fire, patiently abiding what the furious rage of man could say or work against them, ending their lives at the said town of Greenstead, on the 18th of July, and in the year aforesaid.

An Account of the Martyrdom of THOMAS MOOR, in the Town of Leicester, June 26, 1556.

AS the bloody rage of this persecution spared neither man, woman, nor child, wife nor maid, lame nor blind, and as there was no difference either of age or sex considered, so neither was there any condition or quality respected of any person; but whosoever he were that held not as they did on the pope and the sacrament of the altar, were he learned or unlearned, wife, simple, or innocent, all went to the fire; as may appear by this simple poor creature and innocent poor soul, named Thomas Moor, retained as a servant in the town of Leicester, about 24 years of age, and after the manner of a husbandman; who, for speaking certain words, that his Maker was in heaven, and not in the pyx, was thereupon apprehended in the country, being with his friends. Who coming before his ordinary, was first asked, Whether he did not believe his Maker to be there, pointing to the high altar. Which he denied.

How then, said the bishop, dost thou believe?

The young man answered, As my creed doth teach me.

Then said the bishop, And what is yonder that thou seest above the altar?

He answered, Forsooth, I cannot tell what you would have me to see. I see there fine clothes, with golden tassels, and other gay matters hanging about the pyx: what is within I cannot see.

Why, dost thou not believe, said the bishop, Christ to be there, flesh, blood, and bone?

No, that I do not, said he.

Whereupon the ordinary making short with him, read the sentence, and so condemned the faithful servant of Christ to death in St. Margaret's church in Leicester; who was burnt, and suffered a joyful and glorious martyrdom for the testimony of righteousness, in the same town, about the 26th day of June, 1556.

To this Thomas Moor, we have also annexed the examination and answers of one John Jackson, before Dr. Cook, one of the commissioners, for it belongeth near unto the same time:

FIRST, when I came before him, he railed on me, and called me heretic.

I answered and said, I am no heretic.

Cook. Yes, thou art. For Mr. Read told me, that thou wert the rankest heretic of all of them in the King's Bench.

Jackson. I know him not.

Cook. No? Yes, he examined thee at the King's Bench.

Jackson. He examined five others, but not me.

Cook. Then answer me: what sayest thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Tell me.

Jackson. It is a vague question, to ask me at the first setting off.

Cook. What an heretic is this!

Jackson. It is easier to call a man heretic, than to prove him one.

Cook. What church art thou of?

Jackson. What church? I am of the same church that is built on the foundation of the prophets and the apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the head corner-stone.

Cook. Thou art an heretic.

Jackson. How can that be, seeing that I am of that church? I am sure that you will not say that the prophets and apostles were heretics.

Cook. No. But what sayest thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar again? Tell me.

Jackson. I find it not written.

Cook. No? Keeper, away with him.

Yet I tarried there long, and did talk with him; and I said, Sir, I am content to be tractable, and obedient to the word of God.

Dr. Cook answered and said to me, that I knew not what the word of God meant, nor yet whether it were true or not.

Jackson. Yea, that I do.

Cook. Whereby?

Jackson. Hereby, said I. Our Saviour Christ saith, "Search the scriptures; for in them you think to have eternal life. For they be they that testify of me."

Cook. This is a wise proof.

Jackson. Is it so? What say you then to these words that the prophet David said? "Whatsoever he be that feareth the Lord, he will shew him the way that he hath chosen: his soul shall dwell at ease, and his seed shall possess the land. The secrets of the Lord are among them that fear him, and he sheweth them his covenant."

Cook. Well, you shall be rid shortly one way or other.

Jackson. My life lieth not in men's hands, therefore no man shall do more unto me than God will suffer him.

Cook. No? Thou art a stubborn and naughty fellow.

Jackson. You cannot so judge of me, except you did see some evil by me.

Cook. No? Why may not I judge thee, as well as thou and thy fellows judge us, and call us papists?

Jackson. Why, that is no judgment: but Christ saith, "If you refuse me, and receive not my word, you have one that judgeth you. The word that I have spoken unto you now, shall judge you in the last day."

Cook. I pray thee tell me, who is the head of the congregation?

Jackson. Christ is the head.

Cook. But who is head on earth?

Jackson. Christ hath members here on earth.

Cook. Who are they?

Jackson. They that are ruled by the word of God.

Cook. You are a good fellow.

Jackson. I am that I am.

Then Dr. Cook said to my keeper, Have him to prison again.

I am contented with that, said I, and so we departed.

I answer no further in this matter, because I thought he should not have my blood in a corner. But I hope in the living God, that when the time shall come, before the congregation I shall shake their building after another manner of fashion. For they build but upon the sand, and their walls are daubed with untempered mortar, and therefore they cannot stand long.

Therefore, good brothers and sisters, be of good cheer: for I trust in my God, I and my other fellow-prisoners shall go joyfully before you, praising God most heartily, that we are counted worthy to be witnesses of his truth. I pray you accept my simple answer at this time, committing you unto God.

Of this John Jackson, besides these his aforesaid answers and examination before Dr. Cook, one of the commissioners, no more came to our hands.

An Account of the Martyrdom of JOAN WASTE, a blind Woman, in the Town of Derby.

THE first day of August, suffered likewise at the town of Derby, a poor honest woman, being blind from her birth, and unmarried, about the age of 22, named Joan Waste, of the parish of Alhallows. Of them that sat upon this poor woman's blood, the chief was Ralph Blaine, bishop of the diocese, Dr. Draicot, his chancellor, sir John Port, knight, Henry Vernon, esquire, Peter Finch, official of Derby, with the assistance also of divers others, Richard Ward and William Bembridge the same time being bailiffs of the town of Derby, &c.

First, After the above-named bishop and Dr. Draicot had caused the said Joan Waste to be apprehended in the town of Derby, suspecting her to be guilty of certain heresies, she was divers times privily examined, as well in prison as out, by Peter Finch, the official; and after brought to public examination before the bishop: at last, she was burnt in Derby, as above said. Concerning whose life, bringing up, and conversation, somewhat more amply we mind to discourse, as by faithful relation hath come to my hands.

First, This Joan Waste was the daughter of William Waste, an honest poor man, a barber, who sometimes also used to make ropes. His wife had the same Joan and one other at one birth, and she was born blind.

When about twelve or fourteen years old, she learned to knit hose and sleeves, and other things, which in time she could do very well. Furthermore, as time served, she helped her father to turn ropes, and do such other things as she was able, being never idle. Thus she continued with her father and mother during their lives. After whose decease she lived with her brother Roger Waste, and in the time of king Edward the Sixth, of blessed memory, gave herself daily to hear divine service read in the vulgar tongue. And thus by hearing homilies and sermons, she became marvellously well affected to the religion then taught. So at length, having saved so much money as would buy her a New Testament, she caused one to be provided for her. And although she was of herself unlearned, and, by reason of her blindness, unable to read, yet, for the great desire she had to understand, and have imprinted in her memory the sayings of the holy scriptures contained in the New Testament, she acquainted herself chiefly with John Hurt, then prisoner in the common hall of Derby for debt.

The same John Hurt being a grave sober man, of the age of threescore and ten years, by her earnest intreaty, and being a prisoner, and many times idle and without company, did for his exercise daily read unto her some one chapter of the New Testament. If at any time he were otherwise occupied or hindered through sickness, she would repair unto John Pemerton, clerk of the parish church of All Saints, in the same town of Derby, or some other person which could read, and sometimes she would give a penny or two (as she might spare) to such persons as would freely read unto her, appointing unto them beforehand how many chapters of the New Testament they should read, or how often they should repeat one chapter for such a price.

Moreover in the said Joan Waste this was notorious, that she being utterly blind, could notwithstanding, without a guide, go to any church within the said town of Derby, or to any other place or person, with whom she had any such exercise. By which exercise she so profited, that she was able not only to recite many chapters of the New Testament, but also could aptly disprove, by divers places of scriptures, as well sin, as such abuses in religion, as then were too much in use in divers and sundry persons.

As this godly woman thus daily increased in the knowledge of God's holy word, and no less in her life expressed the virtuous fruits and exercise of the same: not long after, through the fatal death of blessed king Edward, followed the woeful ruin of religion in the reign of queen Mary his sister. In which alteration, notwithstanding the general backsliding of the greatest part and multitude of the whole realm into popery again, yet this poor blind woman, continuing in a constant conscience, proceeded still in her former exercise, being both zealous in that she had learned, and also refusing to communicate in religion with those, which taught contrary to that she had before learned in king Edward's time.

For which she was called and convented before the aforesaid bishop and Dr. Draicot, with divers others called in to bear witness.

The articles ministered unto her, and wherewith she was charged, were these: First, that she did hold the sacrament of the altar to be only a memory or representation of Christ's body, and material bread and wine, but not his natural body, unless it were received. And that it ought not to be reserved from time to time over the altar, but immediately to be received, &c.

Item, That she did hold, in receiving of the sacrament of the altar, she did not receive the same body that was born of the virgin Mary, and suffered upon the cross for our redemption, &c.

Item, She did hold, that Christ at his last supper did not bless the bread that he had then in his hands, but was blessed himself, and by the virtue of the words of consecration, the substance of the bread and wine is not converted and turned into the substance of the body and blood of Christ.

Item, That she did grant that she was of the parish of Allhallows, in Derby, &c.

Item, That all and singular the premises are true and notorious by public report and fame, &c.

Whereunto she answered, that she believed therein so much as the holy scripture taught her, and according to that she had heard preached unto her by divers learned men. Whereof some suffered imprisonment, and others suffered death for the same doctrine: among whom she named, besides others, Dr. Taylor, who, she said, took it of his conscience, that the doctrine which he taught was true, and asked them if they would do so in like case for their doctrine: which if they would not, she desired them for God's sake not to trouble her, being a blind, poor, and unlearned woman, with any further talk, saying, that by God's assistance, she was ready to yield up her life in that faith, in such sort as they should appoint.

And yet notwithstanding being pressed by the said bishop and Dr. Draicot, with many arguments of Christ's omnipotence, as, Why was not Christ able as well to make the bread his body, as to turn water into wine, or raise Lazarus from the dead? and such other like arguments; and many times being threatened with grievous imprisonments, torments, and death. The poor woman thus being as it were half astonished through their terrors and threats, and probably desirous to prolong her life, offered to the bishop then present, that if he would before that company, take it upon his conscience, that the doctrine which he would have her to believe concerning the sacrament was true, and that he would at the dreadful day of judgment answer for her therein (as the said Dr. Taylor in divers of his sermons did offer), she would then further answer them.

Whereunto the bishop answered he would. But Dr. Draicot, his chancellor, hearing that, said, My lord, you know not what you do, you may in no case answer for a heretic. And he immediately asked the poor woman whether she would recant or no; she said she should answer for herself. Unto whose sayings the bishop also conformed himself.

The poor woman perceiving this, answered again, that if they refused to take of their conscience that it was true they would have her to believe, she would answer no farther, but desired them to do their pleasure; and so after certain circumstances, they pronounced sentence against her, and delivered her to the bailiffs of the said town of Derby aforesaid; who after they had kept her about a month or five weeks, there came unto them a writ De Heretico Comburendo; by virtue whereof they were appointed by the said bishop to bring her to the parish church of All-Saints at a day appointed, where Dr. Draicot was to make a sermon.

When the time was come that this innocent martyr should suffer, first came to the church Dr. Draicot, accompanied with divers gentleman, as Mr. Thomas Powthread, Mr. Henry Vernon, Mr. Dethick, of Newal, and divers others. This done, and all things now in readiness, at last the poor blind creature and servant of God was brought and set before the pulpit, where the said doctor being entered into his sermon, and there inveighing against many matters, which he called heresies, declared unto the people that that woman was condemned for denying the sacrament of the altar to be the very body and blood of Christ really and substantially, and was thereby cut off from the body of the catholic church; and said, that she was not only blind of her bodily eyes, but also blind in the eyes of her soul. And he said, As her body should be presently consumed with material fire, so her soul should be burned in hell with everlasting fire, as soon as it shall be separated from the body, and there remain world without end; and said it was not lawful for the people to pray for her: and so with many terrible threats he made an end of his sermon, and commanded the bailiffs and those gentleman to see her executed. Then this blessed servant of God was carried away from the church to a place called the Windmill Pit, near to the said town; and holding Roger Waste, her brother, by the hand, she prepared herself, and desired the people to pray with her, and said such prayers as she before had learned, and cried upon Christ to have mercy upon her, as long as life served. In this mean season the said Dr. Draicot went to his inn, for great sorrow of her death, and there laid him down and slept, during all the time of her execution. And thus much of Joan Waste.

Now, forasmuch as I am not ignorant (faithful reader) that this and other stories set forth of the martyrs, will not want carpers and markers enough, ready to seek all holes and corners how to defame the memory of God's good saints, and to condemn these histories as lies and untruths, especially histories wherein they see their shameful acts and unchristian cruelty detected and brought to light; therefore for the better confirmation of this history above written, and to stop the mouths of such persons, this shall be to admonish all and singular readers hereof, that the discourse of this poor blind woman's life and death, in such sort as is above prefixed, hath been confessed to be very true, by divers persons of worthy credit, and yet living; and also hath been carefully perused and examined by W. Bambridge, then bailiff of Derby; who as well of his own knowledge, as by special inquiry and conference by him made, with divers others, hath certified the same to us to be undoubted; beside the testimony of John Cadman, curate of the said town, and of others also, upon whose honesty well known, and their report herein nothing differing from such as were best acquainted with that matter, I have been here the more bold to commit this story to posterity, for all good men to consider and judge upon.

An Account of EDWARD SHARP, JOHN HART, THOMAS RAVENSDALE, a Shoemaker, a Currier, a Carpenter, JOHN HORN, and a Woman.

ON the 8th day of September (which was the next month following) a certain godly, aged, devout person, and zealous of the Lord's glory, born in Wiltshire, named Edward Sharp, of the age of forty years, or thereabouts, was condemned at Bristol to the like martyrdom, where he constantly and manfully persisting in the just quarrel of Christ's gospel, for misliking and renouncing the ordinances of the Romish church; was tried as pure gold, and made a lively sacrifice in the fire: in whose death, as in the death of all his other saints, the Lord be glorified and thanked for his great grace of constancy; to whom be praise for ever, Amen.

On the 24th of the same month, 1556, John Hart, Thomas Ravensdale, a shoemaker, and a currier, suffered at Mayfield in Suffex: who being at the place where they should suffer, after they had made their prayers, and were at the stake ready to undergo the force of the fire, they constantly and joyfully yielded their lives for the testimony of the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ, unto whom be praise for ever and ever, Amen.

The day following, which was the 25th of the said month, a young man, by trade a carpenter, (whose name we have not) was put to death for the like testimony of Jesus Christ, at Bristol, where he yielded himself to the torments of the fire, gave up his life into the hands of the Lord, with such joyful constancy and triumph, as all the church of Christ have just cause to praise God for him.

On the 27th of the same month of September, John Horn and a woman suffered death by fire at Wootton-under-edge in Gloucestershire, and died very gloriously in a constant faith to the terror of the wicked, and comfort of the godly. So gloriously did the Lord work in them, that death unto them was life, and life with a blotted conscience was death.

The unmerciful Handling of WILLIAM DANGERFIELD and JOAN his Wife, being in Child-bed, taken out of her House, with her sucking Infant of fourteen Days old, and laid in the common Gaol among Thieves and Murderers.

WHEN I had written and finished the story of the three Guernsey women, with the young infant there burned with them, and also had passed the burning of the poor blind woman Joan Waste at Derby, I well hoped I should have found no more such stories of unmerciful cruelty shewed upon innocent women with their children and young infants: but now coming to the persecution in Gloucestershire about the parts of Bristol, I find another story of such unmercifulness shewed against a woman in child-bed, as far from all charity and humanity, as any other story that hath hitherto been rehearsed, as by the sequel hereof may appear.

In the parish of Wotton-under-edge, not far from Bristol, dwelt William Dangerfield, an honest poor man, who by his wife Joan had nine children, and she now lying in child-bed of the tenth. This William, after he had been abroad from his house a certain space for fear of persecution, hearing that his wife was brought to bed, repaired home to visit her, as natural duty required, and to see his children, she being delivered four days before.

The return of this man was no sooner known to some of his unkind and uncharitable neighbours, but they incensed with the spirit of popery, immediately beset the house, and apprehended him, and carried him to prison, and so at length he was brought to the bishop, Dr. Brooks, in whose cruel handling he remained so long, till his legs almost were fretted off with irons.

After the apprehension of the husband, the wife likewise was taken, with her young-born child, being but fourteen days old, out of her child-bed, and carried into the common gaol, and there confined among thieves and murderers; where she and her innocent babe found so little charity, that she could never come to any fire, but was driven to warm the clothes that should put about the child in her bosom.

In the mean season, while the husband and wife lay thus inclosed in different prisons, the bishop began to practise not with the woman first, as the serpent did with Eve, but with the man, craftily deceiving his simplicity with fair glossing words, falsely persuading him that his wife had recanted, and asking him, wherefore he should more stand in his own conceit, than she, being as well learned as he; and so subtilly drew out a form of recantation, wherewith he deceived the simple soul. Whereunto after that he had once granted that he would consent, although he had not yet recanted, they suffered him to go to his wife, where she lay in the common gaol.

Then they with melting hearts opening their minds one to another, when he saw his wife not released, and perceiving that he had not done well, he declared unto her the whole matter, how falsely he was circumvented by the subtle flatterings of the bishop, telling him that she had certainly recanted: And thus deceiving me, (said he) brought this unto me, and so plucked out of his bosom the copy of the recantation, whereunto he had granted his promise. At the sight whereof the wife hearing what her husband had done, her heart clave asunder, saying, "Alack, thus long have we continued one, and hath Satan so prevailed, to cause you to break your first vow made to Christ in baptism?" And so parted the said William and Joan his wife, with what hearts the Lord knoweth. Then began he greatly to bewail his promise made to the bishop, and to make his prayer to Almighty God, desiring him that he might not live so long as to call evil good, and good evil; or light darkness, or darkness light; and so he departed toward his house: where by the way homeward (as it is affirmed) he took his death; and shortly after departed, according to his prayer, after he had been in prison twelve weeks.

After this, Joan his wife continued still in prison with her tender infant, till at last she was brought before that bishop to be examined. Whereunto what her answers were, it is not certainly known. Howbeit most like it is, whatsoever they were, they pleased not the bishop, as appeared by his anger increased against the poor woman, and her long continuance in the prison, together with her tender babe, which also remained with her in the gaol, partaker of her martyrdom, so long as her milk would serve to give it suck, till at length the child, being starved for cold and famine, was sent away when it was past all remedy, and so shortly after died: and not long after the mother followed. Besides, the old woman, which was mother of the husband, of the age of eighty years and upward, who being left in the house after their apprehension, for lack of comfort there perished also.

And thus have ye in one story the death of four together; first of the old woman, then of the husband, after that of the innocent child, and lastly of the mother. What became of the other nine children, I am not perfectly sure, but that I partly understand they all were undone by the same.

This story is reported and testified as well by others, as namely by Mrs. Bridges dwelling in the same town, and partaker then of the like afflictions, who hardly escaped with her life.

In the month of October following, was burnt at the town of Northampton a shoemaker, a true witness and disciple of the Lord, who according to the grace of God given unto him, cleaving fast to the sound doctrine and preaching of God's word, renounced the untrue and false coloured religion of the Romish see, wherein many a good man hath been drowned.

After him, not long after, in the same month of October, died also in the castle of Chichester, three godly confessors, being there in bonds for the like cause of Christ's gospel, who also should have suffered the like martyrdom, had not their natural death, or rather (as it is to be suspected) the cruel handling of the papists, made them away before, and afterwards buried them in the fields.

I read moreover, that in this present year, to wit, 1556, one named Hooke, a true witness of the Lord's truth, was burnt at Chester.

An Account of five Persons famished in Canterbury Castle, by the unmerciful Tyranny of the Papists, about the Beginning of November.

AS among all the bishops, Bonner, bishop of London, principally excelled in persecuting the poor members and saints of Christ; so of all archdeacons, Nicholas Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury, (as may evidently appear) was the sorest, and least of compassion, (only Dunning of Norwich excepted) by whose unmerciful and surly disposition very many were put to death in that diocese of Canterbury, not only in the bloody time of queen Mary, but some also in the beginning of the reign of our most renowned and most gracious queen Elizabeth, as by the grace of Christ hereafter shall appear.

Of those that suffered in the diocese of Canterbury in the time of queen Mary, some are recited already, with the order and form of such articles as then were most commonly administered to the examinares by Thornton, suffragan of Dover, and the said Nicholas Harpsfield, and others, as before mentioned.

Now to proceed in order and course of time where we left, next followeth the month of November.

In the beginning whereof, fifteen godly and innocent martyrs were together in the castle of Canterbury, of which number not one escaped with life, but either were burnt, or else famished in prison: of which two sorts, which is the easier death, God knoweth, is hard to judge. Notwithstanding, the truth is, that of these fifteen, ten suffered in the fire, of whom in the next book, more, God willing, shall be said: the other five pined, and were most cruelly famished in the close prison, of whom we shall treat. Their names were as follow; John Clarke, Dunston Chittenden, William Foster, of Stone, Alice Potkins, John Archer, of Crambroke, weaver.

Of these five prisoners, the two first were uncondemned, the other three were condemned, and should have been burned, but suffered no less torments than if they had abode the fire, for they pined to death by famine. What their articles and answers were I need not here recite, seeing all they in the time of queen Mary commonly suffered for one manner of cause, that is, for holding against the seven sacraments, against the reality of Christ's being in his supper, for speaking against the church of Rome, and determinations of the same, against images set up and worshipped in the church, for not coming to church, &c.

First, William Foster answering to these and like articles, said, That he believed well in all the articles of the creed; but to believe that there be more sacraments than two, and to pray to saints either to profit us, or to pray for souls in purgatory to profit by them, that faith and works do justify, or to allow the popish ceremonies in the church, that he denied. Moreover he said, to carry candles upon Candlemas-day, were as good for him as to carry a dung-fork; and that it is as necessary to carry the gallows about, if his father was hanged, as the cross. Come to the church he could not, he said, with a safe conscience. Concerning fish-days and flesh-days, he granted it good to put difference therein, except where necessity required the contrary.

This William Foster was a labouring man, of the age of forty years. He was apprehended and imprisoned by sir Thomas Moyle, knight.

Alice Potkins, for the like confession, was condemned to be burnt, for that she was not, neither would be confessed to the priest, for that she received not the sacrament of the altar, because she would not pray to saints, nor creep to the cross, &c. Being demanded of her age, she said that she was forty-nine years old, according to her old age; and according to her young age, since she learned Christ, she was of one year's age, and was committed to prison by Mr. Roberts.

The answer and confession of John Archer of Crambroke was much in like sort. And although some of these upon ignorant simplicity swerved a little in the number of sacraments, some granting one sacrament, that is, the body of Christ hanging upon the cross, some more, some less, &c. yet in the principal matter concerning the doctrine of salvation for faith to stay upon, and in disagreeing from the dreaming determinations of the popish church, they most agreed. Concerning the not praying to saints, and for the dead in purgatory, for not creeping to the cross, for faith only to justify, for taking of an oath, and other such like, he granted as the other had done. This father Archer, by his occupation a weaver, of the town of Crambroke, of the age of fifty years, was imprisoned by sir John Gilford, knight.

And thus have ye the cause and imprisonment of these five prisoners. Now as touching the cruelty of their death, that ye shall not surmise the suspicion or relation thereof to proceed of myself, you shall hear their own testimony by their own letter, thrown out of the prison, concerning the unmerciful dealing of the popish tyrants in famishing them, as is afore said. The copy of their letter is this.

The Copy of a Letter written and cast out of the Castle of Canterbury by the Prisoners there in Bonds for God's Word, declaring how the Papists went about to famish them to death; of which Company five were already most cruelly famished among them.

BE it known unto all men that shall read, or hear read these our letters, that we the poor prisoners of the castle of Canterbury for God's truth, are kept and lie in cold irons, and our keepers will not suffer any meat to be brought us to comfort us. And if any man do bring us any thing, as bread, butter, cheese, or any other food, the said keeper will so charge them that so bring us any thing, except money or raiment, to carry it them again; or else if he do receive any food of any for us, he doth keep it for himself, and he and his servants do spend it, so that we have nothing thereof; and thus the keeper keepeth away our victuals from us: insomuch that there are four of us prisoners there for God's truth, famished already, and thus is it his mind to famish us all: and we think he is appointed thereunto by the bishops and priests, and also of the justices, so to famish us, and not only us of the said castle, but also all other prisoners in other prisons for the like cause to be also famished: notwithstanding we write not these our letters, with a view to signify our unwillingness to be famished for the Lord Jesus's sake, but for this cause and intent, that they, having no law so to famish us in prison, should not do it privily, but that the murderers' hearts should be openly known to all the world, that all men may know of what church they are, and who is their father. Out of the castle of Canterbury.

THESE aforesaid months of September, November, and December, as they were troublesome to many other places, and especially to the diocese of Canterbury by reason of the archdeacon above named; so likewise they brought no little business in the country to Litchfield and Coventry, by a cruel bishop there, named Ralph Baine, and a more cruel chancellor called Dr. Draicot, Draicot, through the fierce inquisition of whom great stir was there among the people, being called to examination of their faith, and many caused to bear faggots. Who, although they were not put to the torment of death, yet because it may appear what a number there is in the countries of England abroad, who in their hearts have a misliking of the pope's Romish laws and religion, if for fear they durst utter their minds, I thought to make a rehearſal of their names, which in the aforeſaid dioceſe of Coventry and Litchfield were taken on ſuſpicion, and examined for their religion.

And firſt amongſt them that were detected and enjoined to the popiſh penance, that is, to bear a faggot, candle, and beads about in proceſſion, were Agnes Foreman, detected, examined, and by witneſs convicted, and bare a faggot the twelfth of September. Likewise Margery Kirry, Thomas Norris, Thomas Stiffe, William Kaime, Robert Katrenes, Thomas Smith, John Borsley, the younger. Item, John Waterhouſe, againſt whom came as witneſſes and accuſers Richard Caaerbanke, J. Edge, William Smith, Robert Cooke, laying againſt him for ſeldom coming to church, for giving no reverence at the elevation of the ſacrament, but looking upon his book, for not kiſſing the pyx, &c. Robert Biſſel, Leonard Weſt, Richard Bailey, of the pariſh of Whitacre.

Theſe were deprived.

There were divers others beſides theſe, who in like manner were detected, accuſed, and examined, although they bare no faggot, but were diſmiſſed; as Richard Kempe, John Franklin, William Marler, Julius Dudley, Euſtache Byſacre, William Shene, Anthony Afterwhittle, Thomas Steilbe, Henry Birdlim, William Moſeley, John Leach, John Richardson, Anthony Jones, alias Pulton, Thomas Wilſon, Thomas Lynacres, and Hugh Lynacres, his ſon, Iſabel Parker, Martin Newman, William Enderby, Cicely Preſton, Thomas Salter, John Stamford, ſhoemaker, Richard Woodbourne, Thomas Arnal, ſhoemaker, John Robinſon, Hugh Moore, ſhoemaker, John Adale, Thomas Arch, Frances Ward, John Avines, Richard Foxal, Thomas Underdonne, Richard Weaver.

Theſe forenamed perſons, with many more following, in the next year after, although they did ſubſcribe and relent through fear of death; yet for this cauſe I do here recite them, that by them it might appear what a number there were not only in the country of Litchfield, but alſo in other parts, if that fear rather than conſcience had not compelled them to the contrary.

Thus have you the whole perſecution of this year declared, with the names of all them which ſuffered martyrdom within the compaſs of the year 1556: the number of all which, ſlain and martyred in divers places of England at ſundry times this year, came to above 84 perſons, whereof many were women, wives, widows, and maidens; beſides thoſe who by ſecret practices were otherwiſe made away, or driven from their goods out of their houſes, or out of the realm, or elſe within the realm were put to penance and obliged by forcible violence to recant; ſave only that I have omitted the ſtory of ſir John Cheeke, knight, and ſometime ſchool-maſter to king Edward. The worthineſs of which man deſerveth much to be ſaid of him; but his fall ſhould rather be covered in ſilence and oblivion. Only to note a word or two of a few things to the preſent ſtory moſt principally appertaining, it ſhall ſuffice.

Sir John Cheeke being in the country of Germany, out of all danger of perſecution, with many more of his own countrymen and acquaintance, was not only in ſafety, but alſo with reputation accordingly eſteemed among the Germans, and alſo well placed in the city of Straſburg. Where if he had contented himſelf to have remained, rather giving place to time, than to preſume upon adventures, peradventure it had been better for him. But what fatal inſtigatiſon wrought in his mind, I know not. In the end it ſo fell, that he would needs take a journey with ſir Peter Carew, from high Germany to Bruſſels, and that (as I have credibly heard of them which knew the affair) not without the forecaſting of his adventured journey by the conſtellation of the ſtars, and diſpoſition of the heavens above. For as he was a man famously expert, and travelled in the knowledge of ſundry arts and ſciences, ſo was he a little too much addicted to the curious practiſing of this ſtar divinity, which we call aſtrology. But howſoever it was, or whatſoever it was that the ſtars did promiſe him, the truth was, that men here on earth kept little promiſe with him. For having, as it is ſaid, king Philip's ſafe conduct to paſs and repaſs, and by the means, as I find, of the lord Paget, and ſir John Maſ. pledging for his ſafe-guard king Philip's fidelity, he came to Bruſſels to ſee the queen's ambaffadors: and having brought the lord Paget on his way toward England, in the return between Bruſſels and Antwerp, he was taken with ſir Peter Carew by the provost Maſhal, ſpoiled of their horſes, and clapped into a cart, their legs, arms, and bodies tied with halters to the body of the cart, and ſo ſhipped, blind-fold under the hatches, and brought to the Tower of London.

Thus the good man being intrapped, and in the hands now of his enemies, had but one of theſe two ways to take, either to change his religion, or to change his life, other remedy with thoſe holy catholics there was none. Neither could his conſcience excuſe him, nor truth defend him, nor his learning help him.

However Mr. Fecknam, whether ſuborned by the queen, or upon his own devotion and friendſhip toward his old acquaintance, took upon him the defence and commendation of ſir John Cheeke, ſpeaking in his behalf: yet no mercy could be had with the queen, but he muſt needs recant, and ſo he did.

Then after this recantation, he was through the crafty handling of the popiſts, allured firſt to dine and accompany with them, at length unawares to ſit in the place, where the poor martyrs were brought before Bonner and other biſhops to be condemned; the remorse whereof ſo mightily wrought in his heart, that not long after he left this mortal life. Whoſe fall, although it was full of infirmity, yet his riſing again by repentance was great, and his end comfortable, the Lord be praized.

CHAP. I.

The ORDER and MANNER of CARDINAL POOLE'S Visitation in CAMBRIDGE, with the condemning, taking up, and burning the BONES and BOOKS of MARTIN BUCER and PAULUS PHAGIUS, January 9, 1557.

AFTER Cardinal Poole's return to England, about three years, he thought of reforming the university of Cambridge; for which purpose commissioners were appointed as follow, Cuthbert Scot, lately consecrated bishop of Chester, Nicholas Ormanet, an Italian, a favourite of pope Julius III. and the pope's datary, Thomas Watson, the bishop of Lincoln elect, Christopherson, bishop of Chichester elect, and Henry Cole, provost of Eton. January 11, 1557, was the day appointed in citation to Dr. Andrew Pern, the vice-chancellor, between eight and ten o'clock, to assemble in the church of St. Mary the Virgin, requiring him to be there himself in person, and all those who had the custody of any statutes, books, privileges, or monuments of the university, or any of the colleges, to be then and there exhibited; that due measures might be taken, for the benefit of the same.

The citation was first examined and read on the 11th of December, in the convocation house of regents; and on the 24th it was determined, that the university and colleges should defray the visitors' charges, and that no master, fellow, scholar, or minister, should have leave of absence, but to return before the visitation. On the 8th of January, all the arrangements were formed, the high-constables sworn, two persons of every parish of ten or twelve hundreds also sworn to enquire of heresy, conspiracy, sedition, and the like. At this time the university was supposed to be tainted with the doctrines of Martin Bucer, and other favourers of the reformed religion. The inquisitors arrived on the ninth of January, and, being met near the town by several of the masters and presidents of colleges, were introduced into the town, and then to their lodgings; but they all preferred Trinity college, of which the bishop of Chichester elect was master.

An oration was made by a fellow of the same college, expressive of their gratitude for the partiality which was shewn them; and the bishop elect of Lincoln, or as others of Chester, made an appropriate reply. But the two churches of St. Mary's, where Mr. Bucer, and St. Michael's, where Paulus Fagius lay buried, were laid under an interdict. The oration on the 11th was made in Latin in the name of all the rest; in which he compliments Cardinal Poole, as the author of this visitation, and for his gracious condescension in becoming their chancellor, though at that time acting by means of the visitors; afterwards proceeding to state their errors, and their restoration to the catholic church; and concluding with the promise of a perpetual love of the true religion, and an eternal remembrance of the favours to be received from them.

When he had made an end of speaking, the bishop of Chester answered thereunto:

That they took in right good part, that the mother the university had made so open a declaration of her good will toward them: for which he gave most hearty thanks, desiring her to perform in deed, and in her works, the things that she had so largely promised of herself in words and communication.

As concerning their good wills, there was no cause to mistrust. For their coming thither was not to deal any thing thing roughly with such as fell to the amendment: but both the cardinal himself, and they also, were fully minded to shew favour, devising how to bring all things to peace and tranquillity, desiring nothing more earnestly, than that they which have erred and gone astray, should return into the right path again. The right reverend father, the lord cardinal, whom he wished to have been present, wished the self-same thing also, desiring nothing so much as he with his own hands to sustain and hold up, now ready to fall, or rather to raise up already fallen to the ground, the university of his ward: for he gladly taketh upon him the name and duty of her guardian, whom it greatly grieved, that the infections of the time past had spread abroad such grievous diseases, that even the university itself was touched with the contagious air thereof. For he would more gladly have come hither to visit and salute it, than to correct it, if the weighty affairs of the realm would have permitted it. But now seeing he could not so do, he had appointed this commission, in which he had assigned them to be his deputies, which (because they knew him to set so much store by the university) should extend the more favour to it, and (because they themselves had been there brought up) would the more earnestly embrace it. The chief matter that they came for, tended to this end, that such as had erred should confess their faults, and return into the right way again. For they were in great forwardness of healing, that acknowledged themselves to have offended. And therefore it was wisely propounded on his part, that he would not altogether excuse the faults of the university, nor of other men, but confess and acknowledge the crime, as there were many things that had need to be corrected and amended.

The cause why they were sent thither, was to raise up them that were fallen, and to receive into favour such as were sorry and would amend, wherein if (contrary to their expectation) they should not be able to do so much with some men as they would, yet notwithstanding, according to their duty, they would shew themselves so diligent for their part, as that no lack might be found in them. For it was more openly known, than it could be denied, that many men did divers things of a froward wilfulness, and took stoutly upon them: wherewith as they were greatly moved and grieved as reason was, so they coveted to remedy the mischief. Against whom, if any thing should seem hereafter to be straightly determined, it was to be imputed to their own deserts, and not to the wills of them. Neither ought such as are whole and sound, to be moved at the chastisement of others, forasmuch as it pertained not only to the wiping out of the foul blot which now stuck on the university, but also to the health of many others which had taken much hurt by the infection of them. For their own parts, they more inclined unto mercy than rigour. Howbeit, considering that so great diseases could not by gentle medicines be healed, they were driven of necessity to use stronger. And yet if they would be contented to be brought again to their right minds, which thing they chiefly coveted, (for they wished that all should amend and be led by wholesome counsel) and would yet at length wax weary of their errors, and instead of them frequent again the ancient customs of themselves, and of their forefathers, they might boldly look for all kind of humanity and gentleness at their hands, in all this their business of reformation, which they had now entered and begun, requesting no more of the university but to do as became them: which being performed, he promised that their benevolence, neither in any public nor in any private person's case, should in any wise be behind hand.

These things being finished, they were brought in procession to the King's-college, by all the graduates of the university. In this place it was marked, that Nicholas Ormanet, commonly surnamed Datary, (who, although he was inferior in estate unto Chester, being a bishop, yet was superior to them all in authority) while the mass was celebrating, sometimes standing, anon sitting, and afterwards kneeling on his knees, observed certain ceremonies, which afterward were required to be observed of all others.

From thence they all attended upon the legates to St. Mary's church, which we declared before to have been interdicted. In which place, forasmuch as it was suspended, although no mass might be sung, yet there was a sermon made in open audience by Mr. Peacock in the Latin tongue, preaching against heresies and heretics, as Bilney, Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, &c. Which being ended, they immediately proceeded to the visitation: where first Dr. Harvy, did, in the cardinal's name, exhibit the commission to the bishop of Chester, with a few words in Latin. Which being accepted, and by Master Clerk openly read to the end, then the vice-chancellor with an oration did exhibit the certificate under his seal of office with the cardinal's citation annexed, containing every man's name in the university and colleges, with the officers and all masters of houses. Among whom was also Robert Brassey, master of King's-college, a worthy old man, both for his wisdom and his hoary hairs: who hearing his name recited after the vice-chancellor's, said, He was there present as all the others were: nevertheless, forasmuch as the reformation of his house was wholly reserved to the discretion of the bishop of Lincoln, not only by the king's letters patent, but also by grant of confirmation from the bishop of Rome himself, under a penalty if he should suffer any strangers to intermeddle, he openly protested, in discharge of his duty, that unless their commission gave them authority and jurisdiction upon the college, either by express words, or manifest sense, he utterly exempted himself from being present.

This his exception they all took in great displeasure; alledging that they were fully authorized for the order of the matter by the cardinal, out of whose jurisdiction no place nor person was exempted: wherefore he had done evil to call into question their authority, so well known to all men.

After the formal solemnity of these things thus accomplished, the commission being read, and the citation exhibited, all the masters of houses being openly cited, every man for a while departed home to his own house, with command to be at the common schools at one o'clock the same day. When the degrees of the university, called regents and non-regents, were assembled, they spent the rest of the day in reading over the charters granted to the university by kings and princes, in searching out bulls and pardons from the pope, and in perusing other monuments pertaining to the university.

The next day, the 12th of January, they resorted to King's-college to make inquisition, either because the same for the worthiness thereof was chief and sovereign of all the residue, or else because that that house especially had been accounted, time out of mind, never to be without an heretic or two (as they termed them). The order and manner how they would be entertained by every college, when they should come to make inquisition, they themselves appointed, which was in this sort.

They commanded the master of every house, with the residue, as well fellows as scholars, apparelled in priest-like garments (which they call habits), to meet them at the uttermost gate of their house towards the town. The master himself to be dressed in like apparel as the priest when he dresseth himself to mass, saving that he should put on his habit uppermost, as the rest did.

The order of their going they appointed to be in this wise: The master of the house to go foremost; next unto him every man in his order of degree, seniority, or of years. Before the master should be carried a cross, and holy water to sprinkle the commissioners withal, and then after that the said commissioners to be censured. And so after this meeting, and mumbling a few devotions, with this pomp and solemnity they were to be brought to the chapel.

Many thought they took more honour upon them than belonged to the state of man. Others (forasmuch as at that time they not only pretended the jurisdiction of the cardinal, but also represented the power and authority of the bishop of Rome himself, who was accounted to be more than a mortal man) said, It was far less than of duty appertained to his holiness, in that the honour that was done to his legates, was not done to them, but to his holiness.

Now was the hour come, at which they appointed to meet: and being entered the King's-college gate, where they looked for the masters and fellows of the house, seeing no man came to meet them, they proceeded to the church door, where they staid. There perceiving how the master and the rest of the house were dressing themselves as fast as they could, in such order as was appointed before, they came in suddenly upon them, before they had set a foot out of their places.

Then the master first excused himself, that he was ready no sooner, acknowledging that it had been his duty to have been in readiness. Secondly, he said he was very glad of their coming, promising first in own name, and after in the name of all the rest, as much reverence as might be, in all matters concerning their common utility, which he doubted not but should be performed at their hands, according to his expectation. But, like as he had done the other day in St. Mary's church, the same exception he made to them now also; for doing which he besought them not to be offended. Seeing he did it only for the discharge of his duty, he had good cause to be held excused.

He had scarcely finished his tale, but the bishop of Chester, with a frowning look, and an angry countenance, interrupted him in his talk; and said, he needed not to repeat the things he had protested before, nor they to make answer any more to those things wherein they had sufficiently informed him before. He feared that their quarrel was not good, that they made such ado about it, and sought such starting holes. So were diseased persons oftentimes wont to do, when, for the pain and grief, they are not able to abide a strong medicine. As though that any man were able to grant so strong a privilege, as to withstand the pope's authority. As for the pope's letters, he said, they must needs make on his side, and with such as were with him, and could not in any wise be alledged against him. Therefore he admonished him to desist from his unprofitable altercation, and to conform himself, and his, to such things as then were in doing.

After this they went to mass: which finished, with great solemnity, first they went to the high altar of the church, and having there saluted their God, and searching whether all were well about him or no, they walked through all the inner chapels of the church. The church goods, the crosses, the chalices, the mass-books, the vestments, and whatsoever ornaments were besides, were commanded to be brought out unto them. When they had sufficiently viewed all things, and had called forth by name every fellow and scholar of the house, they went to the master's lodging, where first and foremost swearing them upon a book, to answer to all such interrogatories as should be expounded unto them (as far as they knew), they examined first the master himself, and afterward all the residue, every man in his turn. But there were some that refused to take this oath, because they had given their faith to the college before, and also because they thought it against all right and reason to swear against themselves: for it was contrary to all law, that a man should be compelled to bewray himself, and not be suffered to keep his conscience free, when there is no manifest proof to be laid to his charge; but much more unjust it is, that a man should be constrained by force to accuse himself. Nevertheless, these persons also, after such altercation, at length (conditionally, that their faith given before to the college were not impeached thereby) were contented to be sworn.

Three full days lasted the inquisition there. This was now the third day of their coming, and it was thought that the case of Martin Bucer and Phagius was delayed longer than needed: for they looked to have had much wrangling and business about the matter. Now forasmuch as the present state of the case required good deliberation and advice, the vice-chancellor and the masters of the colleges assembled at the common schools, where every man gave his verdict what he thought meet to be done in this matter of Bucer. After much debating, they agreed all together in this determination:

That forasmuch as Martin Bucer, while he lived, had not only sowed pernicious and erroneous doctrine among them, but also had himself been a sectary and famous heretic, erring from the catholic church, and giving others occasion to fall from the same likewise; a supplication should be made to the lords commissioners, in the name of the whole university, that his dead carcase might forthwith be digged up (for so it was needful to be done) to the intent that inquisition might be made as touching his doctrine, which being brought in examination, if it were not found to be good and wholesome, the law might proceed against him: for it was against the rule of the holy canons, that his body should be buried in christian burial. Besides, that it was to the open derogation of God's honour, and the violating of his holy laws, with the great peril of many men's souls, and the offence of the faithful, especially in so difficult and contagious a time as that was. So it was not to be suffered, that they, who utterly dissented from all other men in the trade of their living, laws, and customs, should have any part with them in the honour of burial; and therefore the glory of God, first and before all things, ought to be defended, the infamy (which through this thing riseth on them) with all speed put away, no room at all left unto those persons to rest in, who even in the same places where they lay, were injurious and noisome to the very elements; but the place ought to be purged, and all things so ordered as might be to the satisfying the consciences of the weak. In executing whereof, so notable an example ought to be given to all men, that no man hereafter should be so bold to attempt the like.

They gave the same verdict by common consent against Phagius also.

Unto this writing they annexed another, by which they lawfully authorized Andrew Perne, the vice-chancellor, to be the common factor for the university. He was a man fittest for the purpose, both for the office that he bare, and also because that by the testimony of Mr. Christopherson, he was judged to be the most catholic of all others. This supplication, confirmed by the consent of all the degrees of the university, and signed with their common seal, the next day, which was the 13th day of January, the vice-chancellor put up to the commissioners.

Note here, good reader, what a feat of conveyance this was, to suborn the university under a colourable pretence, to desire this thing of them by way of petition. As much as to say, if they had not done so, the other would never have gone about it of themselves.

But this gloss was soon found out. The commissioners had given the vice-chancellor instructions in writing before. But now peradventure they thought by this means to remove the envy of this act from themselves.

Thus the vice-chancellor came unto the commissioners, according to the appointment made the day before, about seven of the clock in the morning. He had scarce declared the cause of his coming, but that he had not only obtained his suit, but also even at the very same time received the sentence of condemnation, for taking up Bucer and Phagius, fair copied out by Ormanet the datary. This was to be confirmed by the consent of the degrees of the university. Whereupon a solemn convocation, called Congregatio Regentium & non Regentium, for the same purpose was appointed to be at nine of the clock; where the graduates being assembled together, the demand was propounded concerning the condemnation of Bucer and Phagius, and the grace asked, which was this:

Pleaseth it you that Martin Bucer, for the heresies now recited, and many others by him written, preached and taught, wherein he died without repentance, and was buried in christian burial, may be exhumate and taken up again, &c.

Immediately after this grace was granted, the sentence of condemnation being drawn by the datary, was openly read, and another grace asked, that the same might be signed with the common seal. Which request was very easily obtained; and it was no marvel.

For after the death of king Edward, when the realm was governed by queen Mary, all such persons were driven away as had rejected the Romish religion (in whom alone well nigh rested whatsoever wit and learning was in the whole university besides), and such a sort of men were put in their room, that all places now swarmed with unlearned chaplains; to whom nothing was greater pleasure than to cause all men to speak reproachfully of Bucer. Divers were yet left among them to speak against their demands: but they (because it commonly cometh to pass, that might overcomes right) could nothing avail. It is a common custom in all such matters and ordinances, that what the greater number decreeth is published in the name of all: and that which the better part disalloweth seemeth as if no man at all allowed it.

The next day, being the 14th of January, all the visitors (Mr. Christopherson only excepted) came to the King's-college: and first going into the church, there making their prayers at the greesings, they so proceeded into the stalls, sitting all the mass time, the company standing in their copes, and singing a solemn respond in honour of the visitors. After the respond done, the provost made to them his protestation, unto whom the bishop of Chester made answer in Latin, declaring that he could not perceive to what purpose his protestation was, notwithstanding they would accept it and bear with him. Then went they to mass, which ended, the catholic visitors approached up to the altar, and took down the sacrament, and searched the pyx, but first the two bishops censured the sacrament.

Then they went unto the vestry, and opened the chalices, corporas cases, and chrysmatory, and viewed all those things: so returning into the provost's chamber, divided themselves in examination of the provost, vice-provost, and the rest of the company. The same day Dr. Bacon, master of Gonvil-hall, invited the vice-chancellor, Dr. Young, Dr. Harvy, Swineborn, Maptide, with others, home to dinner. These men immediately after dinner, caused the common seal of the university to be put to the aforesaid instrument of condemnation, as was determined the day before by the general consent of the graduates of the university: and afterwards they carried the same to the commissioners to their lodging: which when they had received and carefully perused, it pleased them not in all points, and therefore they razed out some things, some they interlined, others they changed; so that in fine, they were fain to take the pains to ingross it again.

To the signing whereof a congregation was immediately called of all the graduates of the university against the next day, which being read over, a new grace again was asked and granted for setting the seal. Then the graduates were dismissed, and commanded to resort forthwith to St. Mary church, whither the commissioners also repaired. When they had taken their places, Dr. Harvy presented to them, before the company, a new commission to make inquest upon heresy then newly sent from the cardinal, which was immediately read by Ormanet's clerk. This done, Dr. Perne, who was factor for the university, exhibited to the commissioners in the name of the university, the sentence of the aforesaid condemnation. This condemnation being openly read, Dr. Perne desired to send out process to cite Bucer and Phagius to appear, or any other that would take upon them to plead their cause, and to stand to the order of the court against the next Monday: to the intent that when they had exhibited themselves, the court might better determine what ought to be done to them by order of law.

The commissioners condescended to his request, and the next day process went out to cite the offenders. This citation Vincent of Noally, their common notary, having read it over before certain witnesses appointed for that purpose, caused to be fixed up in places convenient, to wit, upon St. Mary's church door, the door of the common schools, and the cross in the market-place of the same town. In this was specified, that whosoever would maintain Bucer and Phagius, or stand in defence of their doctrine, should, at the eighth day of the same month, stand forth before the lords commissioners in St. Mary's church, which was appointed the place of judgment, and there every man should be sufficiently heard what he could say. This commandment was set out with many words.

Shortly after the matter drew toward judgment. Therefore, the day before the limited day, which was the 17th of January, the vice-chancellor called to him to Peter-house (whereof he was master) Dr. Young, Dr. Sedgwick, and with them Bullock, Taylor, Parker, Redman, Whitlock, Mitch, and certain others. These men cast their heads together how they might bear witness against Bucer and Phagius, to convince them of heresy: for seeing the matter was brought in open court, and because it might so come to pass, that some patrons of their cause would come out, they thought it needful to have witnesses to depose of their doctrine. What came of their consultation is unknown.

On the 18th day, the vice-chancellor going to the inquisitors, sitting at the King's-college, put them in remembrance, that that was the day on which, by their process, sent forth the 16th, they had commanded to appear in St. Mary's church, such as would take upon them to defend Bucer and Phagius by the law. He desired therefore that they would vouchsafe to sit there, if perchance any man would try to adventure of the law. They soon condescended thereunto. When the vice-chancellor had brought them thither, he exhibited unto them the process of the citation which he had received of them to publish a little before, saying that he had diligently executed whatsoever the contents of the same required. After that they had taken their places, and no man putting forth himself to answer for the offenders, the judges called aside Dr. Young, Sedgwick, Bullock, Taylor, Maptide, Hunter, Parker, Redman, above-mentioned. Also Brown, Gogman, Rud, Johnson, Mitch, Raven, and Carre, who had before written out the burial of Bucer, with a singular commendation of him, and sent it to sir John Cheek, knight. These men, taking first their oath upon a book, were commanded to bear witness against the heresies and doctrine of Bucer and Phagius. The twenty-second day of the same month was limited to this jury to bring in their verdict.

In the mean while, Ormanet and Dr. Watson abode at home in their lodging to take the depositions of them, whom we shewed you before to have been called to Peter-house, and to have communicated with the vice-chancellor as concerning that matter, whose depositions (as I told you) never came to light. The bishop of Chester, and Dr. Cole this day visited them of Catherine-hall, where, as far as could be learned, nothing was done worthy of rehearsal.

As Ormanet, the pope's datary, was sitting at Trinity-college, John Dale, of Queen's-college, came to him, whom he had commanded before to bring with him the pyx, wherein the bishop of Rome's god of bread is wont to be enclosed. For Ormanet told them that he had a precious jewel; the same was a linen clout that the pope had consecrated with his own hands, which he promised to bestow upon them for a gift. But Dale misunderstanding Ormanet, instead of the pyx brought the chalice and a singing cake, called the host, which he had wrapped up and put in his bosom. When he was come, Ormanet demanded if he had brought him the thing he had sent for: to whom he answered, he had brought it. Then give it me (quoth he.) Dale pulled out the chalice and the singing cake. When Ormanet saw that, he stepped back a little, as it had been in a wonder, calling him blockhead, and little better than a mad-man, demanding what he meant by these things, saying, he desired him to bring him none of that stuff, and that he was unworthy to enjoy so high a benefit: yet, notwithstanding, as he had promised before to give it them, he would perform his promise. Whereupon, with great reverence and ceremony, he pulled out the linen cloth and laid it in the chalice, and the bread with it, commanding them both for the holiness of the thing, and also for the author of it, to keep it among them with much due reverence as belonged to so holy a relic.

About the same time the commissioners had commanded the masters of the colleges, that every man should put in writing what books he had, with the authors' names. And to the intent that every man should execute it without deceit, they took an oath of them. This command some executed exactly and diligently; others, so far as they deemed it wrongfully, executed it slack enough.

We mentioned before, that the eighteenth day was limited for the day of judgment. When the day came, and that neither Bucer nor Phagius would appear at their call in the court, nor that any put forth himself to defend them, yet the courteous commissioners would not proceed to judgment; which nevertheless for their contumacy in absenting themselves, they might have done, considering how that day was peremptory. But these men, being bent altogether to equity and mercy, had rather shew some favour, than to do the uttermost they might by the law. Whereupon, Vincent published the second process, and set it up in the same places, as before. The meaning thereof varied not much from the first, but that it put off the judgment-day upon the 26th of the same month. Upon which day the vice-chancellor was sent for to their lodging, with whom they agreed concerning the order of publishing the sentence. And because there should want no solemnity in the matter, they commanded him farther to warn the mayor of the town to be there at the day appointed with all his burgeses, which the vice-chancellor did speed with all readiness.

This day (as I said) was the 26th of January, which being come, first all degrees of the mother university were assembled. And to fill up this pageant, there came also to the mayor and his townsmen, and all met together in St. Mary's church, to behold what there should be determined upon these men. After long attendance, at length the commissioners came forth, and went up to a scaffold that was somewhat higher than the residue, prepared for the same purpose. When they had taken their places, Dr. Perne, the vice-chancellor, the player of this interlude, fashioning his countenance with great gravity, reached to them the process that was lately published to cite them, saying these words: I bring forth again to you, right reverend father and commissioners of the most reverend my lord cardinal Poole, this citation executed according to the purport and effect of the same: omitting nothing for his part that might make to the commendation of this matter.

When he had thus finished his tale, the bishop of Chester, having viewed the people a little, began as follows.

YOU see how sore the university presseth upon us, how earnest intercession it maketh upon us, not only to denounce Bucer and Phagius, which these certain years past have spread most pernicious doctrine among you, to be heretics, as they be indeed, but also that we will command their dead carcases, which unto this day have obtained honourable burial among you, to be digged up, and as it is excellently ordained by the canon law, to be cast into fire, or whatsoever is more grievous than fire, if any can be: for the degrees of the university deal not slightly nor slackly with us in this case, but do so press upon us, and follow the suit so earnestly, that they scarce give us any respite of delay. And I assure you, tho' this case of itself be such, as that even the unworthiness of those persons, though there were no further cause, ought to induce us to the doing thereof, much the rather moved with these so wholesome petitions; it is meet and convenient we should grant it. For howsoever we of ourselves are inclined to mercy in our hearts, (than which we protest there is nothing under the sun to us more dear and acceptable) yet notwithstanding the very law riseth up to revenge, so that the common salvation of you all, which the law provided for, must be preferred before the private charity of our minds. Neither ought any such negligence to overtake us for our parts, that we, being scarce escaped out of the shipwreck of our former calamity, should now suffer this inexpressible mischief to disquiet any longer the consciences of the weak.

Moreover, it is but reason that we should do somewhat at so earnest an intreaty and suit of the university. I need not to speak much of ourselves: for if we had been desirous to enterprize this matter, it had been lawful, after the first citation, to have proceeded to judgment; but because we were willing that their defenders should be heard, and that the matter should be denounced and tried by law, we sent out the second process.

If we had desired revenge, we might have shewed cruelty upon them that are alive: of which (alas, the more pity) there are too many that embrace this doctrine. If we thirsted for blood, it was not to be sought in withered carcases and dry bones. Therefore you may well perceive, it was no part of our wills that we now came hither; but partly induced at the intreaty of the university, partly moved with the unworthiness of the case itself; but especially for the care and regard we have of your health and salvation, which we cover by all means to preserve.

For you yourselves are the cause of this business: you gave occasion for this confession, among whom this day ought to be a notable example, to remain as a memorial to them that shall come after, as in that which you may learn not only to shake off the filth which you have taken of these persons; but also to beware hereafter that you fall no more so shamefully as you have done. But I trust, God will defend you, and give you minds to keep yourselves from it.

As concerning the parties themselves, whose case now hangeth in law, they bear about the name of the gospel, whereas indeed they wrought nothing else but thievery and deceit. And so much the more wicked were they, as they sought to cover such shameful acts with the cloak of so fair and holy a name. Wherefore it is not to be doubted, but that God will punish this despite, of itself wicked, to you pernicious, but to the authors thereof shameful and abominable.

But if God, as he is slow to wrath and vengeance, will wink at it for a time, yet notwithstanding if we, upon whom the charge of the Lord's flock leaneth, should permit such execrable crimes to escape unpunished, we should not live in quiet one hour.

When he had thus spoken, he recited the sentence out of a scroll, and condemned Bucer and Phagius of heresy; the form and tenor of which sentence, now rendered into English, is as follows:

The Sentence of Condemnation against MARTIN BUCER and PHAGIUS.

WE Cuthbert, by the grace of God and the apostolic see, bishop of Chester, Nicholas Ormanet, archbishop of Verone, within the diocese aforesaid, auditor of the reverend lord Cardinal and legate: Thomas Watson, dean of Durham; and Henry Cole, provost of Eton-college, visitors to the university and town of Cambridge, within the diocese of Ely, also to all persons dwelling in the said town and places adjacent, for certain motions, causes and reasons thereunto moving, we are to inquire, and as we think fit, proceed against those who have run into vile heresies, and condemn their memory; we are impowered by letters from the most illustrious and reverend father in Christ, Reginald Poole, cardinal and priest of the most holy Roman church, legate de Latere from our most holy lord the pope, and the apostolic see, to the most serene Philip and Mary, king and queen of England, and to the whole kingdom, to depute commissioners or delegates, sufficiently instructed in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, and having the fear of God before their eyes, to constitute a court, and by this our definitive tive sentence, which we give according to the opinion of the most learned divines and lawyers, herein contained, to condemn these sons of iniquity, Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius, by nation Germans, but both of old living and dying in this town, whom we here declare, pronounce, judge and condemn as notorious heretics whilst they lived; for Martin Bucer, contrary to the rules and precepts of the holy fathers, as also to the traditions of the apostolic Roman church and holy councils, and of the christian religion, those rights and processions (which are every year on the day of the supper of our Lord celebrated and read by the Roman priests, in which, among others, the Wickliffians and Lutherans, and all other heretics, are condemned and anathematized) of the sacraments having continued in the church hitherto, he especially taught and preached about the number of them, contrary to what our holy mother the church had preached and observed: and he denied and openly condemned the authority of the holy apostolic see, and the supremacy of our great high-priest, and he especially held this article:

“That the church may err in faith and worship.”

This he particularly defended in the public assemblies, and there maintained and determined it to be true, and many others, as well by John Wickliffe, Martin Luther, and other chief heretics invented, and condemned by the church, especially that,

“That all things were governed by fate and an absolute necessity.”

As by himself first broached, believing and following false and heretical principles, and moreover also writing books, and causing them to be printed, and publishing them being printed, and in reading these writings publicly, and defending them in public disputations, as also by an obstinate living and dying in this manner, not only as a notorious heretic, but as a founder of heresy.

Also Paulus Phagius, who, among other things which favour of heresy, scattered up and down in his writings, printed and commonly read, not only approves, but gives the highest encomiums to the impious memory of John Oecolampadius, the aforesaid Martin Bucer, Philip Melancthon, John Brent, and their doctrines; which manifestly shews, he not only favoured heretics, but assented, believed, and approved their false principles, and endeavoured to induce others to believe and approve the same: thus he lived a common, notorious heretic, and died impenitent. Therefore we pronounce the said Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius excommunicated and anathematized, as well by the common law as by letters of process; and that their memory be condemned, we also condemn their bodies and bones (which in that most wicked time of schism, and other heresies flourishing in this kingdom, were rashly buried in holy ground) to be dug up, and cast from the bodies and bones of the faithful, according to the holy canons; and we command that they and their writings, if any be there found, be publicly burnt; and we interdict all persons whatsoever of this university, town or places adjacent, who shall read or conceal their heretical books, as well by the common law as by our letters of process.

After the sentence thus read, the bishop commanded their bodies to be digged out of their graves, and being degraded from holy orders, delivered them into the hands of the secular power: for it was not lawful for such innocent persons as they were, abhorring all bloodshed, and detesting all desire of murder, to put any man to death.

The Effect of Dr. PERNE's Sermon against MARTIN BUCER.

BESIDES this oration and sentence of Dr. Scot, came in also Dr. Perne, vice-chancellor, with his sermon tending to the same effect, to the depraving of Mr. Bucer, taking for his theme the place of the 133d Psalm, “Behold how good and pleasant a thing it is,” &c.

Where beginning first with the commendation of concord, and of the mutual knitting together of the minds, he alledged, that it was not possible to hold together, unless the concord were derived out of the head, which he made to be the bishop of Rome, and that it also rested in the same.

After he had made a long protestation hereof, he passed forth to Bucer, upon whom he made a shameful railing, saying, that his doctrine gave occasion of division in the common-wealth, and that there was not so grievous a mischief as that which by his means had been brought into the realm.

Although all men might perceive by the books he had compiled, what manner of doctrine it was; yet notwithstanding (he said) he knew it more perfectly himself than any did, and that he had learned it apart at the author's hand himself.

For at such time as they had communication secretly among themselves, Bucer (said he) would oftentimes wish he might be called by some other name, than by the name he had; for this purpose, as though knowing himself guilty of so grievous a crime, he might by this means escape unknown to the world, and avoid the talk that went among men of him.

Moreover, among other things, he told how Bucer held opinion (which thing he should confess to himself) that God was the author and well-spring, not only of good, but also of evil; and that whatsoever was of that sort flowed from him, as from the head-spring and maker thereof. Which doctrine he held to be sincere; howbeit, for offending divers men's consciences, he durst not put it into men's heads.

Many other things he patched together of like purport and effect, as of the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, of the marriage of priests, of divorcements and shameful usury also, as though he had deemed the same lawful to be used among christian people; with divers others of the like sort.

In all which his allegations, considering how Jewdly, without all shame, he lied upon Bucer, (as his writings evidently declare) he did not so much hurt his name with railing upon him, as win unto himself an inextinguishable infamy, by forging such shameful lies upon so worthy a man.

But what need of witness to prove him a liar? his own conscience shall make as much against him as a number of men.

It was reported for a truth, and testified by his own familiar friends, that the said Dr. Perne himself, either immediately after his sermon, or else somewhat before he went to it, striking himself on the breast, and in manner weeping, wished at home in his own house, with all his heart, that God would grant his soul might even then presently depart and remain with Bucer's. He knew well enough that his life was such, that if any man's soul was worthy of heaven, he thought his especially to be most worthy.

While he was thus talking to the people, in the mean time the leaves of the church doors were covered over with verses, in which the young men, to shew their folly, who scarce knew him by sight, blazed Bucer's name with most reproachful poetry.

These things being dispatched, Dr. Perne (as though he had sped his matter marvellously well) was for his labour, of courtesy bidden to dinner to Trinity-college by the commissioners. Where, after the table was taken up, they caused the sentence of condemnation to be copied out with all speed: which being signed with the bishop of Chester's seal, the next day following was for a triumph sent to London, with divers of those verses and slanderous libels.

Besides this, they sent also their own letters, wherein they both advertised the cardinal how far they had proceeded in that matter, and also desired his grace, that he would cause to be sent out of hand to Smith, mayor of the town, the commandment, commonly called a writ, for the burning of heretics. Unless he had the queen's warrant to save him harmless, he would not have to do in the matter: and that which remained to be be done in that case, could not be dispatched till that warrant came.

While this pursuivant went on his journey, they ordered to be brought unto them the books that they commanded before to be searched out. For they determined to throw them into the fire with Bucer and Phagius.

About the same time Dr. Watson taking occasion upon the day, because it was a high feast, in which was wont to be celebrated the memorial of the purification of the blessed virgin, made a sermon to the people upon that psalm, "We have received thy mercy, O Lord, in the midst of thy temple," &c. In which sermon he spake much reproach of Bucer and Phagius, and of their doctrine.

He said, that these men, and all the heretics of our time that were of the same opinion, (which for the most part, he said, were budded out of Germany) among other things which they had perniciously put into men's heads, taught to cast away all ceremonies. Whereas, notwithstanding, the apostle himself commanded all things to be done in due order.

And upon that deed of the blessed virgin and Joseph, which was done by them as upon that day, it was manifestly apparent, that they with our Saviour, being then a little babe, observed these rites and ceremonies for catholic men to teach. For he said, that they came to the temple the same time with wax candles in their hands, after the manner of procession (as they term it) in good order with much reverence and devotion, and yet we were not ashamed to laugh and mock at these things with the heretics and schismatics.

As he was speaking of Christ, Mary, and Joseph, one of them that heard him, a pleasant and merry-conceited fellow, turning himself to him that stood next him, And if it be true, said he, that this man preacheth, which of them I pray you (if a man might ask him a question) bare the cross before them? for that might not be missing in such solemn ceremonies. Not only this man jested at the preacher's folly, but divers others also laughed at his manifest unshamefacedness, in preaching these so vain and foolish superstitions.

While he was thus talking to his audience, John Christopheron, elected bishop of Chichester, being stricken with a sudden sickness, fell down in a swoon among the press; and came not to himself for a good while after: in the mean time babbling many things, as though he had been out of his wits. Some thought it came upon this occasion, because he had been greatly accused before the commissioners for mis-spending and misordering the goods of the college, and therefore was grieved with the matter, knowing that they had been offended with him, by reason Ormanet had cancelled before his face a lease of his, by which he had let to farm to his brother-in-law a certain manor of that college, because the covenants seemed unreasonable.

By this time the pursuivant was returned again, who (as we said before) was sent to London with the commissioners' letters, and brought with him a warrant for the burning of these men.

Upon the receipt whereof, they appointed the sixth day of February for the accomplishment of the matter; for it had been in hand a great while already.

Therefore when the said day was come, the commissioners sent for the vice-chancellor, demanding of him in what case things stood, whether all things were in a readiness for the accomplishment of this business. Understanding by him that all things were ready, they commanded the matter to be broached out of hand.

The vice-chancellor therefore taking with him Marshall the common notary, went first to St. Michael's church where Phagius was buried. Then he called forth Andrew Smith, Henry Sawyer, and Henry Adams, men of the same parish, and bound them with an oath to dig up the bones of Phagius, and to bring them to the place of execution. Marshall took their oaths, receiving the like of Roger Smith and William Hasell, the town serjeants, and of John Caper, warden of the same church, for doing the like with Bucer. Smith, the mayor of the town, who should be their executioner, (for it was not lawful for them to intermeddle in cases of blood) commanded certain of his townsmen to wait upon him in harness, by whom the dead bodies were guarded; and being bound with ropes, and laid upon men's shoulders (for they were inclosed in chests, Bucer in the same that he was buried, and Phagius in a new one), they were carried into the midst of the market-place, with a great train of people following them.

This place was prepared before, and a great post was set fast in the ground to bind the carcases to, and a great heap of wood was laid ready to burn them withal.

When they came thither, the chests were set up on end with the dead bodies in them, and fastened on both sides with stakes, and bound to the post with a long iron chain, as if they had been alive. Fire being forthwith put to, as soon as it began to flame round about, a great many books that were condemned with them were cast into the same.

There was that day gathered into the town a great multitude of country folks (for it was market-day), who seeing men borne to execution, and learning by inquiry that they were dead before, partly detested and abhorred the extreme cruelty of the commissioners toward the rotten carcases, and partly laughed at their folly in making such preparations. For what needeth any weapon, said they? As though they were afraid that the dead bodies, which felt them not, would do them some harm. Or to what purpose serveth that chain wherewith they are tied, since they might be burnt loose without peril? for it was not to be feared that they would run away.

Thus every body that stood by found fault with the cruelty of the deed, either sharply or else lightly, as every man's mind gave him. There were very few that liked their doing therein.

In the mean time that they were a roasting in the fire, Dr. Watson went into the pulpit in St. Mary's church, and there before his audience railed upon their doctrine, as wicked and erroneous, saying, that it was the ground of all the mischief that had happened for a long time in the common-wealth. For behold (said he) as well the prosperity as the adversity of these years that ensued, and you shall find that all things have chanced unluckily to them that have followed this new-found faith; as contrarily, all things have happened fortunately to them that have eschewed it. What robbing and polling (quoth he) have we seen in this realm, as long as religion was defaced with sects; the common treasure (gathered for the maintenance of the whole public weal) and the goods of the realm shamefully spent in waste for the maintenance of a few people's lusts, all good order broken, all discipline cast aside, holidays appointed to the solemnizing of ceremonies neglected; and what is more, the places themselves beaten down, flesh and other kind of prohibited sustenance eaten every where upon days forbidden, without remorse of conscience, the priests had in derision, the mass railed upon, no honour done to the sacraments of the church; all estates and degrees given to such a licentious liberty, without check, that all things seemed to draw to their utter ruin and decay.

And yet in the mean time the name of the gospel was pretended outwardly, as though that for it men ought of duty to give credit to their erroneous opinions; whereas indeed there is nothing more different, or more to the slander of God's word than the same. For what other thing taught they to remain in that most blessed and mystical sacrament of the body of our Lord, than bare unleavened bread? And what else do the remnant of them teach unto this day? Whereas Christ by express words doth assure it to be his very body. How perilous a doctrine is that which concerneth the fatal and absolute necessity of predestination? And yet they set it out in such wise, that they have left no choice at all in things. As who should say, it skilled not what a man purposed of any matter, since he had not the power to determine otherwise than the matter should come to pass. Which was the peculiar opinion of them, that made God the author of evil, bringing them through this persuasion into such a careless security of the everlasting eternity, that in the mean season it made no matter either toward salvation, or damnation, what a man did in this life. These errors (which were not even among the heathen men) were defended by them with great stoutness.

These and many other such things he slanderously and falsely alledged against Bucer, whose doctrine (in such sort as he himself taught it) either he would not understand, or else he was minded to slander. And yet he was not ignorant, that Bucer taught none other things than the very same whereunto both he and Scot, in the reign of king Edward the Sixth, had willingly assented, by subscribing thereto with their own hands. While he talked in this wise before the people, many of them that had written verses before, did now set up others, in which, like a sort of water frogs, they spewed out their venomous malice against Bucer and Phagius. This was the last act of this interlude, and yet there remained a few things to be done, among which was the reconciling of two churches, of our Lady, and of St. Michael, which we declared before to have been interdicted.

This was done the next day following by the afore said bishop of Chester, with as much ceremonial solemnity as the law required. But that breathen god, whom Bucer's carcase had chased from thence, was not yet turned thither again: neither was it lawful for him to come there any more, unless he was brought thither with great solemnity: as I suppose, during all the time of his absence, he was entertained by the commissioners at Trinity-college, and there continued as a sojourner. For thither came all the graduates of the university, the 8th of February, out of gentleness and courtesy, to bring him home again. Amongst which number, the bishop of Chester (worthy for his estate to come nearest to him, because he was a bishop) took and carried him, clad in a long rochet, and a large tippet of sarsenet about his neck, wherein he wrapped his idol also. Ormanet had given the same a little before to the university, for that and such like purposes.

When this idol should return home, he went not out the straightest and nearest way as other folks are wont to go, but he fetched a compass about most part of the town, and roamed through so many of the streets, that it was an hour or more before he could find the way into this church again. I believe the ancient Romans observed a custom not much unlike this in their processions when they made supplications at the shrines of all their gods. The order of which procession was this: the masters regents went before, singing with a loud voice, Salve festa dies, &c. Next them followed the bishop of Chester, about him went Ormanet and his fellow-commissioners, with the masters of the colleges, bearing every man a long taper lighted in his hand. After whom, a little space off, followed other degrees of the university. Lastly came the mayor and his townsmen. Before them all went the beades, crying to such as they met, that they should bow themselves humbly before the host; if any refused so to do, they threatened to send them forthwith to the Tollbooth. Their god being led with this pomp, and pacified with great sacrificed hosts of Bucer and Phagius, at length settled himself again in his accustomed room.

Dr. Scot, bishop of Chester, prayed with many words, that that day might be lucky and fortunate to himself, and to all that were present, and that from that day forward (now that God's wrath was appeased, and all other things set in good order) all men should make themselves conformable to peace and quietness, namely, in matters pertaining to religion.

After this they bestowed a few days in punishing and amercing such as they thought had deserved it. Some they suspended from giving voices either to their own preferment, or to the preferment of any other. Some they forbade to have the charge of pupils, lest they should infect the tender youth (being pliable to take what print soever should be laid upon them) with corrupt doctrine and heresy; others they chastised wrongfully without any desert; and many a one they punished, contrary to all right and reason.

Last of all they set forth certain statutes, by which they would have the university hereafter ordered. Wherein they enacted many things, as concerning the direction of their officers of the university, of keeping and administering the goods of the university, and of many other things. But especially they handled the matter very circumspectly for religion. In which they were so scrupulous, that they replenished all things either with open blasphemy or with ridiculous superstition. For they prescribed at how many masses every man should be day by day, and how many Pater Nosters and Aves every man should say when he should enter into the church; and in his entrance, after what sort he should bow himself to the altar, and how to the master of the house, what he should do there, and how long he should tarry, how many, and what prayers he should say, what, and how he should sing, what meditations others should use while the priest is in his memento, mumbling secretly to himself, what time of the mass a man should stand, and when he should sit down, when he should make courtesy, when exclusively; when inclusively, and many other superstitious toys they decreed, that it was a sport then to behold their superstitions, and were tedious now to recite them.

Moreover these masters of good order, for fashion's sake, ordained that every man should put on a surplice, not torn nor worn, but clean, forbidding them in any wise to wipe their noses thereon.

These things thus set at a stay, when the commissioners were now ready to go their ways, the university for such great benefits (which we should not suffer to fall out of remembrance many years after) coveting to shew some token of courtesy towards them again, dignified Ormanet and Cole with the degree of doctorship; for all the rest, saving Christopherson, who now, by reason he was elected bishop, prevented that degree, had received that order before. Thus at length were sent away these peace-makers, that came to pacify strifes and quarrels; who, through provoking every man to accuse one another, left such gaps and breaches in men's hearts at their departure, that for years after they could never be closed nor joined together again.

These commissioners, before they departed out of the university, commanded, that the masters of every house should copy out their statutes, which besides common ordinances, contained in them certain rules of private order for every house particularly. Swinborn (who as I said was master of Clare-hall) being demanded whether he would have those things ingrossed in parchment or in paper, answered, That it made no matter in what they were written: for the paper, or slighter thing that were of less continuance than paper, would serve the turn well enough: for he said, a slenderer thing than that would last a great deal longer than those decrees would stand in force. Neither was the man deceived in his conjecture: for within two years after, God beholding us with mercy, called queen Mary out of this life the 17th of November, 1558, after whom her sister Elizabeth succeeding in the kingdom, raised to life again the true religion. Whereupon, as the church of Christ began by little and little to flourish, so the memory of Bucer and Phagius (although their bones were burnt by cardinal Poole) was restored again by the godly queen Elizabeth, who gave then in commission to Matthew Parker, then archbishop of Canterbury, to Edmund Grindal, then bishop of London, to Mr. Walter Hadson, and others: for the performance of which commission, the said reverend bishops addressed their letters to the vice-chancellor, &c.

I Am in doubt, whether I may treat of the praise and commendation of so great a clerk (for the celebrating whereof, this assembly and concourse of your's is made this day), or of the vices and calamities, out of which we be newly delivered, or of them both, considering the one cannot be mentioned without the other.

In which times you felt so much anguish and sorrow, my right dear brethren, that if I should repeat them, and bring them to remembrance again, I fear I should not so much work a just hatred in us towards them, for the injuries received in them, as renew our old sorrow and heaviness. Again, men must needs account me unadvised and foolish in my doing, if I should think myself able to make him who hath lived before our eyes in praise and estimation, more famous and notable by my oration, which he by his living and conversation hath oftentimes polished. But the wickedness of the times, which endeavoured to wipe clean out of remembrance of men, the name that was so famous and renowned in every man's mouth, did much profit him. Inasmuch, that both in his life-time all things redounded to his continual renown, and especially after his decease, nothing could be devised more honourable, than with so solemn furniture and ceremonies, to have gone about to have hurt the memory of such a worthy man, and yet could not bring to pass the thing that was so sore coveted; but rather brought that thing to pass, which was chiefly sought to be avoided. For the desire that men have of the dead hath purchased to many men everlasting fame, and hath not taken away immortality, but amplified and increased the same. By means whereof it cometh to pass, that he that will treat of these things that pertain to the praise of Bucer after his death, cannot chuse but speak of the crabbedness of the times past, upon which riseth a great increase and augmentation of his praise. But his life so excellently set forth, not only by the writings of the clerks, Cheeke and Carre, and by the lively voice of the right famous Dr. Haddon, uttered in this place to the great admiration of all the hearers, when his body should be laid into his grave to be buried; and after his burial, by the godly and most holy preachings of the right reverend father in Christ the archbishop of Canterbury, that now is Dr. Redman, which for the worthiness and excellency of them, ought to stick longer in our minds unwritten, than many things that are penned and put in print; but also by the great assembly of all the degrees of the university the same day, in bringing him to his grave, and the next day after by the industry of every man that was indued with any knowledge in the Greek or Latin tongues; of which there was no man but set up some verses, as witnesses of his just and unfeigned sorrow, upon the walls of the church; that neither at that time any reverence or duty which is due to the dead departing out of this life, was then over-slipped, or now remaineth undone, that may seem to pertain either to the celebrating of the memorial of so holy and famous a person, or to the consecrating of him to everlasting memory.

We at that time saw with our eyes this university flourishing by his institutions, the love of sincere religion not only ingendered, but also confirmed and strengthened through his continual and daily preaching. Inasmuch, that at such time as he was suddenly taken from us, there was scarce any man that for sorrow could find in his heart to beat with the present state of this life, but that either he wished with all his heart to depart out of this life with Bucer into another, and by dying to follow him into immortality; or else endeavoured himself with weeping and sighing to call him again, being dispatched of all troubles, into the prison of this body, out of which he is escaped, lest he should leave us as it were standing in battle without a captain, and he himself as one cashiered, depart with his wages, or as one discharged out of the camp, withdraw himself to the everlasting quietness and tranquillity of the soul. Therefore all men evidently declared at that time, both how sore they took his death to heart, and also how hardly they could away with the loss of such a man. As long as the ardent love of his religion (wherewith we were inflamed) flourished, it wrought in our hearts an incredible desire of his presence among us. But after the time that the godly man ceased to be any more in our sight, and in our eyes, that ardent and burning love of religion, by little and little, waxed cold in our minds; and according to the times that came after (which were both miserable, and to our utter undoing), it began not by little and little to be darkened, but it altogether vanished away, and turned into nothing. For we fell again into the troublefomeness of the popish doctrine; the old rites and customs of the Romish church were restored again, not to the adorning and beautifying of the christian religion (as they furnished), but to the utter defacing, violating, and defiling of the same. Death was set before the eyes of such as persevered in the christian doctrine that they had learned before. They were banished the realm that would not apply themselves to the times, and do as other men did: such as remained were forced either to dissemble, or to hide themselves, and creep into corners, or else as it were by drinking of the charmed cup of Cicero, to be turned and altered, not only from the nature of man into the nature of brute beasts, but (what is far worse and more monstrous) from the likeness of God and his angels, into the likeness of devils. And all England was infected with this malady. But I would to God the corruption of those times, which overwhelmed all the whole realm, had not at leastwise yet pierced every part and member thereof. Of which there was not one, but (that besides the grief that it felt with the residue of the body, by reason of the sickness and contagion spread into the whole) had some sorrow and calamity peculiar by itself. And to omit the rest (of which to treat, this place is not appointed, nor the time requireth ought to be spoken) this dwelling place of the Muses (which we call the university) may be a sufficient witness what we may judge of all the rest of the body. For certainly, my brethren, the thing is not to be dissembled that cannot be hidden. We, applying ourselves to those most filthy times, have most shamefully yielded, like faint-hearted cowards, who had not the stomachs to sustain the adversities of poverty, banishment, and death. Which in our living and conversation kept neither the constancy taught us by philosophy, nor yet the patience taught us by holy scripture, which have done all things at the commandment of others. And therefore that which the poet, although in another sense, hath aptly spoken, may well be thought to have been truly prophesied upon us:

The times and seasons changed be:
And changed with the same are we.

Divers of them that were of a pure and sincere judgment as concerning religion, being driven from hence and troubled, the rest that remained tasted and felt of the inhumanity of them in whose hands the authority of doing things here consisted; although to say the truth, I have used a gentler term than behoved. For is not to be accounted inhumanity, but rather immanity and beastly cruelty: who when they had exercised all kinds of torments and punishments upon the living, when they had cruelly taken life from such as constantly persevered; from others riches, honours, and all hope of promotion; yet they could not be so satisfied, but that incensed and stirred with a greater fury, it began to outrage even against the dead. Therefore whereas in every singular place was exercised a singular kind of cruelty, inasmuch that there was no kind of cruelty that could be devised, but it was put in practice in one place or other, this was proper or peculiar to Cambridge, to exercise the cruelty upon the dead, which in other places was extended but to the living. Oxford burnt up the right reverend fathers, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, the noble witnesses of the clear light of the gospel. Moreover, at London perished these two lanterns of light, Rogers and Bradford: in whom it is hard to say, whether there were more force of eloquence and utterance in preaching, or more holiness of life and conversation. Many others, both here and in other places, were consumed to ashes for bearing record to the truth. For what city is there that hath not flamed, I say not with burning of houses and buildings, but with burning of holy bodies? But Cambridge, after there were no more left alive, upon whom they might spew out their bitter poison, played the mad Bedlam against the dead. The dead men, whose living no man was able to find fault with, whose doctrine no man was able to reprove, were

by false slanderous accusers indicted, contrary to the laws of God and man, sued in the law, condemned, the sepulchres violated and broken up, their carcases pulled out and burnt with fire. A thing surely incredible, if we had not seen it with our eyes, and a thing that hath not lightly been heard of. But the heinousness of this wicked act was spread abroad as a common talk in every man's mouth, and was blown and dispersed through all Christendom.

Bucer, by the excellency of his wit and doctrine known to all men, of our countrymen in manner craved, of many others intreated and sent for, to the end he might instruct our Cambridge-men in the sincere doctrine of the christian religion, being spent with age, and his strength utterly decayed, forsook his own country, refused not the tediousness of that long journey, was not afraid to venture himself upon the sea, but had more regard of the dilating and amplifying of the church of Christ, than of all other things. So in conclusion he came, every man received and welcomed him: afterward he lived in such wise, as might appear he came not hither for his own sake, but for our's. For he sought not to drive away the sickness that he had taken by troublesome travel of his long journey: and albeit his strength were weakened, yet he regarded not the recovery of his health, but put himself to immoderate labour and intolerable pain, only to teach and instruct us. And yet toward this so noble and worthy a person, while he lived were shewed all the tokens of humanity and gentleness, reverence and courtesy that could be; but when he was dead, the most horrible cruelty and spite that might be imagined. For what can be so commendable, as to grant unto the living house and abiding place, and to the dead burial? Or what is he that will find in his heart to give entertainment, and to cherish that person in his house with all kinds of gentleness that he can devise, upon whom he could not vouchsafe to bestow burial when he is dead? Again, what an inconsistency is it, with great solemnity, and with much advancement and commendation of his virtues to bury a man honourably, and anon after to break up his tomb, and pull him out spitefully, and wrongfully to slander him being dead, who during his life-time always deserved praise? All these things have happened unto Bucer, who whilst he lived had free access into the most gorgeous buildings and stately palaces of the greatest princes: and when he was dead, could not be suffered to enjoy so much as his poor grave. Who being laid in the ground nobly to his eternal fame, was afterward spitefully taken up and burned. Which things, although they did no harm to the dead, (for the dead carcases feel not pain, neither doth the fame of godly persons depend upon the report of vulgar people, and the light rumours of men, but upon the rightful censure and just judgment of God) yet manifest the extreme cruelty and insatiable desire of revenge in them which offer such utter wrong to the dead. These persons therefore whom they have pulled out of their graves and burned, I believe (if they had been alive) they would have cast out of house and home, they would have driven out of all men's company, and in the end with most cruel torments have torn them in pieces, being nevertheless aliens, being strangers, and being also fetched hither by us out of such a country, where they not only needed not to fear any punishment, but on the contrary were always had in much reputation, as well among the noble and honourable, as also among the vulgar and common people. But yet how much more gentle than these men was bishop Gardiner, otherwise an earnest defender of the popish doctrine? who against his own countrymen, let pass no cruelty whereby he might extinguish with fire and sword the light of the gospel: and yet he spared foreigners, because the right of them is so holy, that there was never nation so barbarous, that would violate the same. For when he had in his power the renowned clerk Peter Martyr, then teaching at Oxford, he would not keep him to punish him, but (as I have heard reported) when he should go his way, he gave him wherewith to bear his charges. So that the thing which he thought he might of right do to his countrymen, he judged unlawful to do to strangers.

And whom the law of God could not with-hold from the wicked murdering of his own countrymen, him did the law of man bridle from killing of strangers, which hath ever appeased all barbarous beastliness, and mitigated all cruelty. For it is a point of humanity for man and man to meet together, and one to come to another, though they be ever so far separated and far asunder, both by sea and by land, without which access there can be no intercourse of merchandise, there can be no conference of wits, which first of all engendered learning, nor any commodity of society long to continue. To repulse them that come to us, and to prohibit them our countries, is a point of inhumanity. Now to entertain them evil, that by our sufferance dwell among us, and have increase of household and household-stuff, is a point of wickedness. Wherefore this cruelty hath far surmounted the cruelty of all others, which, to satisfy the unsatiable greediness thereof, drew to execution not only strangers, brought hither at our intreaty and sending for, but even the withered and rotten carcases digged out of their graves; to the intent that the unmeasurable thirst which could not be quenched with shedding the blood of them that were alive, might at the least be satisfied in burning of dead men's bones.

These, my brethren, these, I say, are the just causes which have so sore provoked the wrath of God against us; because that in doing extreme injury to the dead we have been prone and ready; but in putting the same away we have been slow and slack. For verily I believe (if I may have liberty to say freely what I think ye shall bear with me, if I chance to cast forth any thing unadvisedly in the heat and hasty discourse of my oration) that even this place, in which we have so oftentimes assembled, being defiled with that new kind of wickedness, such as man never heard of before, is a lett and hindrance unto us, when we call for the help of God, by means whereof our prayers are not accepted, which we make to appease the Godhead, and to win him to be favourable unto us again.

The blood of Abel shed by Cain, called and cried from the earth that sucked it up: likewise the undeserved burning of these bodies, calleth upon Almighty God to punish us, and crieth, that not only the authors of so great a wickedness, but also the ministers thereof are impure, the places defiled in which these things were perpetrated, the air infected which we take into our bodies, to the intent that by sundry diseases and sicknesses we may receive punishment for so execrable wickedness. Look well about you (my dear brethren), and consider with yourselves the evils that are past; and ye shall see how they took their beginning at Bucer's death, following one on the neck of another even to this day. First and foremost, when we were even in the chiefest of our mourning, and scarcely yet comforted of our sorrow for his death, the sweating sickness lighted upon us, which passed swiftly through all England, and as it were in haste dispatched an innumerable company of men. Secondly, the untimely death of our most noble king Edward VI. (whose life in virtue surmounted the opinion of all men, and seemed worthy of immortality) happened contrary to men's expectation in that age, in which, unless violence be used, few do die. The conversion of religion, or rather the eversion and turning thereof into popery: the incursion and domination of strangers, under whose yoke our necks were almost subdued: the great cruelty of the bishops against the christians, which executed that wickedness, for making satisfaction whereof we are gathered together this day. These are the things that ensued after his death; but after his burning ensued yet more grievous things: namely, new kinds of plagues, and contagious diseases, unknown to the very physicians, whereby either every man's health was impaired, or else they were brought to their graves, or else very hardly recovered. Bloody battles without victory, whereof the profit redounded to the enemy, and to us the slaughter with great loss. Which things do evidently declare, that God is turned from us, and angry with us, and that he giveth no ear to our prayers, and that he is not moved with our cries and sighs, but that he looketh that this our meeting and assembly assembly in the following light: that forasmuch as we have violated their corpse, we should do them right again; so that the memorial of these most holy men may be commended unto posterity unhurt and undefamed. Wherefore amend yet at length (my brethren), which hitherto, by reason of the variableness and unconstancy of the times, have been wavering and unstedfast in your hearts; shew yourselves cheerful and forward in making satisfaction for the injury you have done to the dead, whom with such great wickedness of late you injured and defiled; not censuring them with the perfumes of those odours and spices now worn out of use, and put to flight, but with a true and unfeigned repentance of the heart, and with prayer, to the intent that the heavenly Godhead, provoked by our doings to be our enemy, may by our humble submission be intreated to be favourable and agreeable to all our other requests.

When Mr. Ackworth had made an end of his oration, Mr. James Pilkington, the queen's reader of the divinity lecture, going into the pulpit, made a sermon upon the 112th Psalm, the beginning whereof is, "Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord."

Where intending to prove, that the remembrance of the just man shall not perish, and that Bucer is blessed, and that the ungodly shall fret at the sight thereof, but yet that all their attempts shall be to no purpose, (to the intent that this saying may be verified, I will curse your blessings, and bless your cursings) he took his beginning of his own person; That although he were both ready and willing to take that matter in hand, partly for the worthiness of the matter itself, and especially for certain singular virtues of those persons, for whom that congregation was called; notwithstanding, he said, he was not fit to take that charge upon him.

For it were more reason, that he which before had done Bucer wrong, should now make him amends for the displeasure. As for his own part, he was so far from working evil against Bucer, either in word or deed; that for their singular knowledge almost in all kind of learning, he embraced both him and Phagius with all his heart: but yet he somewhat more favoured Bucer, as with him he had more familiarity and acquaintance. In consideration whereof, although that it was scarce convenient that he at that time should speak, yet he was contented, for friendship and courtesy's sake, not to fail them in their business.

Having made this preface, he entered into the pith of the matter, wherein he blamed greatly the barbarous cruelty of the court of Rome, so fiercely extended against the dead. He said, it was a more heinous matter than was to be borne with, to have shewed such extreme cruelty to them that were alive; but for any man to misbehave himself in such wise toward the dead, was such a thing as had not lightly been heard of: saving that he affirmed this custom of excommunicating and cursing of dead bodies to have come first from Rome. For Evagrius reporteth in his writings, that Eutychius was of the same opinion, induced by the example of Josias, who slew the priests of Baal, and burnt up the bones of them that were dead, even upon the altars. Whereas before, the time of Eutychius this kind of punishment was nearly unknown, neither afterward usurped by any man (that he ever heard of) till 900 years after Christ. In the latter times (which how much the further they were from the golden age of the apostles, the more they were corrupted) this kind of cruelty began to creep further: for it is manifestly known, that Stephen the Sixth, pope of Rome, digged up Formosus, his last predecessor in that see, and spoiling him of his apparel (as they call it), first cutting off and throwing his two fingers into the Tyber, with which, according to their accustomed manner, he was wont to bless and consecrate. Which his unspeakable tyranny used against Formosus, within six years after Sergius the Third increased also against the same Formosus: for, taking up his dead body, and setting it in a pope's chair, he caused his head to be struck off, his other three fingers to be cut from his hand, and his body to be cast into the river Tyber, abrogating and annulling all his decree, which thing was never done by any man before that day. The cause why such great cruelty was exercised (by the report of Nauclerus) was this; because that Formosus had been an adversary to Stephen and Sergius, when they sued to be made bishops.

This kind of cruelty, unheard of before, the popes a while exercised one against another. But now, before they had sufficiently felt the smart thereof themselves, they had turned the same upon their necks. Wherefore it was to be wished, that seeing it began among them, it might have remained still with the authors thereof, and not have been spread over thence unto us. But such is the nature of all evil, that it quickly passeth into example, for others to do the like. For about the year of the Lord 1400, John Wickliffe was in like manner digged up, and burnt to ashes, and thrown into a brook that runneth by the town where he was buried. In the same manner was served one William Tracy, of Gloucester, a man of a worshipful house, because he had written in his last will, that he should be saved only by faith in Jesus Christ, and that there needed not the help of any man thereto, whether he were in heaven or on earth; therefore he bequeathed no legacy to that purpose, as all other men were accustomed to do. This deed was done since we may remember, about the twenty-second year of the reign of king Henry the Eighth, in the year of our Lord 1530.

Now seeing they extended such cruelty to the dead, he said it was an easy matter to conjecture what they would do to the living. Whereof we have had sufficient trial by the examples of our own men, these few years past. And if we would take the pains to peruse things done somewhat longer ago, we might find notable matters out of our own chronicles. However, it was sufficient for the manifest demonstration of that matter, to declare the beastly butchery of the French king, executed upon the Waldenses at Cabrier, and the places thereabout, by his captain Miner, about the year of our Lord 1545, than which there was never thing read of more cruelly done, no not even of the barbarous pagans. And yet for all that, when divers had shewed their utmost cruelty both against these and many others, they were so far from their purpose, in extinguishing the light of the gospel, which they endeavoured to suppress, that it increased daily more and more. Which thing Charles the Fifth (than whom all Christendom had not a more prudent prince, nor the church of Christ a forer enemy) easily perceived; and therefore when he had in his hand Luther dead, and Melancthon and Pomeran with certain other preachers of the gospel alive, he not only determined not any thing extremely against them, nor violated their graves, but also intreating them gently, sent them away, not so much as once forbidding them to publish openly the doctrine that they professed. For it is the nature of Christ's church, that the more that tyrants spurn against it, the more it increaseth and flourisheth. A notable proof assuredly of the providence and pleasure of God in sowing the gospel, was that coming of the Bohemians unto us, to the intent to hear Wickliffe, of whom we spoke before, who at that time read openly at Oxford; and also the going of our men to the said Bohemians when persecution was raised against us. But much more notable was it, what we have seen come to pass in these our days; that the Spaniards, sent for into the realm on purpose to suppress the gospel, as soon as they were returned home, replenished many parts of their country with the same truth of religion to which before they were enemies.

By which examples it might evidently be seen, that the princes of this world labour in vain to overthrow it, considering how the mercy of God hath sown it abroad, not only in those countries that we spake of, but also in France, Poland, Scotland, and almost all the rest of Europe. For it is said, that some parts of Italy (although it be under the pope's nose) yet do of late incline to the knowledge of the heavenly truth; wherefore sufficient argument and proof might be taken by the success and increase thereof, to make us believe that this doctrine is sent us from heaven, unless we will wilfully be blinded. And if there were any that desired to be persuaded more at large in the matter, he might advisedly consider the voyages that the emperor and the pope, with both their powers together, made jointly against the Bohemians: in which the emperor met such an unworthy repulse of so small a handful of his enemies, that he never almost in all his life took the like dishonour in any place. Hereof also might be an especial example of the death of Henry, king of France, who, on the day that he had purposed to persecute Christ's church, and to have burned certain of his guard, who were imprisoned for religion, at whose execution he had promised to be present, in the midst of his triumph at Tournay, was wounded so fore in the head with a spear, by one of his own subjects, that he soon after died.

In which behalf the dreadful judgments of God were no less approved in our own countrymen. For one that was a notable slaughter-man of Christ's fairs, rotted alive, and before he died, such a rank smell steamed from his body, that none of his friends were able to come to him, for fear of vomiting. Another, being in utter despair of all health, howled out miserably. The third ran out of his wits. Divers others, that were enemies to the church, perished miserably in the end. All which things were certain tokens of the favour and defence of the Divine Majesty towards his church, and of his wrath and vengeance towards the tyrants. And forasmuch as he had made mention of the Bohemians, he said it was a most apt example that was reported of their captain Zisca, who, when he should die, ordered his body to be flayed, and of his skin to make a parchment to cover the head of a drum: for it should come to pass, that when his enemies heard the sound of it, they should not be able to stand against them. The like counsel (he said) he himself now gave them as concerning Bucer: that like as the Bohemians did with the skin of Zisca, the same should they do with the arguments and doctrine of Bucer: for as soon as the papists should hear the noise of him, their gew-gaws would forthwith decay. For saving that they used violence to such as withstood them, their doctrine contained nothing that might seem (having but mean understanding in holy scripture) to be grounded upon any reason. As for those things that were done by them, against such as could not play the mad-men as well as they, some of them favoured of open force, and some of ridiculous foolishness. For what was this first of all? Was it not frivolous, that for the space of three years together, mass should be sung in those places where Bucer and Phagius rested in the Lord, without any offence? and as soon as they took it to be an offence, straightway to be an offence if any were heard there; or that it should not be as good then as it was before: as if that then, upon a sudden, it had been a heinous matter to celebrate it there; and that the fault that was past should be counted the more grievous, because it was done of long time. Moreover, this was a matter of no effect, that Bucer and Phagius only should be dug up; as if they alone had embraced the religion which they call heresy. It was well known how one of the burghesses of the town had been inclined toward the popish religion: who, when he should die, desired neither ringing of bells, dirges, nor any kind of trifles, to be done on his anniversary, as it is termed; but that they should go with instruments of music before the mayor and council of the city, to celebrate his memorial; and also, that yearly a sermon should be made to the people, bequeathing a piece of money to the preacher. Neither might he omit in that place to speak of Ward the painter, who, although he was a man of no reputation, yet was not to be despised for the religion's sake which he diligently followed. Nor were divers others to be passed over with silence, who were known of a certainty to have continued in the same sect, and to rest in other church-yards in Cambridge, and indeed through the whole realm, and yet defiled not their masses at all.

All which persons (forasmuch as they were all of one opinion) ought to have been taken up, or else all have been let to lie with the same religion; unless a man would grant, that it lieth in their power to make what they like lawful and unlawful, at pleasure.

In the condemnation of Bucer and Phagius, to say the truth, they used too much cruelty, and too much violence. For howsoever it went with the doctrine of Bucer, certainly they could find nothing whereof to accuse Phagius, inasmuch as he wrote nothing that came abroad, except a few things that he had translated out of the Hebrew and Chaldee tongues into Latin. After his coming into the realm, he never read, disputed, preached, or taught; for he died soon after, so that he could in that time give no occasion for his adversaries to accuse him whom they never heard speak. In that they hated Bucer so deadly, for allowing marriage of the clergy, it was their own malice conceived against him, and a very slander raised by themselves. For he had for his defence in that matter (besides other helps) the testimony of pope Pius the Second, who, in a certain place says, That upon weighty considerations, priests' wives were taken from them, but for more weighty causes were to be restored. And also the statute of the emperor, (they call it the Interim) by which it is enacted, That such of the clergy as were married should not be divorced from their wives.

Thus turning his style from this matter to the university, he reproveth, in few words, their unfaithfulness towards these men. For if the Lord suffered not the bones of the king of Edom, being a wicked man, to be taken up and burnt, without revengement (as saith Amos), let us assure ourselves he will not suffer so notable a wrong done to his godly preachers unrevenged.

Afterward when he came to the condemnation, (which we told you in the former action was pronounced by Dr. Perne, vice-chancellor, in the name of them all) being somewhat more moved at the matter, he admonished them how greatly it behoved them to use circumspection, what they decreed upon any man by their voices, in admitting or rejecting any man to the promotions and degrees of the university. For that he which should take his authority from them, should be a great prejudice to all the other multitude, which (for the opinion he had of their doctrine, judgment, allowance, and knowledge) did think but well of them: for it would come to pass, that if they would bestow their promotions upon none but fit persons, and let the unfit go as they come, both the common-wealth should receive much advantage and profit by them, and they should highly please God. But if they persisted to be negligent in so doing, they should grievously injure the common-wealth, and work their own shame and reproach. Besides, they should greatly offend the majesty of God; whose commandment (Not to bear false witness) would be broken and violated.

While he was speaking these and many other things before his audience, many of the university, to set out and defend Bucer, beset the walls of the church and church-porch on both sides with verses; some in Latin, some in Greek, and some in English, in which they made a manifest declaration how they were minded toward Bucer and Phagius. Finally, when his sermon was ended, they made common supplication and prayers. After giving thanks to God for many other things, especially for restoring the true religion, every man departed his way.

Forasmuch as mention hath been made of the death of the worthy and famous clerk Martin Bucer, and of the burning of his bones after his death, it will not be improper here to insert the funeral verse of Dr. Redman upon Bucer's death, now translated into English.

The Epitaph, or Funeral Verse, of Dr. REDMAN, upon the Death of MARTIN BUCER.

HENCE, O far hence let envy fly,
Nor be revenge nor mock'ry nigh:
The lying lips and faithless mind,
Let here no rest or refuge find.
These from the man God's image take,
And him more like the devil's make.
But holy truth be present here,
Thou virgin everlasting fair:
And to the inquiring many shew,
From whence proceeds this scene of woe.
BUCER, who led the church before,
BUCER, that light of learning, is no more:
As the sun gilds the world around,
So he in learning's orb was found.
The mourning schools his loss confess,
But who can CAMBRIDGE's grief express?
High as the stars her sighs ascend,
Lamenting thus her wonted friend.
No more shall we a master find,
Like him so just, like him so kind:
Whose exemplary life was fraught
With all the virtues which he taught:
His rest so small, labour so great,
Nature sunk down beneath the weight,
And yielded to death's fatal power,
Before his short appointed hour.
But stop, my muse, thy labour's vain,
Thy lines can't half his praise contain:
Then farewell, BUCER, thy remains
An humble sepulchre retains,
Till the Great Judge of all shall come,
And pass his universal doom:
Then he thy body will restore,
More glorious than it was before.
Till when thy soul amongst the blest remains,
There happily thou lives, there happily thou reigns.

The despiteful Handling and Madnes. of the Papiests toward PETER MARTYR's Wife at Oxford, who was taken up from her Grave at the Command of Cardinal POOLE, and afterwards buried in a Dunghill.

AND because one university should not mock the other, like cruelty was also declared upon the dead body of Peter Martyr's wife at Oxford, an honest, grave, and sober matron while she lived, and always a great helper of poor people, as many dwelling there can well testify.

In the year of our Lord 1552, she departed this life, with great sorrow of all those needy persons, whose necessities she had often liberally eased and relieved.
Now when Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, Nicholas Ormanet, datary, Robert Morwen, president of Corpus Christi college, Cole and Wright, doctors of the civil law, came thither as the cardinal's visitors, they, among other things, had in commission to take up this good woman out of her grave, and to consume her carcase with fire, not doubting but that she was of the same religion that her husband had professed before, when he read the king's lecture there. And to make a shew that they would do something disorderly, they called all those before them that had any acquaintance with her or her husband. They administered an oath to them, that they should not conceal whatsoever was demanded. In fine, their answer was, that they knew not what religion she was of, by reason they understood not her language.

To be short, after these visitors had sped their business they came for, they went to the cardinal again, certifying him, that upon due inquisition made, they could learn nothing upon which by the law they might burn her. Notwithstanding, the cardinal did not leave the matter so, but wrote down his letters a good while after to Marshall, then dean of Frideswide's, that he should dig her up; and lay her out of christian burial, because she was interred nigh unto St. Frideswide's relics; sometime had in great reverence in that college.

Dr. Marshall calling his spades and mattocks together in the evening, when he was well fuddled, caused her to be taken up and buried in a dunghill.

However, when it pleased God, under good queen Elizabeth, to give quietness to his church, long time persecuted with prison and death, then Dr. Parker, archbishop of Canterbury, Edmund Grindall, bishop of London, Richard Goodrick, with divers others her majesty's high commissioners in matters of religion, (nothing ignorant how far the adversaries of the truth had transgressed the bounds of all humanity, in violating the sepulchre or grave of that good and virtuous woman) willed certain of that college; in which this uncourteous fact was attempted or done, to take her out of the dunghill where she lay, and solemnly, in face of the town, to bury her again in a more decent grave: for though the body being once dead, no great estimation were to be had, where the bones were laid;
yet some reverence was to be used toward her for the sake of her sex. Besides, in fact, it was shameful, that he, after travelling so far at king Edward's request, from the place wherein he had dwelt quietly, and had taken so earnest pains, being an old man, in reading and setting forth the truth as far as he was able, with learning to teach and instruct, and so well deserved of that university, should, by so ungentle a recompence of ingratitude, be rewarded again, as to have his wife, who was a godly woman, a stranger, good to many, especially to the poor, and doing injury to no one, in word or deed, without just deserving, and contrary to their own law, not proceeding against her according to the order thereof, spitefully to be laid in a stinking dunghill.

To all good people the fact seemed odious, and of such indue with humanity, utterly to be detested.
Wherefore Mr. Calfield, sub-dean of the college, diligently provided, that from Marshall's dunghill she was restored and translated to her proper place again, yea, and withal coupled her with Frideswide's bones, that in case any cardinal will be so mad hereafter to remove this woman's bones again, it shall be hard for them to discern her bones from the other. And in order to inform the minds of men the better, the next day, being Sunday, Mr. Rogerson preached unto the people, in which sermon by the way he declared the cruel usage of the adversary, which not contented to practise upon the living, but they must also rage against one that was dead, and lain two years in her grave.
God grant them once to see their own wickedness.
Amen.

Thus much touching the noble acts and strangeness of this worthy cardinal in both the universities; whereunto it will not be impertinent here also consequently to adjoin and set forth to the eyes of the world the blind and bloody articles set out by cardinal Poole, to be inquired upon, within his diocese of Canterbury, whereby it may the better appear what yokes and snares of fond and fruitless traditions were laid upon the poor flock of Christ, to intangle and oppress them with loss of life and liberty. By which, wise men may see what godly fruits proceeded from that catholic church and see of Rome: in which, although thou seest (good reader) some good articles interspersed, let not that move thee; for else how could such poison be ministered, but it must have some honey to relish the reader's taste.

The Articles set forth by Cardinal POOLE, to be inquired upon in his ordinary Visitation, within his Diocese of Canterbury.

Touching the Clergy.

1. FIRST, Whether the divine service in the church at times, days, and hours, be observed and kept duly, or no.
2. Item, Whether the parsons, vicars, and curates, do

do comely and decently in their manners and doings behave themselves, or no.

3. Item, Whether they do reverently and duly administer the sacraments or sacramentals, or no.

4. Item, Whether any of the parishioners die without ministration of the sacraments, through the negligence of their curates, or no.

5. Item, Whether the said parsons, vicars, or curates, do haunt taverns or alehouses, increasing thereby infamy and slander, or no.

6. Item, Whether they be diligent in teaching the midwives how to christen children in time of necessity, according to the canons of the church, or no.

7. Item, Whether they see that the font be comely kept, and have holy water always ready for children to be christened.

8. Item, If they do keep a book of all the names of them that be reconciled to the duty of the church.

9. Item, Whether there be any priests that of late unlawfully had women under pretended marriage, and hitherto are not reconciled, and to declare their names and dwelling-places.

10. Item, Whether they do diligently teach their parishioners the articles of the faith, and the ten commandments.

11. Item, Whether they do decently observe those things that do concern the service of the church, and all those things that tend to a good and christian life, according to the canons of the church.

12. Item, Whether they do devoutly in their prayers, pray for the prosperous estate of the king and queen's majesties.

13. Item, Whether the said parsons and vicars do sufficiently repair their chancels, rectories, and vicarages, and do keep and maintain them sufficiently repaired and amended.

14. Item, Whether any of them do preach or teach any erroneous doctrine, contrary to the catholic faith and unity of the church.

15. Item, Whether any of them do say the divine service, or do administer the sacraments in the English tongue, contrary to the usual order of the church.

32. Item, Whether there be any hospitals within your parishes, and whether the foundations of them be duly and truly observed and kept; and whether the charitable contributions of the same be done accordingly.

33. Item, Whether any goods, plate, jewels, or possessions be taken away, or with-held from the said hospitals, and by whom.

An Account of Ten MARTYRS condemned and burnt within the Diocese of Canterbury.

MENTION was made a little before of the persecution in Kent: where we declared that 15 were imprisoned and condemned in the castle of Canterbury: of which 15 we declared five to be furnished to death within the said castle, and buried by the highway, about the beginning of November. The other ten in January, 1557, were committed unto the fire, and there consumed to ashes, by Thornton, suffragan of Dover, and Nicholas Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury.

Their names are as follow: John Philpot, of Tenterden, William Waterer, of Beddingden, Stephen Kempe, of Norgate, William Hay, of Hithe, Thomas Hudson, of Salenge, Matthew Bradbridge, of Tenterden, Thomas Stephens, of Beddingden, Nicholas Final, of Tenterden, W. Lowick, of Cranbroke, W. Prowting, of Thornham.

Of these ten godly martyrs, six were burnt at Canterbury about the 15th of January, that is, Kempe, Waterer, Prowting, Lowick, Hudson, and Hay. The other two, Stephens and Philpot, at Wye, about the same month. The other two, Final and Bradbridge, were burnt together at Ashford the 16th of the same.

What the ordinary articles were that were commonly objected to them of Canterbury diocese, is before rehearsed, save only that to some of these, as to them that follow after, as the time of their persecution did grow, so their articles withal did increase to the number of two and twenty, containing such like matter as seemed to the maintenance of the Romish see.

Their answers likewise to these articles need not be rehearsed, seeing they all agreed together, though not in the same form of words, yet to the same effect, &c.

The next month, which was February, came out another bloody commission from the king and queen, to kindle up the fire of persecution, as though it were not hot enough already; the contents of which commission I thought here not to omit; not for lack of matter, whereof I have too much; but that the reader may understand how kings and princes of this world, like as in the first persecutions of the primitive church under Valerian, Decius, Maximinian, Diocletian, Licinius, &c. so now in these latter perilous days, have set out all their main force and power, with laws, policy, and authority, to the uttermost they could devise against Christ and his gospel. Yet, notwithstanding all these laws, institutions, injunctions, and terrible proclamations provided against Christ and his gospel, he still continueth, his gospel flourisheth, and truth prevaileth; kings and emperors in their own purposes overthrown, their devices dissolved, their counsels confounded; as examples both of this and of all times and ages do make manifest. But now let us hear the intent of this commission, in tenor as follows:

PHILIP and Mary, by the grace of God king and queen of England, &c. To the right reverend father in God our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor Thomas, bishop of Ely, and to our right trusty and well-beloved William Windsor, knight, lord Windsor, Edward North, knight, lord North, and to our trusty and well-beloved counsellor J. Bourn, knight, one of our chief secretaries, J. Mordaunt, knight, Francis Englefield, knight, master of our wards and liveries, Edward Walgrave, knight, master of our great wardrobe, Nicholas Hare, knight, master of the rolls, Thomas Pope, knight, Roger Cholmley, knight, Richard Rede, knight, Rowland Hill, knight, William Rastal, serjeant at law, Henry Cole, clerk, dean of St. Paul's, William Roper, and Ralph Cholmley, esquires, William Cook, Thomas Martin, John Story, and John Vaughan, doctors of the law, greeting.

Forasmuch as divers devilish and slanderous persons have not only invented, noised, and set forth divers false rumours, tales, and seditious slanders against Us, but also have sown divers heresies, and heretical opinions, and set forth divers seditious books within this Our realm of England, meaning thereby to stir up division, strife, contention, and sedition, not only amongst Our loving subjects, but also betwixt Us and Our said subjects, with divers other outrageous misdemeanours, enormities, contempts and offences, daily committed and done, to the disquieting of Us and Our people, We, minding the due punishment of such offenders, and the repressing of such like offences, enormities, and misbehaviours from henceforth, having special trust and confidence in your fidelities, wisdoms and discretions, have authorised, appointed and assigned you to be Our commissioners, and by these presents do give full power and authority unto you, or any three of you, to inquire as well by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men, as by witnesses and all other means and politic ways you can devise, of all and singular heretical opinions, lollardies, heretical and seditious books, concealments, contempts, conspiracies, and all false rumours, tales, seditious and slanderous words or sayings, raised, published, bruited, invented, or set forth against Us, or either of Us, or against the quiet governance and rule of Our people and subjects, by books, lies, tales, or otherwise, in any county, bowing, key, or other place or places, within this Our realm of England or elsewhere, in any place or places beyond the sea, and of the bringers-in, utterers, buyers, sellers, readers, keepers, or conveyers of any such letter, books, rumour and tale, and of all and every their coadjutors, counsellors, comforters, procurers, abettors, and maintainers, giving unto you, or any three of you, full power and authority by virtue hereof, to search out and take into your possessions, all manner of heretical and seditious books, letters, and writings, where they or any of them shall be found, as well in printers' houses and shops as elsewhere, willing you and every of you to search for the same in all places according to your discretions.

Also to inquire, hear, and determine all and singular enormities, disturbances, misbehaviours, and negligences committed in any church, chapel, or other hallowed place within this realm, and also for and concerning the taking away or with-holding any lands, tenements, goods, ornaments, stocks of money, or other things belonging to every of the said churches and chapels, and all accounts and reckonings concerning the same.

And also to inquire and search out all such persons as obstinately refuse to receive the blessed sacrament of the altar, to hear mass, or come to their parish churches, or other convenient places appointed for divine service, vice, and all such as refuse to go in procession to take holy bread or holy water, or otherwise do misbehave themselves in any church or other hallowed place, wheresoever any of the same offences have been, or hereafter shall be committed within Our said realm.

Nevertheless, Our will and pleasure is, that when, and as often as any person or persons, hereafter being called or convened before you, do obstinately persist or stand in any kind of heresy, or heretical opinion, that then you or three of you do immediately order, that the same person or persons, so standing or persisting, be delivered and committed to his ordinary, to be used according to the spiritual and ecclesiastical laws.

And also we give unto you, or three of you, full power and authority to inquire and search out all vagabonds, and masterless men, barrators, quarrellers, and suspected persons, abiding within Our city of London and ten miles compass of the same, and all assaults and affrays done and committed within the same city and compass.

And further to search out all wastes, decays, and ruins of churches, chancels, chapels, parsonages, and vicarages in the diocese of the same, being within this realm, giving you, and every of you, full power and authority by virtue hereof to hear and determine the same, and all other offences and matters above specified and rehearsed, according to your wisdoms, consciences, and discretions, willing and commanding you, or three of you, from time to time, to use and devise all politic ways and means, for the trial and searching out of the premises, as by you, or three of you, shall be thought most expedient and necessary: and upon inquiry and due proof had, known, perceived, and tried out, by the confession of the parties, or by sufficient witnesses before you, or three of you, concerning the premises or any part thereof, or by any other ways or means requisite, to give and award such punishment to the offenders, by fine, imprisonment, or otherwise, and to take such order for redress and reformation of the premises, as to your wisdoms shall be thought meet and convenient.

Further willing and commanding you and every three of you, in case you shall find any person or persons obstinate or disobedient, either in their appearance before you, or three of you, at your calling or assignment, or else in not accomplishing or obeying your decrees, orders, and commandments, in any thing or things, touching the premises or any part thereof, to commit the said person or persons so offending to ward, there to remain, till by you, or three of you, he be discharged or delivered, &c.

The Apprehension of twenty-two Prisoners in Essex.

AFTER this bloody proclamation or commission thus given out at London, which was the eighth day of February, in the third and fourth years of the reign of the king and queen, these new inquisitors, especially some of them, began to ruffle, and to take upon them not a little; so that all quarters were full of persecution, and prisons almost full of prisoners; namely, in the diocese of Canterbury, whereof (by the leave of Christ) we will say more presently.

In the mean time, about the town of Colchester, the wind of persecution began fiercely to rise; insomuch that three and twenty together, men and women, were apprehended at one time; of which number one escaped; the other twenty-two were driven up like a flock of christian lambs to London, with two or three leaders with them at most, ready to give their skins to be plucked off for the gospel's sake. Notwithstanding the bishops, afraid perhaps of the number, to put so many at once to death, sought means to deliver them, and so they did, drawing out a very easy submission for them, or rather suffering them to draw it out themselves; notwithstanding divers of them were afterwards taken again and suffered, as (God willing) ye shall hear hereafter. Such as met them by the way coming up, saw them in the fields scattering in such sort, as that they might easily have escaped away. And when they entered into the towns, their keepers called them again into array, to go two and two together, having a band or line going between them, they holding the same in their hands, every one having another cord about his arm, as though they were tied. And so were these fourteen men and eight women carried up to London, the people by the way praying to God for them, to give them strength. At their entering into London, they were pinioned, and so came into the city. But first let us declare concerning their being taken and their attachers, contained in the commissary's letter written to Bonner; then the indenture made between the commissioners and the popish commissary. The letter of the commissary is this:

AFTER my duty done in receiving and accomplishing your honourable and most loving letters, dated August 7, be it known unto your lordship, that on the 28th of August, the lord of Oxenford, lord Darcy, H. Tyrel, A. Brown, W. Bendlows, E. Tyrel, R. Weston, R. Appleton, published their commission, to seize the lands, tenements, and goods of the fugitives, so that the owners should have neither use nor advantage thereof, but by inventory remain in safe keeping, until the cause was determined. And also there was likewise proclaimed the queen's warrant for the restitution of the church goods within Colchester, and the hundreds thereabout, to the use of God's service. And then were called the parishes particularly, and the heretics partly committed to my examination. And that divers persons should certify to me of the ornaments of their churches, betwixt this and the justices' next appearance, which shall be on Michaelmas next. And the parishes which had presented at two several times, to have all ornaments with other things in good order, were exonerated for ever, till they were warned again, and others to make their appearance from time to time. And those names blotted in the indenture, were indicted for treason, fugitives, or disobedience; and were put forth by Mr. Brown's commandment. And before the sealing, my lord Darcy said unto me apart, and Mr. Bendlows, that I should have sufficient time to send unto your lordship, and, if need were, the heretics to remain in confinement till I heard from you, yea, till the lords legates grace commissioners come into the country.

And Mr. Brown came unto my lord Darcy's house and parlour belonging to Mr. Barnaby, before my said lord and all the justices, and laid his hand on my shoulder, with a smiling countenance, and desired me to make his hearty commendations to your good lordship, and asked me if I would: I said, Yea, with a good will. Wherefore I was glad, and thought I should not have been charged with so sudden carriage.

But after dinner, the justices counselled with the bailiffs, and the jailors, and then after took me unto them, and made collation of the indentures, and sealed them; and then Mr. Brown commanded me this afternoon, being the 30th of August, to go and receive my prisoners by-and-by. Then I said, It is an unreasonable commandment, for I have attended on you here these three days, and this Sunday early I have sent home my men. Wherefore I desire you to have a convenient time appointed, wherein I may know whether it will please my lord, my master, to send his commissioners hither, or that I shall make carriage of them unto his lordship. Then Mr. Brown said, We are certified that the council have written to your master to make speed, and to rid these prisoners out of hand: therefore go receive your prisoners in haste. I answered, Sir, I shall receive them within these ten days. Then Mr. Brown said, The limitation lieth in us, and not in you, wherefore get you hence.

I replied, Sir, you have indicted and delivered me by this indenture, whose faith or opinions I knew not, trusting that you will grant me a time to examine them, lest I should punish the catholics. Well, said Mr. Brown, for that cause you shall have time betwixt this and Wednesday. And I say unto you, Mess.

Bailiffs,

Bailiffs, if he do not receive them at your hands on Wednesday, set open your door, and let them go.

Then I said, My lord, and masters all, I promise to discharge the town and country of these heretics within these ten days. The lord Darcy answered, Commissary, we do and must all agree in one: wherefore do you receive them on or before Wednesday.

To which I replied, My lord, the last I carried, I was going betwixt the castle and St. Catherine's chapel two hours and a half, and in great press and danger; wherefore this may be to desire your lordship, to give in commandment unto Mr. Sayer, my bailiff, here present, to aid me through his liberties, not only with men and weapons, but that the town-clerk may be ready with his book to write the names of the most busy persons, and this upon three hours warning; all which both my lord and Mr. Brown commanded.

The 31st of August, William Goodwin, of Muchbirch, husbandman, this bringer, and Thomas Alsey, of Copford, your lordship's apparator of your consistory in Colchester, covenanted with me, that they should hire two other men at the least, whereof one should be a bow-man, to come to me the next day at two of the clock in the afternoon, that I might recite this bargain before Mr. Archdeacon, and pay the money, that is, forty-six shillings and eightpence: wherefore they should then go forth with me unto Colchester, and on Wednesday, before three of the clock in the morning, receive there at my hand within the castle and mote-hall, fourteen men and eight women, bound with cords and fetters, and drive, carry, or lead and feed with meat and drink, as heretics ought to be found continually, until the said Goodwin and Alsey shall cause the said two and twenty persons to be delivered to my lord of London's officers, and within the safe keeping of my said lord, then to bring unto me the said fetters, with a perfect token of or from my said lord, and then this covenant is void, or else, &c.

Mr. Bendlows said unto me in my lord of Oxenford's chamber, at the King's-head, after I had said mass before the lords, that on the morrow after Holy-Rood day, when we shall meet at Chelmsford for the division of these lands, I think, Mr. Archdeacon, you, and Mr. Smith, shall be fain to ride with certain of the jury to those portions and manors in your part of Essex, and in like case divide yourselves, to tread and view the ground with the quest, or else I think they will not labour the matter, and so tell Mr. Archdeacon.

Alice, the wife of William Walley, of Colchester, hath submitted herself, abjured her erroneous opinions, asked absolution, promised to do her solemn penance in her parish church at St. Peter's on Sunday next, and to continue a catholic and a faithful woman as long as God shall spare her life. And for these covenants her husband standeth bound in five pounds: which Alice is one of the nine women of your indenture, and she is with child. Wherefore she remaineth at home, and this done in the presence of the bailiffs, aldermen, and town-clerk. And because Mr. Brown was certified there was no curate at Lexdon, he inquired who was the former? The answer was, sir Francis Jobson. Who is the parson? The quest-men answered, sir Roger Ghosflow. When was he with you? Not these fourteen years. How is your cure served? Now-and-then. Who is the patron? My lord of Arundel. And within a short time after, sir Francis Jobson came with great courtesy to my lord Darcy's place; and I saw no more come in.

Sir Robert Smith, priest, some time canon of Bridlington, now curate of Appledore in the wild of Kent, came to Colchester the 28th of August, with his wife big with child, of late divorced, taken on suspicion, examined by the lords, and Mr. Brown told me that they have received letters from the council for the attachment of certain persons, and especially of one, priest, whose name is Pullen (but his right name is Smith), doubting this priest to be the same Pullen, though neither he nor his wife would confess the same.

Wherefore he still lieth in prison, but surely this is not Pullen. If it please your lordship to have in remembrance, that the householders might be compelled to bring every man his own wife to her own seat in the church in time of divine service, it would profit much. Also, there be yet standing hospitals, and others of like foundation, about Colchester, which I have not known to appear at any visitation, as the masters and lazars of Mary Magdalen in Colchester, the proctor of St. Catherine's chapel in Colchester, the hospital or bread-house of the foundation of the lord H. Harney in Laremary, the hospital and beadmen of Little Horksley. Thus presuming on your lordship's goodness, I am more than bold ever to trouble you with this worldly business, beseeching Almighty God to send your honourable lordship a condign reward.

From Eastthorp, this present 30th of August.

We found a letter concerning the marriage of priests in the hands of the aforesaid sir Robert Smith. Also I desired Mr. Brown, the doer of all things, to require the audience to bring in their unlawful writings and books; who asked me, if I had made the proclamation. I said, Yea. Then he said openly upon the bench, that they should be proclaimed once every quarter. And then take the constables and officers, and they take and punish the offenders accordingly.

By your poor beadman,

John Kingston, priest.

An Indenture made between the Lords and Justices within specified, and BONNER's Commissary, concerning the Delivery of the Prisoners above-named.

The twenty-two afore said prisoners thus sent from Colchester to London, were brought at length to bishop Bonner; concerning whom Bonner himself writeth to cardinal Poole, in the following manner:

A Letter of Bishop BONNER to Cardinal POOLE.

MAY it please your grace, with my most humble obedience, reverence, and duty to understand, that going to London on Thursday last, and thinking to be troubled with Mr. Germaine's matter only, and such other common matters as are accustomed, enough to weary a right strong body, I had the day following, to comfort my strength withal, letters from Colchester, that either that day or the day following, I should have sent me from thence twenty-two heretics, indicted before the commissioners, and indeed so I had, and compelled to bear their charges as I did of the others, both of which cost me above twenty nobles, a sum of money that I thought full evil bestowed. And these heretics, notwithstanding they had honest catholic keepers to conduct and bring them up to me, and all the way from Colchester to Stratford-le-Bow, did go quietly and obediently, yet coming to Stratford they began to take heart of grace, and to do as pleased themselves, for they began to have their guard, which generally increased till they came to Aldgate, where they were lodged on Friday night.

And although I took order that the said heretics should be with me very early on Saturday morning, to the intent they might quietly come and be examined by me; yet it was between ten and eleven of the clock before they would come, and they would take no way but through Cheapside, so that they were brought to my house with about a thousand persons: which thing I took very strange, and spake to sir John Gressham, being then with me, to tell the mayor and the sheriffs that this thing was not well suffered in the city. These wicked heretics, all the way they came through Cheapside, both exhorted the people to their part, and had much comfort from the promiscuous multitude; and being entered into my house, and talked withal, they shewed themselves desperate, and very obstinate; yet I used all the honest means I could, both of myself and others, to win them, causing divers learned men to talk with them; and finding in them nothing but pride and wilfulness, I thought to have had them all hither to Fulham, to give sentence against them. Nevertheless, perceiving by my last doing that your grace was offended, I thought it my duty before I proceeded herein, first to inform your grace hereof, and know your pleasure, which I beseech your grace I may do by this trusty bearer. And thus most humbly I take my leave of you, beseeching Almighty God to preserve the same. At Fulham, Anno 1556.

Your grace's most bounden headsmen and servant,
Edmund Bonner.

By this letter of bishop Bonner to the cardinal, is to be understood what good-will was in this bishop to have the blood of these men, and to have passed sentence of condemnation against them, had not the cardinal somewhat (as it seemed) stayed his fervent headiness. Concerning which cardinal, though it cannot be denied by his acts and writings, that he was a professed enemy, and a reputed papist; yet it is to be supposed that he was none of the cruel sort of papists, as may appear by staying the rage of this bishop, as well as by the solicitous writing, and long letters written to Cranmer, also by the complaints of certain papists, accusing him to the pope, of being a bearer with the heretics, and by the pope's letters sent to him upon the same, calling him to Rome, and setting friar Peto in his place, had not queen Mary, by intreaty, kept him out of the pope's danger. Which letters I have (if need be) to shew; besides, that it is thought of him that toward his latter end, just before his coming from Rome to England, he began somewhat to favour the doctrine of Luther, and was no less suspected at Rome: yea, he there converted a certain learned Spaniard from papism to Luther's side; notwithstanding the pomp and glory of the world afterward induced him to play the papist as he did. But enough of this cardinal.

To return to this godly company: first, ye have heard how they were brought up in bands to London; also, how Bonner was about to have read the sentence of death upon them, and how he was stopped by the cardinal, ye know. Touching their confession, which they articulated up in writing, it were too tedious to recite it at length. Briefly touching the article of the Lord's supper (for which they were chiefly troubled) they wrote as follows:

The Supper of the Lord.

WHEREAS Christ, at his last supper, took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to his disciples, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body:" and likewise took the cup and thanked, &c. we understand it to be a figurative speech, the most part of his language being in parables and dark sentences, that they which are carnally minded should see with their eyes and not perceive, and hear with their ears, and not understand; signifying this, that as he did break the bread among them, being but one loaf, and they all were partakers thereof, so we, through his body, in that it was broken, and offered upon the cross for us, are all partakers thereof, and his blood cleanseth us from all our sins, and hath pacified God's wrath toward us, and made the atonement between God and us, if we walk henceforth in the light, even as he is the true light.

And in that he said further, "Do this in remembrance of me," it is a memorial and token of the suffering and death of Jesus Christ: and he commanded it for this cause, that the congregation of Christ should come together to shew his death, and to thank and laud him for all his benefits, and magnify his holy name, and so to break the bread, and drink the wine, in remembrance that Christ had given his body, and shed his blood for us.

Thus you may well perceive, though Christ called the bread his body, and the wine his blood, yet it followeth not, that the substance of his body should be in the bread and wine; as divers places in scripture are spoken by Christ and the apostles in like phrase of speech, as in John xv. "I am the true vine." Also, in John x. "I am the door." And as it is written, in the 9th chapter to the Hebrews, and in Exod. xxiv. how Moses took the blood of the calves, and sprinkled both the book and all the people, saying, "This is the blood of the covenant or testament." Also, in the 5th of Ezekiel, how the Lord said unto him concerning the third part of his hair, "This is Jerusalem," &c.

Thus we see the scriptures how they are spoken in figures, and ought to be spiritually examined, and not as they would have us say, that the bodily presence of Christ is in the bread, which is a blasphemous understanding of the godly word, and is contrary to all holy scriptures. Also we do see that great idolatry is sprung out of the carnal understanding of the words of Christ, "This is my body," and daily springeth, to the great dishonour of God; so that men worship a piece of bread for God, yea, and hold that as their Maker.

After this confession of their faith and doctrine being written and exhibited, they devised a letter withal, in manner of a short supplication, or rather an admonition to the judges and commissioners, requiring that justice and judgment, after the rule of God's word, might be ministered unto them: the copy of which letter I thought good also to shew unto the reader in form as followeth:

A Supplication of the Prisoners to the Judges.

TO the right honourable audience, whom these our simple writings, and the confession of our faith, shall come to be heard or seen, we poor prisoners, being fast in bonds upon the trial of our faith, which we offer to be tried by the scriptures, pray most heartily, that forasmuch as God hath given you power and strength over us concerning our bodies, under whom we submit ourselves as obedient subjects in all things due, you being officers and rulers of the people, may execute true judgment, keep the laws of righteousness, govern the people according to right, hear the poor and helpless in truth, and defend their cause.

God, for his Son Jesus Christ's sake, give you the wisdom and understanding of Solomon, David, Hezekiah, Moses, with divers other most virtuous rulers, by whose wisdom and godly understanding, the people were justly ruled and governed in the fear of God, all wickedness was by them overthrown and beaten down, and all goodness and virtue did flourish and spring. O God, which art the most high, the creator and maker of all things, and of all men both great and small, and carest for all alike, who dost try all men's works and imaginations, before whose judgment-seat shall come both high and low, rich and poor: we most humbly beseech thee to put into our rulers' hearts the pure love and fear of thy name, that even as they themselves would be judged, and as they shall make answer before thee, so may they hear our causes, judge with mercy, and read over these our requests and confessions of our faith, with deliberation and a godly judgment.

And if any thing here seemeth to your honourable audience to be erroneous or disagreeing to the scripture, if it shall please your lordship to hear us patiently, which do offer ourselves to the scriptures, thereby to make answer and be tried, in so doing we poor subjects being in much captivity and bondage, are most bound to pray for your noble estate and preservation.

The request of these men being so just, and their doctrine so sound, yet all this could not prevail with the bishop and other judges, but that sentence should have proceeded against them immediately, had not the goodness of the Lord better provided for his servants than the bishop had intended. For as they were now under the edge of the axe, ready to be condemned by sentence, it was thought otherwise by the cardinal, and some other wiser heads; fearing, lest by the death of so many together, some disturbance might arise among the people; so it was decreed among themselves, that they should rather make some submission or confession such as they would themselves, and so be sent home again, as they were indeed: however, divers of them were afterward apprehended and put to death. In the mean time, touching their submission which they made, it was in the following form:

The Submission or Confession of the aforesaid Prisoners.

BECAUSE our Saviour Christ at his last supper took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it unto his disciples, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you, this do in remembrance of me;" therefore, according to the words of our Saviour Jesus Christ, we do believe in the sacrament to be Christ's body. And because he took the cup, gave thanks, and gave it to his disciples, and said, "This is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for many;" therefore likewise we do believe that it is the blood of Christ, according as Christ's church doth administer the same. Unto which catholic church of Christ we do in this as in all other matters submit ourselves, promising therein to live as it becometh good christian men, and here in this realm to use ourselves as it becometh faithful subjects unto our most gracious king and queen, and to all other superiors, both spiritual and temporal, according to our bounden duties.

No. 49.

The names of those who subscribed to this submission were these:

An Account of Five godly MARTYRS, burnt at one Fire in Smithfield, on the 12th Day of April, 1557.

TO proceed further in this history of persecuted martyrs, next follow these five, namely—

Thomas Loseby,	Margaret Hide,
Henry Ramsey,	and
Thomas Thirtell,	Agnes Stanley,

Who being, some by the lord Rich, some by other justices of the peace, and constables (their own neighbours), at the first accused and apprehended for not coming to their parish churches, were in the end sent unto Bonner, bishop of London, and by his commandment, on the 27th of January, were examined before Dr. Darbyshire, then chancellor to the said bishop, upon the former general articles mentioned.

Answers to the Articles.

WHOSE answers thereunto were, that as they confessed there was one true and catholic church, wherein they stedfastly believed, and thought the church of Rome to be no part or member; so in the same church they believed there were but two sacraments, that is to say, baptism and the Lord's supper. However, some of them attributed the title and honour of a sacrament to the holy estate of matrimony, which undoubtedly was done rather out of simple ignorance than of any wilful opinion, and are thereof to be adjudged as before is admonished.

Moreover, they acknowledged themselves to be baptized into the faith of that true church, as in the third article is specified. And here, in reading, as well these articles as the rest, mark, I beseech you, the subtlety of these catholic companions, who, intermixing certain points of faith, and of the true church, with the idolatrous and superstitious trash of their Romish synagogue, caused the poor and simple people, for lack of knowledge, oftentimes to fall into their crafty nets.

For after they had made them grant a true church, with the sacraments of the same, though not in such a number as they would have them, and also that they were christened in the faith thereof, that is, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, they craftily now in their other objections, descending, as it were, from the faith of the Trinity unto their idolatrous mass and other superstitious ceremonies, would make them grant, that now in denying thereof, they have severed themselves from the faith of the true church, wherinto they were baptized, which is most false: for though the true light of God's gospel and holy word was marvellously darkened, and in a manner utterly extinguished, yet the true faith of the Trinity, by the merciful providence of God, was still preserved, and into the faith thereof were they baptized, and not into the belief and profession of their horrible idolatry and vain ceremonies.

These things not thoroughly weighed by these poor, yet faithful and true members of Christ, caused some of them ignorantly to grant, that when they came to the years of discretion, and understood the light of the gospel, they did separate themselves from the faith of the church, meaning none other but only to separate themselves from admitting or allowing of such their popish and erroneous trash as they now had defiled the church of England with, and not from their faith received in baptism, which in express words, in their answers to the other articles they constantly affirmed, declaring the mass and sacrament of the altar to be most wicked blasphemy against Jesus Christ, and contrary to the truth of his gospel, and therefore they utterly refused to assent unto them, or to be reconciled again thereunto.

These answers in effect being thus taken by the said chancellor, they were for that time dismissed; but the bishop, taking the matter into his own hands, the 6th of March, propounded unto them certain other new articles; the copy whereof here followeth:

Other Articles objected by BONNER, Bishop of LONDON, against THOMAS LOSEBY, HENRY RAMSEY, THOMAS THIRTELL, MARGARET HIDE, and AGNES STANLEY, the 6th of March, being the second Time of Examination.

FIRST, That thou hast thought, believed and spoken, within some part of the city and diocese of London, that the faith, religion, and ecclesiastical service here observed and kept, as it is in the realm of England, is not a true and laudable faith, religion, and service, especially concerning the mass, and the seven sacraments, nor is agreeable to God's word and testament; and thou canst not find in thy heart, without murmuring, grudging, or scruple, to receive and use it, and to conform thyself unto it, as other subjects of this realm customably have done and do.

2. Item, That thou hast thought, &c. that the English service set forth in the time of king Edward the Sixth, here in this realm of England, was and is good and godly, and catholic in all points, and that it alone ought here in this realm to be received, used, and practised, and none other.

3. Item, Likewise thou hast thought, &c. that thou art not bound to come to thy parish church, and there to be present, and hear mattins, mass, even-song, and other divine service, sung or said there.

4. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that thou art not bound to come in procession to the church upon days and times appointed, and to go in the same with others of the parish, singing or saying then the accustomed prayers used in the church, nor to bear a taper or candle on Candlemas day, nor take ashes on Ash-Wednesday, nor to creep to the cross upon accustomed days, nor to receive and kiss the pyx at mass-time, nor to receive holy water and holy bread, nor to accept and allow the ceremonies and usages of the church, after the manner and fashion as they are used in this realm.

5. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that thou art not bound at any time to confess thy sins to any priest, and to receive absolution at his hands, as God's minister, nor to receive at any time the blessed sacrament of the altar, especially as it is used in this church of England.

6. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that in matters of religion and faith, thou must follow and believe thine own conscience only, and not give credit to the determination and common order of the catholic church, and the see of Rome, nor to any member thereof.

7. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that all things do chance of an absolute and precise mere necessity, so that whether man do well or evil, he could not chuse but do so, and that therefore no man hath any free-will at all.

8. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that the fashion and manner of christening infants is not agreeable to God's word, and that none can be effectually baptized, and thereby saved, except he be of years of discretion to believe himself, and so willingly accept or refuse baptism at his pleasure.

9. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that prayers to saints, or prayers for the dead, avail nothing, and are not allowable by God's word, or profitable in any wise, and that the souls departed do go straight to heaven or hell, or else do sleep till the day of doom, so that there is no place of purgation at all.

10. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that all such as in the time of king Henry the Eighth, or in the time of queen Mary in England, have been burned as heretics, were no heretics at all, but faithful and good christian people; especially Barnes, Garret, Jerome, Frith, Rogers, Hooper, Cardmaker, Latimer, Taylor, Bradford, Philpot, Cranmer, Ridley, and such like; and that thou didst and dost allow, like, and approve all their opinions, and dost mislike their condemnations and burnings.

11. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that fasting and prayers used in this church of England, and the appointing of days for fasting, and the abstaining from flesh upon fasting-days, and especially in the time of Lent, is not laudable or allowable by God's word, but is hypocrisy and foolishness; and that men ought to have liberty to eat at all times all kinds of meat.

12. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that the sacrament of the altar is an idol, and to reserve and keep it, or to honour it, is plain idolatry and superstition; and likewise of the mass and elevation of the sacrament.

13. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that thou or any else, convented before an ecclesiastical judge concerning matters of belief and faith, are not, nor is bound to make answer at all, especially under an oath upon a book.

Their Answers to the above Articles.

CONCERNING the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, ninth, tenth, and twelfth, they generally granted unto, saving that they denied the souls of the departed to sleep till the day of judgment, as is mentioned in the ninth article.

And as concerning the sixth objection, they thought themselves bound to believe the true catholic church, so far forth as the same doth instruct them according to God's holy word, but not to follow the determinations of the erroneous and Babylonical church of Rome.

As for the seventh, eighth, and thirteenth, they utterly denied, that ever they were of any such absurd opinions as are contained therein, but they granted that man of himself, without the help and assistance of God's Holy Spirit, hath no power to do any good thing acceptable in God's sight.

To the eleventh they said, that true fasting and prayer, used according to God's word, are allowable and available in his sight, and that by the same word every faithful man may eat all meats at all times, with thanksgiving to God for the same.

After this, the 1st of April, they were again convented before the bishop in his palace at London, where little appeareth to be done, except it were to know whether they would stand to their answers, and whether they would recant or no. But when they refused to recant, and deny the received and infallible truth, the bishop caused them to be brought into the open consistory, the third of the same month of April in the forenoon, where first understanding by them their immutable constancy and steadfastness, he demanded particularly of every one what he had to say, why he should not pronounce the sentence of condemnation.

To whom Thomas Loseby first answered, God give me grace and strength to stand against you and your sentence, and your law, which devourereth the flock of Christ. And I perceive there is no way with me but death, except I would consent to your devouring law, and believe in that idol the mass.

Next

Next unto him answered Thomas Thirtell, saying, My lord, I say thus, if you make me an heretic, then you make Christ and all the twelve apostles heretics; for I am in the true faith and right belief, and I will stand in it, for I know full well I shall have eternal life therefore.

The bishop then asked the like question of Henry Ramsey; who said again, My lord, will you have me to go from the truth that I am in? I say unto you, that my opinions be the very truth, which I will stand unto; and I say unto you further, that there are two churches upon the earth, and we (meaning himself and other true martyrs and professors of Christ) be of the true church, and ye be not.

Unto this question next answered Margaret Hide, saying, My lord, you have no cause to give sentence against me, for I am in the true faith and opinion, and will never forsake it: and I do wish that I were more strong in it than I am.

Last of all answered Agnes Stanley, and said, I had rather every hair of my head were burned, if it were of ever so much value, sooner than I will forsake my faith and opinion, which is the true faith:

The time being now spent, they were commanded to appear again in the afternoon in the same place: which commandment being obeyed, the bishop first called for Loseby, and after his manner ordered his articles and answers to be read: in reading whereof, when mention was made of the sacrament of the altar, the bishop with his colleagues put off their caps. Whereat Loseby said, My lord, seeing you put off your cap, I will put on mine; and accordingly put it on. The bishop continuing in his accustomed persuasions, Loseby again said, My lord, I trust I have the Spirit of truth, which you detest and abhor, for the wisdom of God is foolishness unto you. Whereupon the bishop pronounced the sentence of condemnation against him.

And delivering him unto the sheriff, called for Margaret Hide, with whom he used the like order or exhortations. To whom she said, I will not depart from my sayings till I be burnt: and, my lord, said she, I would wish you to instruct me with some part of God's word, and not of the holy bread and holy water, for it is no part of the scripture.

But neither himself nor any of his colleagues, being able rightly to accomplish her request, to make short work, used his final reason of conviction, which was the sentence of condemnation. Therefore, leaving her off, called for Agnes Stanley, who, upon the bishop's like persuasions, made this answer:

My lord, where you say I am an heretic, I am none; neither will I believe you, nor any man that is wise will believe as you do. And as for those that you say were burnt for heresy, I believe them true martyrs before God: therefore I will not go from my opinion and faith as long as I live.

Her talk thus ended, she received the like reward that the others had. And the bishop then turning his tale and manner of enticement unto Thomas Thirtell, received of him likewise this final answer: My lord, I will not hold with your idolatrous ways; for I say, the mass is idolatry, and will stick to my faith and belief so long as the breath is in my body. Upon which words he also was condemned as an heretic.

Last of all Henry Ramsey was demanded if he would, as the rest, stand unto his answers, or else recanting the same, come home again, and be a member of their church. Whereunto he answered, I will not go from my religion and belief as long as I live; and, my lord (said he), your doctrine is naught, for it is not agreeable to God's word.

After these words, the bishop (to conclude) pronounced the sentence of condemnation against him and the rest (as you have heard), charging the sheriffs of London with them: who being thereunto commanded, the 12th of the same month of April, brought them into Smithfield, where they all in one fire most joyfully and constantly ended their temporal lives, receiving therefore the life eternal.

An Account of Three MARTYRS burned in St. George's Fields, in Southwark.

IN the month of May following, William Morant, Stephen Gratwick, ——— King, suffered in St. George's Fields, in Southwark.

Among other histories of the persecuted and condemned saints of God, I find the condemnation of none more strange nor unlawful than this of Stephen Gratwick; who first was condemned by the bishop of Winchester and the bishop of Rochester, who were not his ordinaries.

Secondly, When he did appeal from these incompetent judges to his right ordinary, his appeal could not be admitted.

Thirdly, When they had no other shift to colour their inordinate proceedings withal, they suborned one of the priests to come in for a counterfeit and a false ordinary, and sit upon him.

Fourthly, Being openly convinced and overturned in his own arguments, yet Dr. White, the said bishop of Winchester, neither would yield to the force of truth, nor suffer any of the audience assistant once to say, God strengthen him.

Fifthly, As they brought in a false ordinary to sit upon him, so they pretended false articles against him, which were no part of his examinations, but of their devising, to have his blood.

Sixthly and lastly, Having no other ground nor just matters against him, but only for saying these words, "That which I said, I have said," they read the sentence of death upon him.

And thus did these men deal, who needs will be reputed for catholic fathers of the spirituality, successors of the apostles, disciples of Christ, pillars of the holy church, and leaders of the people. Of whose proceedings, how agreeable they are to the example of Christ and his apostles, I leave to discuss, referring the judgment hereof to them who know the institution of Christ's religion and doctrine.

Now, lest the disordered mis-rule of these Christmas lords will not be credited upon the simple narration of the story, you shall hear the whole discourse of this process, registered by the hand of the martyr himself, who, as he could best tell what was done, so I am sure he would not testify otherwise than the truth was, as you shall hear by his declaration.

ON the 25th day of May, in the year 1557, I Stephen Gratwick came before Dr. White, bishop of Winchester, in St. George's church, Southwark, at eight o'clock in the morning, and then he called me before him, and said unto me—

Winchester. Stephen Gratwick, how standeth the matter with thee now? Art thou contented to revoke thy heresies, which thou hast maintained and defended within my diocese, oftentimes before me? Also upon Sunday last you stood up in the face of the whole church maintaining your heresies, so that you have offended within the liberty of my diocese: and now I being your ordinary, you must answer to me directly, whether you will revoke them or not, which I have here in writing; and if you will not revoke them, then I will excommunicate you, and therefore note well what you do, for now I read the articles against you.

And when he had ended, he bade me answer unto them.

Gratwick. My lord, these articles which you have here objected against me, are not mine, but of your own making; for I never had any of my examinations tions written at any time, and therefore these are the objections that you lay against me as a snare to get my blood. Wherefore, I desire your lawful favour, to allow my appeal to mine ordinary; for I have nothing to do with you. And whereas you do burden me, that I have offended within your diocese, I say, it is not so; for I have not enterprised either to preach or teach within your diocese, but was apprehended by mine own bishop, and sent prisoner into your diocese, by the consent of the council and mine own ordinary; and therefore I so being in your diocese, you have no cause to refuse my lawful appeal.

And with that came the bishop of Rochester, (whom the bishop of Winchester gladly received) according to their determinate purpose; and so followed the archdeacon of Canterbury: and the bishop again started up, as a man half ravished of his wits for joy, embracing him with many gentle words, and said, he was very glad of his coming, making ignorant thereof, as he thought it should appear to me. Then said Winchester—

Sir, I am very glad of your coming; for here I have one before me, who hath appealed unto you, being his ordinary. Then said the archdeacon of Canterbury—

I know this man very well. He hath been divers times before me. And I answered—

My lord, I am not of his diocese by five miles: for his diocese reacheth on that part no farther than the cliffs of Lewes, and I dwelt at Brighthelmstone, five miles beyond, in the diocese of the bishop of Chichester; and therefore I am not of his diocese.

Then the bishop of Winchester, the bishop of Rochester, and the archdeacon of Canterbury, cast their heads together and laughed: and then they said my ordinary would be here by-and-by; and so they sent for a counterfeit, instead of mine ordinary: then I saw them laugh; when I spoke to them, and said—

Why do you laugh? Are you confederate together for my blood, and therein triumph? You have more cause to look weightily upon the matter; for I stand here before you upon my life and death. But you declare yourselves what you are: for you are clothed in lamb's apparel; but I would to God you had coats according to your assembly here, which is scarlet gowns, for I do here perceive you are bent to have my blood.

And then came rushing in that counterfeited bishop, who was the hired servant to deliver me into the hands of the high-priest; and the bishop hearing him come, with haste inquired of his man who was there? and he said, My lord of Chichester. Then the bishop in haste rose up and said—

You are most heartily welcome; and required him to sit down: and then said the bishop of Winchester to me, Lo, here is your ordinary; what have you now to say to him?

Gratwick. I have nothing to say to him. If he has nothing to say to me, I pray you let me depart. Then answered my counterfeit ordinary, and said—

Here you stand before my lords and me in trial of your faith; and if you bring the truth, we shall by compulsion give place unto you, as it is to be proved by the word; and your doctrine to be heard and embraced for a truth.

Gratwick. Then I demanded of him whether he meant by authority, or by the judgment of the Spirit of God in his members.

And he answered me, By authority as well as by the Spirit.

Then, said I, now will I turn your own argument upon you; for Christ came before the high priests, scribes and pharisees, bringing the truth with him, being the very truth himself, which truth cannot lie, yet both he and his truth were condemned, and took no place with them: and also the apostles, and all martyrs that died since Christ:

therefore I turn your own argument upon you; answer it, if you can.

Then the said counterfeit ordinary, with great heat and choler, said to the bishop of Winchester, Object some articles against him, for he is obstinate, and would fain get out of our hands; therefore, hold him to some particular: so that no other answer could I have to this argument.

Then the bishop of Winchester began to read objections of his own making against me, and he bade me answer to them.

And I said, No, except you will set the law apart, because I see you are mindful of my blood.

Winchester. Now you may see he will not answer to these, but as he hath aforesaid.

Then spake the counterfeit ordinary again, and said, My lord, ask him what he saith to the sacrament of the altar. Then the bishop asked me, as my counterfeit ordinary required him.

Gratwick. My lord, I do believe that in the sacrament of the supper of the Lord, truly administered in both kinds, according to the institution of Christ, unto the worthy receiver, he eateth mystically by faith the body and blood of Christ. Then I asked him, if it were not the truth, and he said, Yes; then, said I, Bear witness of the truth.

Then the bishop of Winchester, whose head being subtlest to gather upon my words, said, My lord, see you not how he creepeth away with his heresies, and covereth them privily? Note how he here separateth the sacrament of the altar from the supper of the Lord, meaning it not to be the true sacrament, and also how he condemneth our administration in one kind, allowing that the unworthy receiver doth not eat and drink the body and blood of Christ; which be sore matters truly weighed, being covered very craftily with his subtle shifts and sophistry, but he shall answer directly before he depart.

Gratwick. My lord, that is but your gathering of my words, for you before confessed the same sayings to be the truth, and this you catch at me, and fain would have an advantage for my blood: but seeing you judge me not to mean the sacrament of the altar, now come to the probation of the same sacrament, and prove it to be the true sacrament, and I am with you; or else, if you can prove your church to be the true church, I am also with you.

But then he called to memory the last probation of the church and sacraments, how he before was driven to forsake the scriptures, and to shew me by good reason how they might administer the sacrament in one kind: and his reason was this, Like as a man or woman dieth on a sudden, and so when we have given him the body of Christ, in the meantime the party dieth, and so he eateth the body of Christ, and drinketh not his blood. And this was his simple shift in the proving of their sacraments: so he was now half ashamed to begin that matter again.

But yet a little shift he brought in, and said—

What sayest thou by the administration of the priests every day for themselves, and they minister in both kinds?

To that I answered, You have two administrations, for I am sure at Easter you administer but in one kind, and therefore it is not according to the institution of Christ, but after your own imaginations.

Winchester. Then, what sayest thou to these words, "Take, eat, this is my body?" These are the words of Christ. Wilt thou deny them?

Gratwick. My lord, they are the words of scripture, I affirm them, and not deny them.

Rochester. Why, then, thou dost confess the sacrament of the altar to be a real presence, the selfsame body that was born of the virgin Mary, and is ascended into heaven.

Gratwick. My lord, what do you now mean? Do you not also mean a visible body? For it cannot be, but of necessity, if it be a real presence, and a material body, it must be a visible body also.

Winchester.

Winchester. Nay, I say unto thee, it is a real presence and a material body, and an invisible body too.

Gratwick. My lord, then it must needs be a fantastical body, for if it should be material and invisible, as you affirm, then it must needs be a fantastical body: for it is apparent that Christ's human body was visible and seen.

Then the bishop brake out and said, When didst thou see him? I pray thee tell me.

To that I answered and said, A simple argument it is; because our corporal eyes cannot comprehend Christ, doth it prove or follow, that he is invisible, because we cannot see him?

And with that the bishop began to grow weary of his argument, and removed his talk to Judas in eating the sacrament, and said, He eat him wholly, as the apostles did.

And then I asked him, If he meant Christ's flesh and blood, which he speaketh of in the sixth of John, and saith, "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life in me."

To that he answered and said, Yea.

Then said I, Of necessity Judas must needs be saved, because he did eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ, as you have affirmed, and also all the ungodly that die without repentance, because they have eaten your sacrament, which you say is the flesh and blood of Christ: therefore of necessity they shall receive the benefit thereof, that is, eternal life: which is a great absurdity to grant, and then of necessity it must follow, that all that eat not, and drink not of your sacrament, shall finally perish and be damned: for Christ saith, "Except ye eat my flesh and drink my blood, ye have no life in you." And you have afore said that of your sacrament, which you say is the same flesh and blood which Christ speaketh of: and here I prove, that all children then that die under age to receive the sacrament, by your own argument, must be damned, which is horrible blasphemy to speak. Now here I turn your own argument upon you; answer it, if you can.

Winchester. My lord, do you not see what deceitful arguments he bringeth in against us, mingled with sophistry, and keepeth himself so that we can get no hold of him? But I say unto thee, perverse heretic, I see thou art a perverse fellow. I had a better opinion of thee, but now I see we lose our time about thee; yet I answer thee, St. Paul doth open the sixth of St. John plainly, if thou wilt see: for he saith, "They eat Christ's body and drink his blood unworthily;" and that was the cause of their damnation.

Gratwick. My lord, take heed you do not add unto the text, for he that addeth to the text is accursed of God, and I am sure here you have brought more than Paul hath spoken: for he saith not; Because they have eaten his body and drank his blood unworthily; but St. Paul saith, "Whosoever shall eat of this bread and drink of this cup unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of Christ." Note, my lord, he saith not as you have affirmed, but quite contrary. And with that they were all in a great rage.

Then the bishop of Winchester said I belied the text.

And then I called for the text.

Winchester. I asked thee even now if thou didst understand Latin, and thy answer was, Whether thou didst or no, the people shall bear witness in English.

Gratwick. And so I called again for the Testament, whether it were Latin or English, for the trial of the text.

And then when the bishop of Winchester saw that I cared not which of the translations I had, he stood up, thinking to beguile some simple man that had a book there, and bade him that had an English Testament to bring it in, that he might get some hold of him that should bring a Testament: but God disappointed him thereof, and so he flew away from the matter, and began to rail upon me, and said, my subtle arguments should not serve: for if I would not answer directly, I should nevertheless be excommunicated. For (said he) I see a mad toy in thine head; thou gloriest much in thy talk, and thinkest now the people are come about thee, that thou shalt encourage them with thy constant heretical opinion. For the last day, when thou wast before me upon Sunday in St. Mary Overy's church, thou there reprovedst my sermon, and hadst a thousand by thee at least, to bid God strengthen thee: but now let me see him here that dare open his mouth to bid God strengthen thee; he shall die the death that thou shalt die.

To that I answered, My lord, I know your cruelty far exceeds your pity. I know from experience that you keep men in prison a year or two, taking their books from them, permitting them not so much as a Testament to look upon for their souls' comfort, which all men ought to have: and so you treat them more like brute-beasts than christian men.

Winchester. No, sir, we will use you as we will use the child: for if the child will hurt himself with the knife, we will keep the knife from him. Because you will damn your soul with the word, you shall not have it.

Gratwick. My lord, a simple argument you bring to maintain and cover your fault. Are you not ashamed to make the word the cause of our damnation? I never knew any man but you that did not affirm our sins to be the cause of our damnation, and not the word, as you say: and therefore if your argument be good, then this is good also: because that some men do abuse drink, therefore the benefit of drink should be taken from all men, or any other such like good gift.

Winchester. My lords, we lose much time, for this fellow is perverse, speaking nothing but sophistry and perverse questions: so that we can get no advantage of him.

Then spake my counterfeit ordinary, as one half asleep all this while; yet somewhat with haste when he was awakened he began to tell his tale, and said—

Read these articles against him once more, and if he will not answer them, take him upon his first words—"That which I said, that I have said."

Then the bishop of Winchester began to read them again.

But I said unto him I would not answer them, because they were none of mine examinations, but objections of their own making, because they would have my blood. But yet I said, if they would set the law apart, I would talk my conscience freely to them.

Then my counterfeit ordinary began to speak again, charging me with the saying of St. Peter, that I should render an account of such hope as was in me.

Gratwick. So I can do, yet I shall not please you, for here I now render my hope as St. Peter willeth me: I believe only in Jesus Christ to have my salvation in him, by him, and through him; but I perceive you would have me render my faith in such sort, as you may have my blood, and therefore you bring good scriptures, and evil apply them.

Winchester. Why, this fellow is perverted, and we shall get no more at his hands than we have already; therefore let us pronounce sentence against him, for we do but lose our time.

Gratwick. Nay, my lord, seeing you will needs have my blood, let me say a little more for myself.

On Sunday last, when I was before you, you preached this which was a truth, and agreeable to the doctrine of the apostle St. James, and said, "If any man think himself a religious man, and in the mean time seduce his tongue or his heart, the same man's religion is a vain religion;" and so, my lord, you standing there in the pulpit, in the mean time seduced your tongue to slander us poor prisoners, being there present in iron bands, burdening us with the sects of Ariens, Herodians, Anabaptists, Sacramentaries, and Pelagians.

And when we stood up to purge ourselves thereof, you said you would cut out our tongues, and cause us to be pulled out of the church by violence. But there you gave yourself a shrewd blow, for your tongue in the mean time slandered your neighbour. For I, my lord, will give my life against all these heresies, which you there burdened us withal, even as I will give my life against that wherein I now stand before you. And with that he was raging angry, and caught my condemnation, and said—

Thou wilt grant here no more but this word, "That I have said, I have said:" and here I gather matter enough to condemn thee, for this is a confirmation of all that thou hast heretofore said.

Then I answered, If you can prove that ever any of my examinations were written, it is enough: but you have nothing against me but objections of your own making.

Winchester. Have at thee now, if thou wilt not yield, I will pronounce sentence against thee; and so he proceeded forward, cursing and banning in Latin; so I told him if the people might hear it in English, they would think him an uncharitable bishop.

And then I said, Stay, my lord, and mind what you do: for you have neither temporal nor spiritual law here against me in any cause.

Then stepped forth a gentleman, and said unto my lord, Take heed what you do: for he doth here say, that you have no title or cause why you should condemn him.

Then the bishop looked about him again, and asked me if I would recant.

I asked him, whereof I should recant.

Then said the bishop, Are you there? Nay then I know what I have to do: and so he proceeded forth in reading my condemnation. And there was another gentleman which began to snap and snatch at me: and then, said I, I would to God I had known this before I had ever come from home, I would have put on breeches, and not had my skin thus torn. And all this while the bishop read on still.

At last his chaplains cried, Stop, stop, my lord; for now he will recant. And then the bishop asked me again.

To which I answered, My lord, my faith is grounded more stedfastly, than to change in a moment; it is no process of time can alter me, unless my faith were as the waves of the sea: and so the bishop made an end, and delivered me into the hands of the sheriff, to be again carried to the Marshalsea. And when I was condemned, I desired God with a loud voice, that he would not lay my blood to their charge, if it were his good will, and they refused my prayer, and sent me away. Then I began to talk as I went, and they cried, Cut out his tongue, or stop his mouth: and so I was brought to the Marshalsea, and bound in irons. Therefore I pray unto God that they unto whom this present writing shall come, may take example by my death and warfare. So be it.

By me Stephen Gratwick, condemned for God's everlasting truth.

Here, for want of time, I left out many matters, because the Lord hath hastened the time, so that I have written but the briefness of the matter in probation of faith, and the reward of faith, which the bishop of Rochester and I debated upon; which matter I would have been glad to have set down in writing.

Also much more talk there was, that the bishop of Winchester and I had concerning my worldly friends and personal estate: for he played Satan with me, he carried me up to the mountains, and there told me my learning was good, and my eloquence, and also my knowledge, save that I did abuse it, said he; and then he fell to praising of my person, that it was comely, and worthy to serve a prince. Thus Satan flattered with me, to make me answer to such objections as he would lay against me, that I might fall into his diocese.

Thus this christian martyr Stephen Gratwick, being wrongfully condemned by the bishop of Winchester (as you have heard), was burnt with W. Moraunt, and one named King, in St. George's-fields, about the latter end of May.

The History of seven godly MARTYRS, five Women and two Men, burnt at Maidstone for professing the true Religion of Christ.

I SHEWED a little before, how after the universal proclamation was set forth by the king and queen in the month of February last, the storm of persecution began in all places to rise (whereof some part also is declared before), but yet in no place more than in the diocese of Canterbury, by reason of the aforesaid inquisitors, being now armed with authority, but especially by reason of Richard Thornton, suffragan of Dover, and the archdeacon of Canterbury, who were so furious and fiery against the harmless flock of Christ, that there was no need of any proclamation to stir up the coals of their burning cruelty, by reason whereof many a godly saint lieth slain under the altar.

Now to return to the said diocese of Canterbury, in the next month following, being the 18th day of June, were seven christian and faithful martyrs of Christ burned at Maidstone, whose names here follow:

Joan Bradbridge, of Staplehurst.

Walter Appleby, of Maidstone.

Petronil, his wife.

Edmund Allin, of Frytenden.

Catherine, his wife.

John Manning's wife, of Maidstone.

Elizabeth, a blind maiden.

As concerning the general articles commonly objected to them in the public consistory, and the order of their condemnation, it differeth not much from the usual manner expressed before, neither did their answers in effect much differ from the others that suffered under the same ordinary in the aforesaid diocese of Canterbury.

Now as touching their answers and manner of apprehension, and their private conflicts with their adversaries, I find no great matter coming to my hands, save only of Edmund Allin some intimation is given me, how his troubles came, what was his cause and answers before the justices, as here consequently you shall understand.

The Examination of EDMUND ALLIN.

THIS Allin was a miller, of the parish of Frytenden, in Kent, and in a dear year, when many poor people were like to starve, he fed them, and sold his corn cheaper by half than others did; also fed them with the food of life, reading to them the scriptures, and interpreting them. This being known to the popish priests dwelling thereabouts, by the procurement of them, namely of John Taylor, parson of Frytenden, and Thomas Henden, parson of Staplehurst, he was soon complained of to the justices, and brought before sir John Baker, knight, who committed both him and his wife to prison, but soon after they were let out, I know not how, and went to Calais; where continuing some time, he began to be troubled in conscience, and meeting with one John Webb, from Frytenden (who had likewise fled from the tyranny of sir John Baker and parson Taylor), said unto him, that he could not be in quiet there, whatsoever the cause was; for God, said he, had something to do for him in England: and shortly after he returned to Frytenden, where was cruel Taylor.

This parson being informed that Edmund Allin and his wife were returned, and were not at mass-time in the church; as he was the same time in the midst of his mass, upon a Sunday, a little before the elevation (as they term it), even almost at the lifting up of his Romish god, he turned to the people in a great rage, and commanded them with all speed to go unto their house, and apprehend them, and he would come unto them as soon as he could. Which promise he well performed, performed, for he had no sooner made an end of Ite, missa est, and the vestments off his back, but presently he was at the house, and there laying hands on the said Allin, caused him again to be brought to sir John Baker, with a grievous complaint of his exhorting and reading the scriptures to the people; and so he and his wife were sent to Maidstone prison. Witnessed by Richard Fletcher, vicar of Crambroke, and John Webb, of Frytenden.

No sooner were they in prison, but sir John Baker immediately sent certain of his men to their house, namely, John Dove, Thomas Best, Thomas Linley, Percival Barber, with the aforesaid John Taylor, parson of Frytenden, and Thomas Henden, parson of Staplehurst, to take an inventory of all the goods that were in the house: where they found in the bed straw a little chest locked with a padlock, wherein they found a sackcloth bag of money, containing the sum of thirteen or fourteen pounds, partly in gold and partly in silver; which money after being told, and put in the bag again, they carried away with them.

Besides also they found there certain books, as psalters, bibles, and other writings: all which books, with the money, were delivered to the aforesaid priest, Thomas Henden, parson of Staplehurst, and afterwards in the fifth year of the reign of queen Elizabeth, it was by right law recovered from him again, as in records remaineth to be seen.

Thus good Edmund Allin and his wife, being maliciously accused, wrongfully imprisoned, and cruelly robbed and spoiled of all their goods, were brought, as is aforesaid, before sir John Baker, the justice, to be examined; who taunting and reviling him without all mercy and pity, asked him if those were the fruits of his gospel, to have conventicles to gather people together, to make conspiracies to sow sedition and rebellion; and thus he began to reason with him.

A Conference between Sir JOHN BAKER, COLLINS, his Chaplain, and EDMUND ALLIN.

Baker. WHO gave thee authority to preach and interpret? Art thou a priest? Art thou admitted thereunto? Let me see thy licence.

Collins, sir John Baker's schoolmaster, said, Surely he is an arrant heretic, and worthy to be burned.

Allin. If it pleases your honour to permit me to answer in the cause of my faith, I am persuaded that God hath given me this authority, as he hath given to all other christians. Why are we called christians, if we do not follow Christ, if we do not read his law, if we do not interpret it to others that have not so much understanding? Is not Christ our Father? Shall not the son follow the father's steps? Is not Christ our master? and shall the scholar be inhibited to learn and preach his precepts? Is not Christ our Redeemer, and shall not we praise his name, and serve him who hath redeemed us from sin and damnation? Did not Christ, when but twelve years of age, dispute with the doctors, and interpret the prophet Isaiah? and yet, notwithstanding he was neither of the tribe of Levi, which were priests, but of the royal tribe of Judah, neither had taken any outward priesthood; wherefore, if we be christians, we must do the same.

Collins. Please your honour, what a knave is this, that compareth himself with Christ!

Baker. Let him alone, he will pump out presently an infinite number of heresies. Hast thou any more to say for thyself?

Allin. Yea, that I have. Adam was licensed of God, and Abraham was commanded to teach his children and posterity, and so David teacheth in divers Psalms: and Solomon also preached to the people, as the book of the preacher very well proveth, where he teacheth that there is no immortal felicity in this life, but in the next. And Noah taught them that were disobedient in his days, and therefore is called "The eighth preacher of righteousness," in the second epistle of Peter. Also, in the 11th chapter of Numbers, where Moses had chosen seventy elders to help him to teach and rule the rest, Eldad and Medad preached in the tents, wherefore Joshua being offended, complained to Moses, that Eldad and Medad did preach without licence. To whom Moses answered, and wished that all the people could do the like. Why should I be long? most of the priests were not of the tribe of Levi and Aaron.

Collins. These are authorities of the Old Testament, and therefore abrogated; but thou art a fool, and knowest no school-points. Is not the law divided into the law ceremonial, and judicial?

Allin. I grant that the ceremonies ceased when Christ came, as St. Paul proveth to the Hebrews, and to the Colossians, where he saith, "Let no man judge you in any part of the Sabbath-day, new moon, or other ceremonies, which are figures of things to come: for Christ is the body."

Collins. And are not the judicials abrogated by Christ?

Allin. They are confirmed both by Christ in the fifth chapter of Matthew, and by Paul in the first epistle to Timothy. The law, saith he, is not set forth for the virtuous and godly, but for man-slayers, perjurors, adulterers, and such like.

Collins. Thou art an heretic. Wilt thou call the judicials of Moses again? Wilt thou have adultery punished with death? disobedient children to their parents to be stoned? wilt thou have Legem Talionis? But thou art an ass. Why should I speak Latin to thee, thou erroneous rebel? shall we now smite out eye for eye, tooth for tooth? Thou art worthy to have thy teeth and tongue plucked out.

Allin. If we had that law, we should neither have disobedient children, neither false witness bearers, nor ruffians.

Baker. Master Collins, let us return to our first matter. Why did you teach the people, whom you said you had fed both bodily and spiritually, being no priest?

Allin. Because that we are all kings to rule our affections, priests to preach out the virtues and word of God, as Peter writeth, and lively stones to give light to others. For as out of flint stones cometh forth that which is able to set the world on fire; so out of christians should spring the beams of the gospel, which should inflame all the world. If we must give a reckoning of our faith to every man, and now to you demanding it, then must we study the scriptures, and practise them. What availeth it a man to have meat, and will eat none; and apparel, and will wear none; or to have an occupation, and to teach none; or to be a lawyer, and to utter none? Shall every artificer be suffered, yea and commended to practise his faculty and science, and the christian forbidden to exercise his? Doth not every lawyer practise his law? Is not every christian a follower of Christ? Shall ignorance, which is condemned in all sciences, be practised by christians? Doth not St. Paul forbid any man's spirit to be quenched? Doth he prohibit any man that hath any of these gifts, which he repeateth, 1 Cor. xiv. to practise the same? Only he forbiddeth women, but no man. The Jews never forbid any. Read the Acts of the apostles. And the restraint was made by Gregory, the ninth pope of that name, as I heard a learned man preach in king Edward's days.

Collins. This villain, please your honour, is mad. By my priesthood, I believe that he will say that a priest hath no more authority than another man. Doth not a priest bind and loose?

Allin. No, my sin bindeth me, and my repentance looseth. God forgiveth sin only, and no priest. For every christian, when he sinneth, bindeth himself, and when he repenteth, looseth himself. And if any other be loosed from his sin by my exhortation, I am said to loose him; and if he persevere in sin notwithstanding my exhortation, I am said to bind him, although it is God that bindeth, and looseth, and giveth the increase. Therefore, saith Christ, Matth. xviii. "Wheresoever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them; and whose soever sins they forgive, they are forgiven, and whose soever they retain, tain. they are retained." Neither hath the pope any keys, save the keys of error; for the key that openeth the lock to God's mysteries and salvation, is the key of faith and repentance. And as I have heard learned men reason, St. Austin, Origen, and others, are of this opinion.

Then they reviled him, and laid him in the stocks all night: wherewith some that were better minded, being offended with such extremity, desired Allin to keep his conscience to himself, and to follow Baruch's counsel, in the sixth chapter. "Wherefore when ye see the multitude of people worshipping them, behind and before, say ye in your hearts, O Lord, it is thou that ought only to be worshipped."

Wherewith he was persuaded to go to hear mass the next day, and suddenly before the sacring, went out and considered in the church-yard with himself, that such a little cake between the priest's fingers could not be Christ, nor a material body, neither to have soul, life, sinews, bones, flesh, legs, head, arms, nor breast, and lamented that he was seduced by the words of Baruch, which his conscience told him was no scripture, or else had another meaning: after this he was brought again before sir John Baker, who asked why he refused to worship the blessed sacrament of the altar.

Allin. It is an idol.

Collins. It is God's body.

Allin. It is not.

Collins. By the mass it is.

Allin. It is bread.

Collins. How provest thou that?

Allin. When Christ sat at his supper, and gave them bread to eat.

Collins. Bread, knave?

Allin. Yes, bread, which you call Christ's body. Sat he still at the table, or was he both in their mouths and at the table? If he was in their mouths, and at the table, then had he two bodies, or else he had a fantastical body; which is an absurdity.

Baker. Christ's body was glorified, and might be in more places than one.

Allin. Then he had more bodies than one, by your own placing of him.

Collins. Thou ignorant ass, the schoolmen say, that a glorified body may be every where.

Allin. If his body was not glorified till it rose again, then was it not glorified at his last supper; and therefore was not at the table, and in their mouths by your own reason.

Collins. A glorified body occupieth no place.

Allin. That which occupieth no place, is neither God nor any thing else: but Christ's body, you say, occupieth no place; therefore it is neither God, nor any thing else. If it be nothing, then is your religion nothing. If it be God, then have we four in one Trinity, which is the person of the Father, of the Son, of the Holy Ghost, the human nature of Christ. If Christ be nothing, which you must needs confess, if he occupieth no place, then is our study vain, our faith frustrate, and our hope without reward.

Collins. This rebel will believe nothing but scripture. How knowest thou that it is the scripture but by the church? and so saith St. Austin.

Allin. I cannot tell what St. Austin saith, but I am persuaded that it is scripture, by divers arguments: First, that the law worketh in me my condemnation. The law telleth me, that of myself I am damned; and this damnation, Mr. Collins, you must find in yourself, or else you shall never come to repentance. For as this grief and sorrow of conscience, without faith, is desperation; so is a glorious and Romish faith, without the lamentation of a man's sins, presumption.

The second is the gospel, which is the power and Spirit of God. "This Spirit (saith St. Paul) certifieth my spirit that I am the son of God, and that these are the scriptures."

The third are the wonderful works of God, which cause me to believe that there is a God, though we glorify him not as God, Rom. i. The sun, the moon, the stars, and other his works (as David discourseth in Psal. xix.) declare that there is a God, and that these are the scriptures, because that they teach nothing else but God and his power, majesty and might; and because the scripture teacheth nothing disagreeing from this prescription of nature. And fourthly, because that the word of God gave authority to the church in paradise, saying, that the seed of the woman should break down the serpent's head. This seed is the gospel; this is all the scriptures, and by this we are assured of eternal life; and these words, "The seed of the woman shall break the serpent's head," gave authority to the church, and not the church to the word.

Baker. I heard say that you spake against priests and bishops.

Allin. I spake for them; for now they have so much living, and especially bishops, archdeacons, and deans, that they neither can nor will teach God's word. If they had a hundred pounds a-piece, then would they apply their study; now they cannot for their affairs.

Collins. Who will then set his children to school?

Allin. Where there is now one set to school for that end, there would be forty; because that one bishop's living divided into thirty or forty parts, would find so many men, as well learned as the bishops now are who have all this living; neither had Peter or Paul any such revenue.

Baker. Let us dispatch him; he will mar all.

Collins. If every man had a hundred pounds, as he saith, it would make more learned men.

Baker. But our bishops would be angry, if that they knew it.

Allin. It would be for the common good to have such bishoprics divided, for the further increase of learning.

Baker. What sayest thou to the sacrament?

Allin. As I said before.

Baker. Away with him.

Then he was carried to prison, and afterward burned. And thus much concerning the particular story of Edmund Allin and his wife: who, with the five other martyrs above named, being seven, were burned at Maidstone, the 18th of June, 1557.

Another Story of like Cruelty, shewed upon three Men and four Women, who were burnt at Canterbury.

AMONG such infinite seas of trouble in these most dangerous days, who can withhold from tears to see the madding rage of these pretended catholics, who being never satisfied with blood to maintain their carnal kingdom, presume so highly to violate the precise law of God's commandments, in slaying the simple poor lambs of the glorious congregation of Jesus Christ, and that for the true testimony of a good conscience, in confessing the immaculate gospel of their salvation? What heart will not lament the murdering mischief of these men, who for want of work do so wrack their time on silly poor women, whose weakness the more strength it lacketh by natural imperfection, the more it ought to be helped, or at least pitied, and not oppressed of men that be stronger, and especially of priests that should be charitable.

But blessed be the Lord Omnipotent, who supernaturally hath induced from above such weak creatures with such manly fortitude, so constantly to withstand the uttermost extremity of these merciless persecutors: as he did before strengthen the mother of the seven sons in the Maccabees, and as he hath done since with divers other godly women in our days, partly before mentioned, and partly hereafter, as may appear by the martyrdom of the seven following, four women and three men, burnt together at Canterbury the 30th of the said month of June, 1557, whose names are these—

John Fishcock,	Bradbridge's widow,
Nicholas White,	Wilson's wife,
Nicholas Pardue,	Benden's wife.
Barbara Final, widow,

As it would be tedious exactly and particularly to relate the several stories of every one of these martyrs, so I cannot

The Burning of John Fishcock, Nich. White, Nich. Pardue, Barbara Final, Mary Branbridge, Ann Wilfon and Alice Benden at Canterbury, in Kent.

*The Martyrdom of Robt. Glover }

I cannot pass over untouched the cruel and unchristian handling of Alice Benden during her imprisonment, according as I have received by the faithful relation of them who were best acquainted with her, and partly also some doers in the matter, being her own natural brethren. The story is thus:

Alice Benden, wife of Edward Benden, of the parish of Staplehurst, in the county of Kent, was first brought before Mr. Roberts, of Cranbroke, in the said county, the 14th of October, 1556, of whom she was demanded why she would not go to the church? To which she answered, that she could not do so with a good and clear conscience, because there was much idolatry committed against the glory of God. For which, with many mocks and taunts, she was sent to prison, where she lay fourteen days: and on the 20th of October, her husband required his neighbours, the wealthy men of Staplehurst, to write to the bishop of Dover, who had the chief government of the tyrannical sword in Kent for those days, which they did, desiring him to send her home.

Wherefore the bishop called her before him, and asked her if she would go home, and go to the church. Whereunto she answered, If I would have so done, I need not to have come hither. Then wilt thou go home, and be confessed by thy parish priest? And she said, No, that she would not.

Well, said he, go thy ways home, and go to the church when thou wilt. To which she answered nothing. But a priest that stood by, said, She saith she will, my lord. Wherefore he let her go, and she came home forthwith.

On the Saturday following her husband desired her to go to the church; which she refused to do: wherefore, on the Sunday fortnight after, he going to the church, came into the company of divers inhabitants of the same parish; among whom, through his foolish talk and behaviour, he procured her to be sent to Sir John Gilford, who commanded her to prison again: yea, and the more to utter his own shame, they said her husband took money of the constable to carry her to prison, the price of his wife's blood, meaning indeed to carry her to prison himself. But she having much more care of his honest and good report, than he had regard (as it is easy to see) of his own infamy, and no less ashamed of his unnatural doings, chose rather to commit herself willingly into the hands of her enemies, than that the world should bear witness against her husband of so wicked a fact. Wherefore she went to the constable, desiring him to go with her: but he answered that he could not; yet he granted her his boy to go with her, with whom she went to prison, namely, Canterbury castle, according to commandment.

Here one thing is worthy to be noted, that while she was in this prison, she practised with a fellow-prisoner, the wife of one Potkin, to live both of them on two-pence halfpenny a day, to try thereby how well they could sustain penury and hunger, before they were put to it. For they had heard, that when they should be removed from thence to the bishop's prison, their allowance should be but three farthings apiece a day: and did indeed both so live for 14 days before she was removed.

The 22d of January following, her husband went again to the bishop, desiring him to deliver his wife out of prison; but he said she was an obstinate heretic, and would not be reformed, and therefore said that he could not deliver her.

Then said he, My lord, she hath a brother, whose name is Roger Hall, who resorteth unto her. If your lordship could keep him from her, she would turn; for he comforteth her, giveth her money, and persuadeth her not to return or relent.

This caution was no sooner given, but it was as quickly taken, and as cruelly put in execution. For the bishop commanding her upon the same to a prison called Monday's Hole, he gave a strict charge, that if at any time her brother came, he should be apprehended.

No. 49.

This prison was within a court where the prebend's chambers were, being a vault beneath the ground, and before the window inclosed with a pale about four feet and an half high, and three feet distance from the same; so that she looking from beneath, might only see such as stood at the pale. After this, her brother sought often for her, with no less danger of life than diligence. But, for the unknown situation of the place, it being but seldom used as a prison, and the matter closely kept, he could never understand that she was there, until, through God's merciful will and unsearchable providence, he coming thither early in the morning, her keeper being gone to the church to ring, happened to hear her voice, as she was pouring out her sorrowful complaints unto God, saying the Psalms of David: and he could not relieve her, only by putting money in a loaf of bread, and sticking the same on a pole, and so reached it to her; for neither with meat nor drink could he sustain her. And this was five weeks after her coming thither, in all which time no creature was known to come at her more than her keeper.

Her lying in that prison was only upon a little straw between a pair of stocks and a stone wall; being allowed three farthings a day, that is, one half-penny for bread, and a farthing for drink, neither could she get any more for her money. Wherefore she desired to have her whole allowance in bread, and used water for her drink. Thus did she lie nine weeks. During all which time she never changed her apparel; whereby at last she became a very piteous and loathsome creature to behold.

At her first coming into this place she did grievously bewail, with great sorrow and lamentation, and reasoned with herself, why her Lord God did suffer her with such heavy justice to be sequestered from her loving fellows into such extreme misery.

In these dolorous mournings did she continue, till on a night as she was in her sorrowful supplication, rehearsing this verse of the Psalm, "Why art thou so heavy, O my soul?" And again, "The right hand of the Most High can change all:" she received comfort in the midst of her misery, and after that continued very joyful till her delivery from the same.

About the 25th of March, in the year 1557, she was called before the bishop, who demanded of her, whether she would now go home, and to the church or no, promising her great favour, if she would be reformed and do as they did.

To whom she answered, I am thoroughly persuaded, by the great extremity that you have already shewed me, that you are not of God, neither can your doings be godly: and I see that you seek my utter destruction; shewing how lame she was by hunger and cold, while she lay in the dismal prison, whereby she was not able to move without great pain.

Then the bishop delivered her from that filthy hole, and sent her to West-gate, where being kept clean, her skin did peel and scale off, as if she had been poisoned by some mortal venom. Here she continued till the latter end of April, when she was called before them, and with others condemned, and committed to a prison called the Castle, where she lay till the 19th of June, and then resigned her life in the flames.

When she was at the stake, she threw her handkerchief to one John Banks, requiring him to keep it in memory of her; and from her middle she took a white lace, which she gave to the keeper, desiring him to give the same to her brother Roger Hall, and to tell him, that it was the last band that she was bound with, except the chain. A shilling also, of Philip and Mary, she took forth, which her father had bent and sent her when she was first sent to prison, desiring that her said brother should with obedient salutation render the same to her father again, and shew him that it was the first piece of money that he sent her after her troubles began, which (as she protested) she had kept, and now sent to let him understand, that she never wanted money while she was in prison.

Alice

Alice Benden, and the other five before mentioned, were burnt at the same time. Being brought to the place of martyrdom, they undressed themselves joyfully at the fire, and being ready, they all seven (like the communion of saints) kneeled down, and made their humble prayers to the Lord with such zeal and affection, as even the enemies of the cross could not but like it. When they had made invocation together, they arose and went to the stake, where being soon encompassed with horrible flames of fire, they yielded their souls and lives gloriously into the hands of the Lord.

This Bradbridge's wife had two children, the one named Patience, the other Charity, and when she was condemned by the bishop, she desired (if she must needs be burnt) that he would take Patience and Charity (meaning her two children) and keep them. Nay, quoth the bishop, by the faith of my body, I will meddle with neither of them.

The Troubles and Examinations of MATTHEW PLAISE.

MATTHEW PLAISE, of the parish of Stone, in the county of Kent, weaver, and a faithful christian, being apprehended and imprisoned in the castle of Canterbury, was brought to examination in the year 1557, before Thornton, bishop of Dover, archdeacon Harpsfield, commissary Collins, and other inquisitors, in the following manner:

Bishop. Art thou of the diocese of Canterbury, and where dwellest thou?

Plaise. I am of the parish of Stone, in Kent, and subject to the king and queen of England.

Bishop. Thou wert indicted by twelve men at the sessions of Ashford, for heresy.

Plaise. That is sooner said than proved.

Bishop. I have spoken the truth, and can prove it.

Plaise. I desire to hear it, and then I will answer to it.

Bishop. No, no; you shall answer to the article, yea or nay.

Plaise. You cannot prove it; for I was not at Ashford, and therefore you have nothing to lay to my charge; but now I perceive you go about to lay a net to have my blood.

Harpsfield. Peace, peace; we do not desire thy blood, but we are glad to hear thou art no heretic, [with many other flattering words] yet thou art suspected of heresy; and if thou wilt be content to confess how thou dost believe concerning these articles, we shall gladly teach thee.

Plaise. I do not think so, for I talked with one of your doctors, and after long talk, he would needs know how I believed in the sacrament, and I recited unto him the text, and because I would not make my exposition to him upon it, he would teach me nothing: yet I prayed him, for my instruction, to write his mind, and if it were the truth I would believe him; and this I desired of him for the love of God, but it would not be.

Harpsfield. I dare swear upon a book, that it is not so.

Plaise. Nay, I can prove it to be true.

Harpsfield. I will tell thee the truth [and he stood up with a long process], I am sure that the same doctor doth believe as I do.

Plaise. How do you know that? Seeing St. Paul doth say, That no man knoweth what is in man, but the Spirit which dwelleth in him: but if you knew what Christ meant by these words, "I require mercy and not sacrifice," Matthew xii. you would not kill innocents.

Bishop. I charge thee, in the name of the king and queen and the lord cardinal, to answer yea or nay to the articles.

Plaise. I command you, in the name of Him who shall come in flaming fire with his mighty angels, to render vengeance to the disobedient, and to all those that believe not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ who shall be punished with everlasting damnation, that you shall speak nothing but the truth grounded upon Christ and his apostles, and then I will answer you, or else not.

Bishop. Unless thou wilt answer to every article, I will immediately condemn thee.

Plaise. Well, if you do, you shall be guilty of my blood, and prove yourself a murderer.

Then the archdeacon took the articles in his hand, and read the second article, which was, That I was a christian man, and did believe in their mother the catholic church, and the determination thereof.

Plaise. I am a christian man indeed, and therefore you have nothing against me.

Harpsfield. What sayest thou to the catholic church, which hath so long continued, except it were nine or ten years, that this heresy hath sprung up in this realm?

Plaise. No man can accuse me of any thing spoken against the catholic church of Christ.

Bishop. Dost thou not believe the creed?

Plaise. Yes verily, I believe my creed, and all that is written in the Testament of Christ, with the rest of the scriptures.

Bishop. Thou dost confess that there is a catholic church, I am glad of that; but tell me, are the king and queen of that church, or no?

Plaise. Well, now I perceive you go about to be both mine accuser and also my judge, contrary to all right. I confess Christ hath a church upon earth, which is built upon the apostles and prophets, Christ being the head thereof; and as touching the king and queen, I answer, I have nothing to do with any man's faith but mine own; neither came I hither to judge, for I judge not myself, but the Lord must judge me.

Bishop. Is there no part of that church here in England?

Plaise. Well, I perceive you would fain have something to lay to my charge. I will tell you where; Christ saith, Where two or three be gathered together in his name, there is he in the midst of them.

Then the archdeacon stood up with his mocks, to put me out of countenance, and said to the people that I had no wit, but that I thought all they were deceived so long time, and that half a dozen of us should have the truth in a corner, and that all they should be deceived, with such like taunts and mocks; but would not suffer me to speak one word. Then he read the article of the sacrament, and said I denied the real presence to be in the sacrament after it was once consecrated, and that I said, Christ's body was in heaven, and no where else, and that the bread was nothing but a sign, token, or remembrance.

Plaise. You have to shew where and what my words were.

Hereof we talked a great while.

At last the bishop was so angry, that he charged me, in the names of the king, queen, and cardinal, before the mayor and his brethren, taking them to witness, if I did not say yea, or nay, he would condemn me.

Then said I, Seeing you have nothing to accuse me of, why should I answer?

Then the archdeacon said I was guilty, and that I was like a thief at the bar, who would not confess his fault because his accusers were not present; with a great many more words, and would not let me open my mouth against him.

Then I saw whereabouts they went, gathering to answer them by the word, or else I think they would have condemned me for holding of my peace; and this was my beginning, I believe that Christ took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to his disciples, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you; this do in remembrance of me."

Harpsfield. Dost thou believe that Christ meant even as he said?

Plaise.

Plaise. Christ was no dissembler, but he spake the very truth.

Harpfield. Thou hast very well said, we will take no advantage of thy words.

Then he praised me with many words, going about to prove his body real and substantial, and said, Christ called himself bread: and this to prove, when Christ said, "This is my body;" the bread was his body, said he, indeed, real and substantial, not so long and so big as it hung on the cross, as the Capernaïtes did think; but we eat it, as man's weak nature can eat Christ. Therefore when he had said, "This is my body," the bread was his body in very deed.

Plaise. What did Christ mean by these words, "Which is given for you?"

Harpfield. Christ spake that by the bread also.

Plaise. Is Christ's body made of bread? Was bread given for our redemption? Or was the bread crucified for us, or not?

Harpfield. No, by St. Mary, I say not so.

Plaise. You have said the truth indeed, and even as I believe.

Then he stood up with a great many words, and said, that I thought it but bare bread still, as other bread is; but he was sure Christ called it his body, and then it was his body indeed, for he would believe Christ.

When he had spoken his pleasure by me, thinking to have condemned me by the law, I said, he had not judged right of me, for I had not so spoken, but did believe the words of Christ as well as he, and as much as he could prove by the word.

Harpfield. What dost thou say it is?

Plaise. I do believe it was that which he gave them.

Harpfield. What was that?

Plaise. That which he brake.

Harpfield. What did he break?

Plaise. That which he took.

Harpfield. What did he take?

Plaise. The text saith, "He took bread."

Harpfield. Well then, thou sayest it was but bread that his disciples did eat, by thy reason.

Plaise. Thus much I say, Look, what he gave them, they did eat it indeed.

Harpfield. Why, then, was not that his body which they did eat?

Plaise. It was that which he brake.

Harpfield. Well, I perceive thy meaning well enough; for thou dost think it is but bread still, and that he was not able to make it his body.

Plaise. That is your exposition upon my mind.

Harpfield. What didst thou receive when thou didst receive last?

Plaise. I do believe that I did eat Christ's flesh, and drink his blood; for he saith, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed."

Then he said, I had answered well, thinking to have had some advantage over me, and prayed me to tell him how I did eat Christ's flesh, and drink his blood.

Then I said, I must answer you by the word which Christ saith, "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me and I in him."

Then he faced out the matter with sophistry, and said, I did eat Christ as that church was in his eye, with many such mocks, but would not let me answer one word.

Commiffary Collins then asked me, if I did not remember St. Paul, who rebuked the Corinthians for their evil behaviour, and because they made no difference of the Lord's body, and brought in to prove his matter, how he called himself bread in the 6th of John. So Paul saith, "So oft as ye eat of this bread, (meaning Christ's body) unworthily, ye eat and drink your own damnation, because ye make no difference of the Lord's body." For thus saith Christ, "The bread that I will give you is my flesh." Now it is no bread, but it is his flesh. And thus he alledged every scripture false, to make up the matter.

Plaise. I believe the words of St. Paul very well, even as he hath spoken them. For thus he saith, "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation, because he maketh no difference of the Lord's body."

Collins. What is the cause that he eateth his own damnation?

Plaise. St. Paul declareth it plainly with these words, "If ye had judged yourselves, ye should not have been judged of the Lord."

Harpfield. I marvel that you will not say, that he called the bread his body, seeing Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, with many others, called it his body.

Plaise. You have condemned them as heretics, and you would have me say with them, because you would kill me.

Harpfield. In that they said it was his body, they said the truth.

Plaise. Wherefore were they killed, seeing they said the truth.

Bishop. I had all their answers, and they did not believe as they said. For they said Christ called it his body, but it was not his natural body: but thou shalt answer me by-and-by, whether it be his body or not, or else I will anger thee.

Plaise. I have answered you by the word already, and I believe it also; therefore if you condemn me for that, my life is not dear unto me, and I am sure you shall not escape unpunished; for God will be revenged on such murderers.

Then the archdeacon intreated me to be ruled by him, and take mercy while it was offered; for if I were condemned, I must needs be burned. Yet he would not say but my soul might be saved; with many more words, and desired me that I would believe him, for he would speak the truth: beginning with how Christ fed five thousand people with four loaves, and how he turned the water into wine; even so Christ took bread and blest it, and when he had done, he brake it, and said, "This is my body," and then he commanded them to eat it: and therefore it must needs be his body.

Plaise. I desire you to speak the text right, or else I will not believe you.

Then archdeacon Harpfield stood up, and put off his cap, and thanked me for teaching of him, and said, I was a stubborn fellow, and took scorn to be taught.

Plaise. I ought to hold you accursed, if you teach doctrine contrary to Christ and his apostles.

Harpfield. Do you believe that Christ gave that he took or not?

Plaise. I do believe as much as can be proved by the scripture, and more I will not believe.

Then he began with Moses's rod, how God commanded him to lay it down, and it was turned into a serpent. Seeing that this was by Moses being but a man, how much more Christ, being both God and man, took one thing and gave to his disciples another?

Plaise. Your comparison is nothing like, for Moses's rod when it was laid down, he saw that it was turned into a very serpent indeed; but in this sacrament no man can see either quality or yet quantity to be changed.

Bishop. Your opinion and faith is like unto the Capernaïtes.

Plaise. Yours is more like their opinion than mine.

Then Harpfield asked me, whether Christ took not one thing and gave another?

Plaise. What he brake he gave unto them, and bade them eat; and no other answer will I make, contrary to the word.

Then the archdeacon said, he marvelled why I would not believe them, seeing this learning had continued 1500 years: neither yet did say, as others had before, how Christ did call it his body.

Plaise. When Cranmer, who was here bishop, was in authority, he said, he held the truth, and commanded us to believe him, and hath given his life for his opinion, and would you have me believe you, because you say you hold the truth? That which makes me believe chiefly, is the scripture, which I am sure is the truth indeed.

Bishop.

Bishop. I have spoken the truth, and you will not believe.

Plaife. If you do not now speak the truth, I am sure you have spoke the truth: [for he had before preached doctrine contrary to this.]

Then the rest of my articles were read; which I answered, and in every article he had up this brea-den god. And they sent for a lighted candle, and I thought they would have condemned me, but God would not suffer their cruel hearts to have their pleasure then: blessed be his name for evermore, Amen.

Then the archdeacon was angry, and began to chide me, because I would not desire a day of the bishop, and said, I was a naughty stubborn fellow, and that it had been my duty to have desired him to have been good to me, that I might have a day.

Plaife. I have spoken the truth; and therefore will not ask him for a day, except he would give me a day of his own mind.

Then the commissary said, Dost thou not think that thou mayest be deceived, seeing he may be deceived that hath gone to study all the days of his life?

Plaife. Yea, I might be deceived in that I was a man; but I was sure God's word could not be deceived.

Then the commissary prayed me to be content, and confessed that I might learn; and said, they would be glad to teach me.

Plaife. I will be as glad to learn as any man.

And thus they rose up, and went away, saying nothing.

What became of this Matthew Plaife afterwards, whether he died in prison, or was executed, or delivered, I have as yet no certain knowledge.

The History of TEN MARTYRS, who were burnt in one Fire at Lewes.

IN the town of Lewes, on the 22d of June, the ten following persons suffered in one fire.

Richard Woodman, George Stevens, William Mainard, Alexander Hofman, his servant, Thomas Wood, Mainard's maid, Margery Moris, James Moris, her son, Denis Burgis, Ashdon's wife, and Grove's wife.

Of which number Richard Woodman was the first, who by his occupation was an iron-maker, dwelling in the parish of Warbleton, in the county of Suffex, and diocese of Chichester, about the age of 30 years. The occasion of his first apprehension was this:

There was one Fairebanke, who had sometime been a married priest, and served the cure of Warbleton, where he had often persuaded the people not to credit any other doctrine but that which he then preached, taught and set forth in king Edward's days. And afterward, in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, the said Fairbanke preached contrary to that which he had before taught.

Whereupon Richard Woodman hearing him preach so contrary to himself, admonished him of his inconsistency, how before time he had taught them one thing, and now another, and desired him to teach them the truth. For which words he was apprehended, and brought before Mr. John Ashburnham, Mr. Tonston, Mr. Culpepper, and Mr. Roberts, justices of the peace in the county of Suffex, and by them committed to the King's-Bench, where he continued from June, the space almost of a year and a half; and from thence was transferred by Dr. Story into bishop Bonner's Coal-house, where he remained a month before he came to examination.

At length, the same day, when Mr. Philpot was burned, which was the 18th of December, he with four other prisoners was set at liberty by bishop Bonner. Notwithstanding shortly after he was sought for again, and at last taken by means of his father, brother, and other friends, and was sent up again to bishop Bonner, where he remained in the Coal-house eight weeks. He was there six times examined, and twenty-six times before; so that his examinations were in all thirty-two, from his apprehension to his condemnation. And as the matter is somewhat strange, and will perhaps scarce find credit upon my narration, with them who deny all things that do not please them, you shall hear himself speak and testify both of the manner of his troubles, and also his own examinations, recorded by himself as follows:

A true Certificate written by RICHARD WOODMAN, of his Apprehension and Imprisonment, and how he was there used, till he was brought before the Bishop of Chichester, at Black-Friars, London, together with his Examinations.

GENTLE reader, you will here perceive how the scriptures be partly fulfilled on me, being one of the least of these poor lambs. First, you shall understand, that since I was delivered out of the bishop of London's hands in the year 1555, and the same day that Mr. Philpot was burned, which was the 18th of December, I lay in his Coal-house eight weeks, wanting a day; and before that I was almost a year and a half in the King's-Bench after my first apprehension, for reproving a preacher in the pulpit, in the parish of Warbleton, where I dwelt. Wherefore I was at two sessions before I was sent to prison, and carried to two more while I was in prison; twice before the bishop of Chichester, and five times before the commissioners; and then sent to Bonner's Coal-house, and many times called before him, as it appeareth by my examinations which I have written.

And it pleased God to deliver me with four more out of the butcher's hands, requiring nothing else of us but that we should be honest men, and members of the true catholic church that was built upon the prophets and apostles, Christ being the true head of the church; to which we all affirmed, that we were members of the true church, and purposed by God's help therein to die. And hereupon we were delivered; but he ordered us many times to speak well of him. And no doubt he was worthy to be praised, because he had been so faithful a servant in his master the devil's business. For he had burnt good Mr. Philpot the same morning, in whose blood his heart was so drunken (as I supposed) that he could not tell what he did, as it appeared to us both before and after. For but two days before he promised us that we should be condemned that same day that we were delivered; yea, and the morrow after that he had delivered us, he sought for some of us again, yea, and that earnestly. He waxed dry, after his great drunkenness, wherefore he is like to have blood to drink in hell, as he is worthy, if he repent it not speedily. The Lord turn all their hearts, if it be his will.

This have I written, chiefly to certify to all people how we were delivered, because many carnal gospellers and papists have said, that it was prescribed that we should be so delivered, because they think that God is subject to man, and not man to God: for if they did they would not blaspheme him as they do, or if they thought they should give an account for it. Have not many of them read how God delivered Israel out of Egypt, and Daniel out of the lion's den? Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, out of the burning oven? with divers other such like examples; yea God is the same God that he was then: he is no older, nor less in power, as some count him, in wondering at his works. Now to the matter.

After I was delivered, the papists said, that I had consented to them, whereof they made themselves glad; - which was the least part of my thought, (I praise God for it) as they well perceived, and knew the contrary in a short time: for I went from parish to parish, and talked with them, to the number of thirteen or fourteen, and that of the chiefest in all the country; and I angered them so, that they with the commissioners complained of me to the lord chamberlain that was, then to the queen, sir John

Rose Allin's Hand burnt with a Candle by that Monster of inhumanity Edmund Tyrrel

John Gage, shewing him that I baptized children, and married people, with many such lies, to bring me into their hands again. Then the commissioners sent out certain citations to bring me to the court. The lord chamberlain had directed out three or four warrants for me, that if I had come there I should have been attached and immediately sent to prison; which was not God's will, for I had warning of their lying in wait for me, and went not thither, but sent my deputy, and he brought me word that the bailiffs waited for me there; but they missed of their prey for that time, whereupon they were displeased.

Then within three days after, my lord sent three of his men to me, whose names were Dean, Jeffrey, and Francis. I being at plough with my folks, right in the way as they were coming to my house, least mistrusting them of all others, came and spake to them, asking them how they did. And they said they arrested me in the names of the king and queen, and that I must go with them to their master the lord chamberlain. Which words made my flesh to tremble and quake, being suddenly surprised. But I answered them that I would go with them, and desired that they would go with me to my house, that I might break my fast, and put on some other apparel; and they said I should. Then I remembered myself, and said in my heart, Why am I thus afraid? they can lay no evil to my charge. If they kill me for well doing, I may think myself happy. I remembered how I was willing before to die in that quarrel, and so had continued ever since; and should I now fear to die? God forbid; for then were all my labour vain.

So by-and-by I was persuaded, I praise God, considering it was but the frailty of my flesh, which was loth to forego my wife and children, and goods; for I saw nothing but present death before mine eyes. And as soon as I had determined in my mind to die, I had regard to nothing in this world, but I was as merry and as joyful, I praise God, as ever I was. This agitation lasted not a quarter of an hour; but it was sharper than death itself, for the time it lasted.

So after I had my breakfast, I desired them to shew me their warrant, thinking thereby I should know for what cause I was arrested, that I might the better defend myself when I came before their master. And one of them answered, they had not their warrant there. Which words made me astonished, and it was put into my mind by God; that I need not go with them, unless they had their warrant. Then said I to them, That is a wonder you will come to take a man without a warrant. It seemeth to me that you come of your own mind to get thanks of your master; for, indeed, I heard say, that there were four or five warrants out for me, but they were all called in again, because I had certified to my lord and the commissary, by a letter I had sent to the commissary's court, that I was not guilty of that they had charged me with, which was baptizing of children, and marrying folks; which I never did; for I was never a minister appointed to do any such thing: wherefore set your hearts at rest, I will not go with you, unless you will carry me by force, and if you do so be it at your peril. So I rose from the table, and stepped into my chamber, meaning to go from them, if possible, seeing God had made the way so open for me. I meant to play Peter's part with them, but God would not it should be so, but sent a fear amongst them, that as soon as I was gone into my chamber, before I could come out again, they were gone out of my house.

When I saw that, I knew it was God's doing to set me at liberty once again. Yet I was compelled to speak to them, and said, If you have a warrant, I desire you for God's sake to shew it me, and I will go with you with all my heart: if not, I desire you, in God's peace and the king's to depart; for surely I will not go along with you without the order of law; for I have been too simple in such things already. Before I was sent to prison first, I met the justices at two sessions, without any warrant or commandment, but had word by one of their men, and went justly to them, and they sent me to prison, and kept me there near a year and three quarters; without all right or equity, as it is openly known, not hearing my cause gently debated. And it seemeth strange to me that I should be thus evil treated; therefore I will go to none henceforth, without the extremity of the law.

Then one of them said to me, We have not the warrant here, but it is at home at my house; the worst is, you can but make us fetch it. Then said I, Fetch it, if you will; but if you come in my house before you have it, at your peril be it. So I shut my door, and went out at the other door. They got help to guard my house, and one of them fetched the constable and many more, thinking to have carried me away with a licence; but, as God would have it, I was gone before. Notwithstanding, they sought every corner of my house, but to no purpose. I suspected they would search it that night again, and kept myself abroad; and there came seven of his men, and the constable, and searched my house. When they found they could not meet with me, they could have rent their clothes, that I had so escaped them, knowing they should have a check from their master. Hearing that they had so sought for me again, and perceiving that they were greedy of their prey, I came home, and my wife told me all things.

Then I supposed that they would search all the country for me, and the sea coast, because I should not go over, and then I thought that they would not imagine that I would dare to be near home. So I told my wife that I would take my lodging in a wood near my house, as indeed I did, even under a tree, and there had my Bible, pen and ink, and other necessities; continuing there six or seven weeks, my wife bringing me meat daily as I had need. Yea, I thought myself blessed of God, that I was counted worthy to lie in the woods for the name of Christ. Then there came word into the country, that I was seen and spoken with in Flanders; whereupon they left laying in wait for me: for they had sought all the country for me, and the sea-coast from Portsmouth to Dover, even as God put it in my mind they would.

So when all was hushed; I went abroad among our friends and brethren, and at length I went beyond the sea into Flanders and France; but I thought every day seven years whilst I was there; so I came home again as soon as possible. I was there but three weeks, before the priests of Baal discovered me, and procured warrants against me, causing my house to be searched sometimes twice in a week. This continued from St. James's-tide to the first Sunday in Lent. Sometimes I went privily, at others openly; sometimes from home a fortnight or three weeks, at others I was at home a month or five weeks together, living most commonly and openly, about my ordinary business; yet all mine enemies could lay no hands on me, till the hour was fully come: and then by the voice of the country, and manifest proofs, my brother as concerning the flesh, delivered me into their hands, because he knew that I was at home.

My father and he had as much of my effects in their hands as would produce 56l. a year clear. I delivered into their hands a lordship and an honour, and half an honour, to pay my debts; and the rest to remain with my wife and children. But they had reported that it would not pay my debts, which grieved me sore, for it was 200l. better than the goods came to; which caused me to speak to some of my friends, that they would speak to them to come to some sort of reckoning with me, and to take all such money again of me as they were charged with, and to deliver to me such writings and writs as they had of mine, or to whom I should appoint them.

So it was agreed betwixt my father and me, that I should have it again, and the day was appointed that the reckoning should be made and sent to me the same day that I was taken; my brother supposing that I should have put him out of most of all that he possessed; for it was all mine, in a manner, that he occupied, as all the country can and do well know. Whereupon (as it is reported) he told one Cardillar, my next neighbour, and some of Mr. Gage's men, or Mr. Gage himself: and so he sent to his brother, and his brother sent twelve of his men (he being sheriff) in the night before I was taken, and lay in the bushes near my house, till about nine o'clock, the hour that was appointed among themselves; for about the same time they thought to have had me within my house.

They had taken a man of mine, and two of my children that were abroad in the land, and kept them till their hour was appointed to come in; and then a little girl, one of my children, saw them come together, and came running in, and cried, Mother, mother, yonder comes twenty men. I sitting in my bed, making of shoe-thongs, heard the words, and suspecting that I was betrayed, I put on my hose, thinking to have gone out of the door before they had come. My wife being amazed at the child's words, looked out at the door, and they were by. Then she shut the door, and barred it fast, even as I came out of my chamber into the hall, and barred the other. They immediately beset the house, and commanded the doors to be opened, or they would break them in pieces. Then I had no shift, but I must either openly appear, or make some other remedy.

There was a certain place in my house that had never been found out, though searched at least twenty times, and sometimes almost by as many men at once; into which place I went. Then my wife opened the door, and they came in and asked for me: but she said I was not at home. They asked her why she shut the door, if I was not at home. She said, because she had been made afraid divers times with such as came to search us; therefore she shut the door: for it is reported (said she) that whosoever can take my husband, may hang him or burn him directly; and I doubt they will serve me or my children so; for I think they may do so unto us as well as to him. Well, said they, we know he is in the house, and we must search it, for we are the sheriff's men: let us have a candle: it is told us there are many secret places in your house. So she lighted a candle, and they sought up and down in every corner that they could find, and had given over, and many of them were gone out of my house into the church-yard, and there talking with my father and some he had brought with him.

When they could not find me, one of them went to my brother, who informed them I was at home, and they said, We cannot find him. Then he asked them if they had sought over a window in the hall (as it was known after), for the same place I had told him of myself: for many times when I came home, I used to send for him to bear me company; yet as it chanced, I had not told him the way into it. Then they began to search again. One looked up over the window, and spied a little loft, with three or four chests, and the entrance was between two of the chests, but no man could perceive it. Then he asked my wife the way into it: here is a place that has not been sought. When she thought they would see it by one means or other, she said, the way into it was out of the chamber they were then in. So she sent them up, and cried, Away, away. Then I knew there was no remedy, but made the best shift for myself that I could. The place was boarded over, and nailed fast, and if I had come out the way that I went in, I must needs come out amongst them all in the hall. Then I had no shift, but set my shoulders to the boards that were nailed to the rafters to keep out the rain, and brake them in pieces, making a great noise; and they that were in the other chamber, seeking the way into it, heard the noise, and looked out of a window, and spied me, and made an out-cry. Yet I got out, and leaped down, having no shoes on.

So I took down a lane that was full of sharp cinders, and they came running after with a great cry, and their swords drawn, crying, Strike him, strike him. This made me look back, and there was no one near me by an hundred feet; and that was but one, the rest being a great way behind. I turned about hastily to go, and stepped upon a sharp cinder with one foot, and saving of it, I stepped into a great miry hole, and fell down, and before I could arise, and get off, he came up with me. His name is Parker the Wild, as he is counted in all Suffex. But if I had had my shoes on, they had been like to have gone back errandless, if there had been five hundred more, if I had caught the plain ground once, to which I had not a stone's cast: but it was not God's will; if it had, I should have escaped from them all, if there had been ten thousand of them.

Then they took me and led me home again, to put on my shoes, and such clothes as I had need of. Then said John Fauconer, Now your master hath deceived you. You said you were an angel, and if you had been one, why did you not flee from us? Then said I, Who are they that ever heard me say that I was an angel? It is not the first lye by a thousand that they have made of me. Angels were never begotten of men, nor born of women: but if they had said, they had heard me say, that I do trust I am a saint, they had not said amiss. What, do you think to be a saint? Yea, that I do, and am already in God's sight, I trust in God; for he that is not a saint in God's sight already, is a devil. Therefore he that thinketh scorn to be a saint, let him be a devil. And with that word they had brought me to mine own door, where I met my father, and he desired me to remember myself.

To whom I said, I praise God, I am well remembered whereabouts I go. This way was appointed of God for me to be delivered into the hands of mine enemies; but woe unto him by whom I am betrayed. It had been good for that man that he had never been born, if he repent not with speed. The scriptures are now fulfilled on me, "For the father shall be against the son, and the brother shall deliver the brother to death," as it is this day come to pass. Then said one, He doth accuse his father, a good child indeed. I accuse him not, but say my mind; for there was no man knew I was at home, but my father, my brother, and one more, who I dare say would not hurt me for all the good in this town.

There was one George Beching that married one of my sisters, and he thought that I meant him, that he had betrayed me; and he said, Brother, do not think I was the cause of your being taken. I answered, that I meant him not; I meant one that was nearer of my blood than he was. Then one from Lause said, that I had been a gosseller, and stood from them when I was brought to a sessions at Lause; and he said, I thought you would have been an honest man when you were at Lause, and I offered Hussey the sheriff to be bound for you, that you should go home to your wife, and come to him again. Then I remembered what he was, and said, Be you the pewterer? And he said, Yea. Then said I, It has happened to you according to the true proverb, as St. Peter saith, "The dog is turned to his vomit again, and the sow that is washed, to wallow in the mire," and the end of all such will be worse than the beginning. Then his mouth was stopped, so that he had nothing to say.

All this time I stood on the outside of my door; for they would not let me go in. So I put on my shoes and clothes; then they put an harness about my arms, made of a dog's slip, which rejoiced my heart that I was counted worthy to be bound for the name of God. So I took my leave of my wife and children, my father, and other of my friends, never expecting to see them any more in this world: for it was so thought by all the country, that I should not live six days after my apprehension; for they had so reported. But yet I knew it was not as they would, unless God would grant it; I know what God can do; but what he will do I know not: but I am sure he will work all things for the best to them that love and fear him. So we drank and went our way, and came to Fille about three o'clock. And thus much touching the causes and effect of the troubles of Richard Woodman. Let us now see his examinations, which follow in this order.

The first Examination of RICHARD WOODMAN,
before Dr. CHRISTOPHERSON, Bishop of Chichester,
Dr. STORY, Dr. COOK, and others.

ON the 12th of April, in the year of our Lord 1557, I was sent from the sheriffs to London, and afterwards, on the 14th of the same month, I was brought before the bishop of Chichester, Dr. Story, and Dr. Cook. So the sheriff's men delivered my warrant and me to the bishop. Then the bishop asked me what my name was. My name (quoth I) is Richard Woodman.

Chichester. I am sorry for you, and so are all the worshipful men of your country. For it hath been reported to me, that you have been a man of good estimation with all the country, amongst the poor and rich, till of late. Wherefore look well upon yourself, your wife and children, your father, and other of your friends, and be ruled by me. Think not yourself wiser than all the realm. Be informed, and you shall have the favour of them all, as much as ever you had.

Woodman. You have charged me with many things wherein I have never offended: as, if you will give me leave, I will shew you.

Chich. Yes, I pray you say your mind.

Woodman. May it please you, you have charged me as though I made myself wiser than all the realm; God doth know, I stand to learn of every man that will or can teach me the truth. And whereas you say, I have been well esteemed both by the rich and poor, God doth know, I know not that I have given any just offence either to rich or poor. As for my wife and children, God knows how I love them in him, and my life also. My life, my wife, and my children, are all in God's hands, and I have them all as I had them not, I trust, according to St. Paul's words. But if I had ten thousand pounds of gold, I had rather forego it all, than them, if I might have my choice, and not displease God.

Chich. The sheriff took pains to come to me out of love, which he bare to you as to himself; and said you were desirous to speak to me.

Wood. I thought it meet to appeal to mine ordinary: for they go about to shed my blood unrighteously, and they have laid many unjust things to my charge. Wherefore I thought it meet to appeal to you, that if you can find any fault in me meet to be reformed by God's word, I stand to be reformed; and likewise if my blood shall be shed unrighteously, that it might be required at your hands, because you have taken upon you to be the physician of our country.

Story. Is not this a perverse fellow, to lay to your charge, that his blood shall be required at your hands? Thinkest thou that thou shalt be put to death unjustly, that thy blood should be required? No, if he should condemn an hundred such heretics as thou art. I helped to rid a good many of you: and I promise thee, I will help to rid thee too, the best that I can.

Then I would have answered him, but the bishop desired us both to give him place.

Chich. Well, neighbour Woodman, I call you neighbour, because you are one of my diocese; and you are sent to me that I should give you spiritual counsel: for I am your spiritual pastor. Therefore hear what I shall say to you.

Wood. First, I desire you to hear me a few words. You have said, you will give me spiritual counsel: are you sure you have the Spirit of God?

Chich. No, I am not sure of that.

Wood. No! be you not sure of that?

Chich. No, by St. Mary, I dare not be so bold to say so; I doubt that.

Wood. Then you are like the waves of the sea, as St. James saith, that be tossed about with the wind, and are unstable in all their ways, and can look for no good thing at the Lord's hand: yea, you are neither hot nor cold, and therefore God will spew you out of his mouth, as saith St. John.

Then they were in a great fury, especially Dr. Story, who said,

What a perverse fellow is this! He hath the devil within him, and is mad. He is worse than the devil. Now I perceive that it is true what is reported by thee, and it is the pride of all such heretics to boast themselves:

Chich. Yea surely, he is sent to me to learn, and taketh upon him to teach me.

Wood. The Jews said to Christ, he had the devil, and was mad, as you have said here by me. But I know the servant is not above his master. And God forbid that I should learn of him, who confesseth that he hath not the Spirit of God.

Chich. Why, do you think that you have the Spirit of God?

Wood. I believe verily that I have the Spirit of God.

Chich. You boast more than ever Paul did, or any of the apostles, which is great presumption.

Wood. I boast not in myself, but in the gift of God, as Paul did; for he said he believed verily that he had the Spirit of God, making thereof no doubts, in 1 Cor. vii.

Chich. It is not so, you bely the text.

Wood. If it be not so, let me be burnt to-morrow.

Story. Thou shalt not be burned to-morrow, but thou shalt be burned within these six days, I promise thee.

Chich. If it be so, it is wrong translated, as it is in a thousand places more.

Then one looked in a Latin Testament, another in a Greek Testament, and they said it was in them both, that Paul supposed that he had the Spirit of God, but he was not sure.

Chich. Even so I hope and suppose that I have the Spirit of God, but am not sure.

Wood. If that place be wrong translated, and so many places of the Bible as you say, then I may say with Christ, it cannot be avoided but offences must be given; but woe unto them by whom they come. I may say, Woe unto false translators: for cursed are they that add or take away. But take you heed that you bely not the translators: I believe they had the fear of God more before their eyes, than you report of them. And yet if that place be wrong translated, I can prove by places enough, that Paul had the Spirit of God, as I myself and all God's elect have.

Chich. How prove you that?

Wood. "No man can believe that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost," 1 Cor. vii. I do believe that Jesus Christ is my Redeemer, and that I shall be saved from all my sins by his death and blood-shedding, as Paul and all the apostles did, and as all faithful people ought to do; which no man can do without the Spirit of God. And as there is no damnation to them that are in Christ Jesus; so there is no salvation to them that are not in Christ Jesus. "For he that hath not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his, but is a cast-away," as he saith in the same text. And again, "We have not received the spirit of bondage, to fear any more, but we have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba Father. The same Spirit certifieth our spirits, that we are the sons of God." Here are proofs enough that Paul was sure that he had the Spirit of God. Also St. John saith, "He that believeth not that Christ is come in the flesh, is an Antichrist, and denieth both the Father and the Son:" which is sin against the Holy Ghost, and shall never be forgiven in this world, nor in the world to come. Besides all this, "He that believeth in God, dwelleth in God, and God in him." So it is impossible to believe in God, unless God dwell in us. O good God! what more injury can be done unto thee, than to mistrust that we have received thy Holy Spirit by thy gift? Thus may all men see their blindness, and whose servants they be, as they do declare themselves both by their words and deeds.

Story. O my lord, what an heretic is this fellow! Why hear you him? Send him to prison to his fellows in in the Marshalsea, and they shall be dispatched within these twelve days.

When I heard him say so, I rejoiced greatly in my heart, desiring God, if it were his will, to keep him in that mind: for I looked surely to have gone to the bishop of London's Coal-house, or Lollards'-Tower, yea, I thought myself happy if I might have gone to Lollards'-Tower; but it pleased God to put in their hearts to send me to the Marshalsea, amongst our brethren and my old fellow-prisoners. So merciful hath God dealt with me in easing of my burden that I looked for.

And when they perceived that I feared not imprisonment, but rather rejoiced, the bishop then said, Methinks he is not afraid of the prison.

Wood. No, I praise the living God.

Story. This is an heretic indeed. He hath the right terms of all heretics: the living God! I pray you be there dead gods, that you say the living God?

Wood. Are you angry with me, because I speak the words that are written in the Bible?

Story. Bible babble, bible babble. What speakest thou of the Bible? there is no such word written in all the Bible.

Wood. Then I am much to blame if it be not so written. "Behold, for the offences that you have done, you shall be carried away captive by Nebuchodonosor to Babylon, and there you shall be seven generations: and when you be there, you shall see gods of gold, of silver, of wood, and of stone, borne before and behind you upon men's shoulders, to cast out a fear among the heathen. When you shall see all these abominations, then say in your heart, It is the living God that ought to be worshipped." Here I prove my saying true, both that there is a living God, and that there be dead gods. Also David saith in the Psalms, "My soul hath a desire and longing to enter into the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh rejoice in the living God;" with divers other places that I could recite. Wherefore I marvel that you rebuke me for speaking the truth.

Chich. I do not deny but it is written, and is the truth, and I know it as well as you; but such is the speech of all heretics.

Story. My lord, I will tell you how you shall know an heretic by his words, because I have been more used to them than you have been; that is, they will say [the Lord,] and [we praise God,] and [the living God]. By these words you shall know an heretic.

Wood. All these words are written for our learning, and we are commanded by the prophets to use them daily, as this; "The Lord's name be praised from the rising up of the sun unto the going down of the same." Also, "As many as fear the Lord, say always, the Lord be praised."

Story. My lord, send him to prison, you shall do no good with him, I will go to church, and leave you here. This is an old heretic. Wast thou never before me ere now?

Wood. Yea forsooth, that I have.

Story. Yea, I thought so; and I sent thee to the bishop of London, and he released thee, and thou promised him to be an honest man, and that thou wouldst be of the true catholic church, which thou hast not fulfilled.

Wood. I promised him nothing but I have fulfilled it. No man is able to prove the contrary.

Story. Well, it will be tried well enough. My lord, I will take my leave, I fear you will do this man no good.

Chich. I would not have you to use such speeches as you do, as the Lord be praised, and the living God, with such like words. Can you not say as well, our Lord, or our God, as otherwise?

Wood. I marvel why you should reprove me for it, seeing they be the words of God. I do not refuse to say, our God, or our Lord, when I talk of the scripture where it is written. If I should, it must follow, that I denied the words of God, and must needs be an heretic; but I do not. Wherefore I marvel what you mean to find fault therein. It seemeth to me, that you mistrust that I believe not as you do.

Chich. Yea, that is my meaning indeed.

Wood. I believe in the living God, if you do not so, then our beliefs be not alike indeed. But if it please you to examine me upon any particular matter, now or at any other time, I will make answer thereto by God's help.

Chich. Though you believe in God, I can prove you believe not as you ought to do, as I can shew you by your hand-writing. You have denied the catholic church. Wherefore he that erreth from the church, it cannot be said that his faith is good. Wherefore be ruled by the church, from which you have erred.

Wood. I will not deny my hand by God's help. For I have written nothing at any time but the truth. There may be things written against me, reporting it to be mine, and yet be not; but my hand cannot well be counterfeited, there are enough that know my hand.

Chich. Do you know it yourself, if you see it?

Wood. Yea, that I do.

Then he arose and brought a great bundle of writings, and opened them, and bade me observe. I looked on them, and it was my hand indeed.

Chich. How say you, is it not your own hand-writing?

Wood. Yea, surely it is.

Chich. How say you to this, is not this your hand also?

Wood. Yea, verily it is.

Chich. Well, you know what it meaneth, I dare say.

Wood. Yes, I know it well; here is a great deal, which I had thought had been in my house, but I thank God that it is here: for in this you shall try whether it be true or not. This contains all the talk that was between the commissioners and me, when I was before them five times, and also before the bishop of London divers times: and I am sure, neither you nor they shall find any words false therein written: and I think the sheriff's men, on searching my house for me, when I was taken, found this, and took it with them, but I never knew it before. I am not sorry for it, but am rather glad; for herein you may see all the wrong that I received at their hands, and how long I was in prison, and how I was tossed up and down, and how I was delivered at length, and by this you may try whether it be so or not. I suppose those who found it, and brought it to you, had thought it would have turned to my displeasure; but it is certain all things work for the best to them that fear God.

Chich. Indeed, I find no great fault in this; but here is perilous gear, here is sedition. This was set up upon the church door, which you know well enough.

Wood. Indeed I wrote it to the priest, and to others that took upon them to fetch my child out of my house without my leave, and used it at their pleasure, when they knew it was baptized already, as they were well certified before. Wherefore my conscience compelled me to shew them my mind in writing, wherein is contained nothing but the scriptures of God, rebuking them for their folly.

Chich. Yea, but it is terribly meant, and uncharitably. It is such gear coupled together I promise you, as I never saw the like. But I promise you, I will make the best of it. And I protest before God, I would you should do as well as mine own soul and body. Be contented to be reformed. God hath done his part. Cast not yourself away. Remember your wife and children, and the poor that lack your occupying. Mean to follow your vocation. Remember you are not called to teach nor preach. St. Paul saith, "Let every man walk wherein he is called, and therein abide." Remember you are called to another vocation; for God's sake walk therein. It is not right to do as you have done. You might do as much good by the report of worshipful men, as any man might do in all the country country by your example, and if you would follow the laws of the catholic church, it would be an occasion to bring a great many into the true church, that are out, as you are.

Wood. I would not that you should say that I am out of the church of God, for I am not, but do allow the church of God according to his word. Yea, if I were abroad, if I could win any into the true church, that be out, by any means that I could use, I should be glad. God knoweth I love all people as myself. And where you say I have been a preacher, it is not so. I never took any such thing upon me, as it is well known. But as for teaching I cannot deny; for it becometh every man to teach and instruct his household in the fear of God, and all others (as far as he can) that desire it of him. And whereas you have blamed me for reading the scripture, and leaving my vocation (as you say), I left not my vocation in reading the scripture: for I trust I followed my vocation the better for it. And the greatest reason that compelled me to read the scriptures, was because the preachers and teachers were so changeable.

Chich. No? Did you not preach at a fair?

Wood. No surely, but it was so reported. I was at a fair indeed. While I was in prison, I had leave of the council to go home to pay my debts, and then I went to a fair to sell cattle, and met with divers poor men that I had set to work, who lovingly asked me how I did, and how I could away with imprisonment. I shewed them how God had dealt with me, and how he would also deal with them that put their trust in him; and this they called preaching. And since that it hath been reported that I have baptized children, and married folks, which I never did; for I never was a minister. And if I had, I had done contrary to the order of the apostles, which God forbid I should.

Chich. I am well paid if you be faultless in these things; for I have heard the contrary.

Wood. I have shewed you the truth, and that no man living shall be able to prove the contrary.

Chich. You said you did not disallow the true catholic church.

Wood. No, that I do not.

Chich. Why do you not then go to the church? I am informed you do not go there.

Wood. I trust I am in the true church every day. But to tell you the truth, I come not to the church where the most do resort. For if I was, I should offend, and be offended: for the last time that I was there, I offended many, and was offended myself. For conscience sake therefore I would not come there. I was sent to prison for my coming there, and now I am sent to you for biding thence. So they will not be pleased any way with me, for they seek my life. Look you to it, for I am now in your hands, and you ought to be an house of defence against my enemies. For if you suffer them to kill me, my blood shall be required at your hands. If you can find just cause in me worthy of death by God's word, you may condemn me, and not offend God: wherefore look to it, the matter is weighty, deliver me not into their hands, and think so to be discharged.

Chich. I tell you truth, I can do little in the matter. I have not full authority as yet of mine office: but I will send for you and talk with you, if I thought I should do you any good.

Wood. I should be glad to talk with you, and to let you know my mind in any thing you shall demand of me, now, or at any other time.

So then he desired the sheriff's men to tarry and dine with him; that this man (said he) may dine with me also: for it may be he may have no great store of meat where he is going.

So we tarried to dinner with him, and had no farther talk, neither how to prove where the true church of God is, nor of the sacraments, nor of any thing pertaining toward me, for the space of two hours or more: but he entered into talk with me, how I understood many scriptures, and for bishops and priests marriages, and whether Paul had a wife or not. To whom I answered, It is a thing that I have little to do with, as concerning marriages; but I am content to talk with you in the matter, as far as my poor learning will serve. When he had talked with me of divers scriptures, he liked my discourse well. He asked me how I said by St. Paul, whether he were married or not? To whom I answered, I can prove by the scriptures that he was never married.

Chich. How prove you that?

Wood. I will prove it well enough, by God's help. But yet I will prove that Paul might have had a wife, as well as the other apostles had.

Chich. Why, had the apostles wives?

Wood. Yes, all, saving Paul and Barnabas, as I understand it. For these are Paul's words in the 9th chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians: "Am I not an apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ? Are not ye my work in the Lord? and if I be not an apostle to others, yet to you I am an apostle: for you are the seal of mine apostleship in the Lord. Mine answer to them that ask me, is this, Have we not power to eat and to drink? Or have we not power to lead about a sister to wife, as well as the other apostles have, and as the brethren of the Lord? Or have not Barnabas and I power thus to do?" So this text proveth that Paul and Barnabas were unmarried. But Paul declareth, that the rest had wives, and that they had power likewise so to have, but they found no need thereof. Paul declareth, in the 7th chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, that he who hath no power over his flesh may marry: "For it is better to marry than to burn. Wherefore, to avoid fornication, let every man have his wife." He saith, "Let every man have his wife, and every woman her husband." By this text of scripture, I understand, that bishops and priests may have wives, because they are men, rather than burn, or commit fornication. But I think verily he that can abstain, having power of his own will, doeth best; but if he marieth, he sinneth not.

So then he debated the scriptures with me divers ways, that a bishop or priest ought not to have a wife; but I proved by divers scriptures both in the old law and in the new, that women were at first made for the help of men, which was spoken generally to all men. Wherefore (said I) every man may have a woman, and sin not, in honest matrimony, as well bishops and deacons, as other men, which you call priests, if they be true ministers of Jesus Christ, and of that order that bishops and deacons were in Paul's time. For Paul declareth to Timothy, in the first epistle and 3d chapter, "That a bishop should be the husband of one wife," and how they should be honestly apparelled, and should bring up their children, and likewise the deacons. This proveth more plainly, that both bishops and deacons had wives in the apostles' time, which he could not deny. But then he alledged, that no bishop or priest might take a wife, after he had taken upon him that office; but if he had a wife before he took the office, tried meet for the purpose for his life and his learning, he might keep his wife and bring up his children according to St. Paul's meaning to Timothy, or else might they have no wives.

Then said I, I think Paul's meaning in that place, was, that a man that hath had two wives might not be made a bishop nor a deacon, if he had ever so much learning. But that text doth not say, that a bishop or a deacon may not marry after they be made bishops and deacons. For I am sure that Paul was in the state of a bishop, when he said, "He had power to lead about a sister to wife, as well as the other apostles had." Here Paul declares, that it was in his power to have a wife, after he had the office of a bishop, which was not in his power, if he had been forbidden of God.

Thus have I shewed you my mind in this behalf, both of Paul, and also for the marriages of bishops and priests; as I understand the scriptures. However, it is a thing which I have little to do with: but as you required me to give you my sentiments on that matter, I have done so.

Chich. Marry, I am glad you have said as you have done. Many do affirm boldly that Paul had a wife, and cannot prove it by the scriptures; but you have said very well. I am glad that you are contented to be ruled by God's word. And if you will be contented likewise in other matters, no doubt you will do well: therefore, good Mr. Woodman, be ruled. God hath given you a good wit. I protest before him, I would you should do as well as my own soul and body, and so would all the worshipful men in the country, as they have reported to me.

Wood. Why, my lord, I take God to record that I would be as glad to live in rest and peace as any man in the world, if I might. And I stand to learn, and am contented to be reformed of any thing that I hold, if it can be proved that it be not agreeable to God's word. And the truth is so, I have talked with a dozen priests at the least, since I was delivered out of prison, of certain matters, and they have not been able to certify me in any thing that I have asked them: therefore they have complained of me to the sheriff and justices, forging tales and lies of me, to turn me to displeasure, as much as in them lieth. I promise you, there be as many unlearned priests in your diocese, as in any one diocese in England, I think; the more it is to be lamented.

Chich. I promise you I do much lament it myself: for I hear what you say is true. I wish I could remedy it, but I cannot: but I will do the best that I can when I come into the country; and I will be glad to talk with you at some other time, when I am somewhat better at ease. You see I am very tender now, as I have been more than half a year. Come to dinner; it is ready. I caused you not to tarry for any great cheer that you should have, nor would I have you think that I go about to win you with my meat. But you are welcome with all my heart. Come, sit down.

Wood. I thanked him, and went to dinner; and there dined with him a merchant-man, one of the sheriff's men, and I; and we had good cheer, God be praised therefore. We had no talk of the scriptures all dinner time: but when dinner was over, the bishop said—

Now call Mr. Story's man: for the commissioners have committed you to prison: but I will send for you before it be long, and I pray God I may do you good. I should be very glad of it.

Wood. Should it please you to send for me, I should be glad to talk with you, for I like your talk well. And then, if it please your lordship to examine me on any particular matter, I will shew you my mind therein, by God's grace, without dissimulation. But pray let me have nothing to do with Mr. Story, for I think he is a man void of reason.

Chich. Well, before you go, what say you to the seven sacraments? Let me hear what you say to them, that I may be the more willing to send for you.

Wood. I know not seven sacraments.

Chich. Then what shall I talk with you? How many do you know?

Wood. I know but two; one the sacrament of baptism, and the other the supper of the Lord. But if you can justly prove by God's word, that there be more than two, I stand to be reformed.

Chich. If I prove not seven by God's word, then believe me not: and so he bade me farewell.

Then the sheriff's two men, and one of Dr. Story's, carried me to Dr. Cook's house, when Dr. Cook commanded them to carry me to the sheriff's prison in Southwark, saying, he shall be called before us again shortly, and all his fellows, and we shall dispatch them from troubling the country any more.

And so I was brought to the Marshalsea, where I now am (God be praised), looking for judgment of my flesh; for they intend to dispatch me shortly, if God gives them leave: but he hath their hearts in his hands, and they can do nothing to me but as he pleases. Wherefore I commit my cause to God only, and I am sure there shall not one hair of my head perish without my heavenly Father's will, although I undergo ever so much trouble. Job perished not, for all his trouble, although God gave the devil leave to trouble and try him divers and many ways, as he hath suffered his members to trouble and try me divers and many ways. They shall as little prevail against my faith (I trust), as the devil prevailed against Job, whatsoever they do with my goods, life, or body. He that kept Job in all his trouble, neither slumbereth nor sleepeth, but keepeth me, and all his elect, that whether we live or die, it shall be to the praise and glory of God. For if we live, we live at the Lord's will, and if we die, we die to his will: so, live or die, we are the Lord's; therefore blessed be his name.

Wherefore, dear brethren and sisters, to whom my writing shall come, be of good cheer, and fear not what man can do unto you. They can but kill the body: but fear him that hath power to destroy both body and soul. And yet once again I bid you be of good cheer. For the sheriff, with divers other gentlemen and priests, whilst I was at the sheriff's house, said to me, that all the heretics in the country hung on me, as the people did in times past upon St. Augustine or St. Ambrose, or such like. Wherefore, said they, look well on it, you have a great thing to answer for. I answered, I pray God lay nothing more to my charge, than he will do for heresy, as I am sure he will not. For he hath set my sins as far from me as it is from east to west: so that I am sure they shall never come near me again. Yea, and in that they call heresy, we serve God withal. I am sure there is no man nor woman that hangeth on me, but on God. Yet that is their imaginations and thoughts, that if they might win me to them, they should win a great many likewise; and thinking to kill me, if they cannot win me, as I trust in God they never shall by his grace, if it were possible for them to kill me ten times. For I am so linked to Christ in a chain by faith, that it is impossible for men to loose us asunder, neither for life nor death, I praise my Lord God therefore. And no doubt their intent and purpose is to kill me, thinking thereby to make others afraid. Which death of my body were best of all for me, if God be pleased. But if I may live for the comfort of others, his name be praised therefore: I know what he can do; but what he will do I know not. But if death be offered me, so that I cannot refuse it without displeasing of God, I trust in him I shall not offend my brethren in receiving death, but shall rather be the cause of their faith being strengthened, by chusing and receiving it with joy. As Christ hath given his life for us, so ought we to give our lives for the defence of the gospel, and comfort of our brethren. Whereas the bishop saith, he will prove seven sacraments, be you out of doubt he will never be able to do it, no more than he hath proved other arguments with me already.

Thus fare ye well, from the Marshalsea, where I now am, as a sheep appointed to be slain, God be praised therefore.

The second Examination of RICHARD WOODMAN before the Bishop of Chichester, two of his Chaplains, and Dr. STORY, on April 27.

FIRST, I was sent for to the Marshalsea by Dr. Story, and carried to his house near St. Nicholas Shambles: when I had spoken to him, he sent me to the bishop of Chichester, and said he would come to him presently. When we were in the bishop's hall, I was sent for by the bishop, and when I came before him, I paid my obeisance.

Then said the bishop, You are welcome. How do you now?

Wood. Well, I praise God, thanking your lordship for the gentle talk that you had with me at our last interview.

Chich. Well, good Mr. Woodman, I have sent for you out of love and good-will to talk with you, and and would have you to tell me your mind in few words. For indeed the last time that I talked with you, our talk was so long, that I fell into a great drought, and have been the worse in my body ever since. Wherefore, I pray you, let me know your mind briefly in those particular matters that I shall demand of you, according to the promise that you made when you was last with me. Will you?

Wood. Yea, I will answer to any thing you shall demand of me (by God's help) as well as I can.

Chich. How say you by the seven sacraments? for there we left off, and there we will begin again. You said then there were but two. How say you now to it? Will you deny all except two?

Wood. I say now as I said then. You said, there be seven sacraments; and I said I knew but two; but if you could prove seven by God's word, when I came before you again, I must needs grant them. And you said, if you could not prove them by God's word, I should not believe them: and now I am come to see how well you can prove them.

At which words the bishop and his chaplains were moved.

Chich. By God and my troth, I believe he thinketh I cannot prove them. How say you to the sacrament of matrimony?

Wood. Why, my lord, St. Paul saith to Timothy, A bishop should be faultless; and you use much swearing, which is the greatest fault in a bishop of all others, that should be an example to the flock.

Then the bishop and his priests were in a rage with me, because I reprov'd him for swearing.

Chich. What, I perceive this man is worse than he was the last day: what, he taketh upon him to teach me to speak, as though I could not tell what I had to do.

Priest. So I think, my lord, he is a stout fellow indeed, as we have seen.

Wood. Yea, I am stout, because I do what I am commanded. I dare not for my life hold my peace; for I should bear your sin, which I will not do for any of you, I tell you plainly.

Chich. Where find you that you are commanded to reprove me?

Wood. If thou see thy brother sin, reprove him; if he repent, thou hast won thy brother. But you repent it not, but rather go about to maintain the same, Christ saith, "He that breaketh one of the least of my commandments, and teacheth men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven;" and you go about to teach men so, as far as I see.

Priest. Why, my lord, this man is past cure. I see no hope in him.

Chich. No, so I think. I will never talk with him more. Call Mr. Story; let him do with him as he will. He hath been with his fellows in the Marshalsea, and is worse than he was before. I had some hope in him the other day, but now I see none.

Wood. No, I praise God, my faith hangeth upon no man, but upon God.

Priest. Nay, my lord, I think he is not the worse for them: I fear they be the worse for him. I know this man of old, before mine old lord.

Wood. Well, my lord, look well to it: will you deliver me to other men to shed my blood, and so think to wash your hands of me, as Pilate did by Christ? Nay, you cannot be so discharged.

Chich. I have nothing to do with you: but of my gentleness I have sent for you, because you said, you would declare your mind in any particular matter I would demand of you.

Wood. Why, I do not deny but I will do so, if you demand it of me. But you go about to deliver me to others to kill me: and I know there is none that hath to do with me but you.

Chich. I am not yet consecrated: wherefore my lord cardinal may examine you, and condemn you, or my lord of London; for you are now in his diocese.

Wood. Yea, my lord, is the matter even so? Then I perceive whereabouts you go. Nay, I will talk no more with you then, if you be at that point. Ask me what you will, but I will shew you nothing of my mind. I promise you I will not answer in particular matters, so that you may accuse me to others, and they to kill me.

Chich. I go not about to kill you, but would be glad to hear your mind respecting the sacraments, and if you do not understand them, I should be glad to let you know how I understand them. For I would you should do as well as mine own self.

Wood. If you would talk with me to do me good, I would be content to hear you, and tell you my mind; otherwise I should be loth.

Chich. Nay, I will promise you, if I can do you no good, I will do you no harm: for if I meant to do you harm, I would lay your own hand-writing against you, but I will not: wherefore be in no doubt of me. What say you to the sacrament of matrimony? is it a sacrament or no? What think you of it?

Wood. I think it is an holy institution ordained by God in paradise, and so to continue to the world's end.

Chich. Lo, now you shall see how you be deceived in that, as you be in all the rest. Come hither. You can read Latin I am sure.

Wood. Yes, I can read Latin, but I understand very little.

Chich. Come to me, you shall see that Paul calleth it an holy sacrament. For these are his words, "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined to his wife: and two shall be made one flesh:" this is a great sacrament.

Wood. I remember such a saying; but St. Paul calleth it not a sacrament, but he saith, "It is a great mystery."

Chich. Where saith he so?

Wood. I am not sure in what text it is, but I am sure these are St. Paul's words, and that he calleth it not a sacrament in all his writings.

Chich. What, the last day you were full of scriptures! here it is written, and there it is written. Why, we can rehearse the scriptures as well as you. Wherefore, if we are sure it is written, it is no great matter for the place. Come hither, I will shew you the place, I think, that you mean.

I looked, and it was written Sacramentum. I know it is a great mystery, in the English translation.

Chich. I permit it to be a mystery. What is a mystery?

Wood. A mystery is (as I take it) unseen; for he saith, he speaketh betwixt Christ and the congregation: so the great mystery that he speaketh of, I take to be the faith of them that are married, which is hid in Christ, which we see not, but Christ. But the deed which is in the congregation, which is the outward marriage we see, but the inward marriage of the heart we see not. Wherefore Paul calleth it a mystery. Therefore if it be a sacrament, it is invisible to us: it is not seen, as other sacraments are.

Chich. Nay, I tell you it is a visible sacrament, seen as the others are; for is not the marriage seen, is not the man and woman seen?

Wood. My lord, I pray you, what is a sacrament?

Chich. It is a sign of a holy thing.

Wood. Methinks you have certified me very well. There need not be a sign of a holy thing, where the holy thing is itself.

Then his chaplains would have interrupted me, but I desired my lord I might speak my mind in the matter. So with much ado he bade me say what I could.

There need not be a sign of a thing, where the thing is itself. Matrimony is holy of itself, and is ended outwardly, and need no more signs but themselves; so it cannot be a sacrament as others be.

Chich. Lo, how much you speak against yourself. For example, I come by an hosier's shop, and there hangeth a pair of hose, which be hose, and are a sign that hose is sold within.

Priest. What say you to this? Now my lord hath hit you home indeed.

Wood. He hath hit me perilously, I tell you, with sophistry to blind mine eyes withal. I wonder you are are not all ashamed of it. I can answer that to all your shames, if I might be justly heard.

Priest. What, you are angry, methinks.

Wood. I am not angry, but I am in earnest, to see your blindness and folly. I talked of the scriptures that be written, and it is God's word, to prove my matter true by, and you will prove your matter true by a pair of hoes. And you can as well prove it by that as by God's word.

Priest. Why, is there nothing true but what is written in the Bible?

Wood. St. Paul saith to the Galatians, chap. i. "If an angel come from heaven, and preach any other doctrine than may be proved by God's word, hold him accursed:" and so do I, I tell you plainly.

Priest. Here is a Testament in my hand, if I hurl it into the fire and burn it, have I burned God's word or not? I will buy a new one for sixteen-pence.

Wood. I say you have burned God's word, and I believe he that will burn a Testament willingly, would burn God himself, if he were here, if he could; for he and his word are one.

Then they made a great laughing at it.

Wood. Laugh on. Your laughing will be turned to weeping, and all such joy will be turned to mourning, if you repent it not with speed.

Then the bishop began to cloak the priest's folly, and said, Why, if my counting-house were full of books, and if my house should chance to be on fire, and be burned, was God's word burned?

Wood. No, my lord, because they were burned against your will: but yet if you should burn them willingly, or think it well, you burn God's word as well as he. For he that is not sorry for a shrewd turn, doth allow it to be good.

Chich. Follow your vocation; you have a little learning. "We have an altar, whereof you may not eat." What meaneth St. Paul thereby?

Wood. There is no man so foolish to eat stones, I suppose.

Chich. What mockers and scornors be you, to say, no man will be so foolish to eat stones? it is a plain mock.

Wood. Why, my lord, you said I had no learning, nor knowledge, nor understanding: wherefore it becomes you to make things more plain to me, and not to ask me such dark questions, and yet blame me too; methinks it is too much.

Chich. I dare say you know what it meaneth well enough. The greatest fool in my house will understand my meaning better than you do.

There stood some of his men at a distance, talking together by a window. He called one by his name.

Chich. Come hither, I say to thee thou shalt not eat of this table. What do I mean thereby?

Chich. Man. Forsooth, my lord, you would not have me eat of this table; laying his hand thereon.

With this answer he made all them in the house fall a laughing, and I could not hold it in, but burst out with laughter, and said—

He hath expounded the matter almost as well as I.

Chich. He meaneth well enough, if you would understand him.

Answer me again, to make it more plain, I say to thee thou shalt not eat of this table. What mean I thereby?

Chich. Man. Forsooth, you would not have me eat this table.

These words made them all laugh. Wherewith the bishop was almost angry, because the answer proved no better, and said—

He meaneth that I would not have him eat any of the meat that is set upon this table. How sayest thou, dost thou not mean so?

Chich. Man. Yes, forsooth, my lord, that was my meaning indeed.

Wood. Yea, my lord, now you have told him what you mean, he can say so too; and so could I have done (as little wit as I have) if you had said,

Paul meant that no man should eat of that which was offered upon the altar, but the priests.

Chich. Yea, I perceive you understand the meaning of Paul well enough, but that you like to cavil with me.

Wood. Why, my lord, do you think I understand such dark places of the scripture without learning? You said, even now, I had no knowledge nor learning, wherefore I answered you as you judged of me.

Chich. Well, let this matter pass, and let us turn to the principal again. How say you by the sacrament of the altar?

Wood. You mean the sacrament of the body and blood of Jesus Christ.

Chich. I mean the sacrament of the altar, and so I say.

Wood. You mean Christ to be the altar, do you not?

Chich. I mean the sacrament of the altar in the church. What, is it so strange to you?

Wood. It is strange to me indeed, if you mean the altar of stone.

Chich. It is that altar that I mean.

Wood. I understand not the altar so.

Chich. No, I think so indeed: and that is the cause that you be deceived. I pray you, how do you understand the altar then?

Wood. If you will give me leave till I have done, I will shew you how I understand the altar, and where it is.

Chich. Yes, you shall have leave to say your mind as much as you will.

Wood. It is written, Matt. xviii. "That whosoever two or three be gathered together in Christ's name, there is he in the midst of them; and whatsoever they ask the Father upon earth, it shall be granted them in heaven." Agreeing to the 5th of Matthew, saying, "When thou comest to offer thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee, leave there thy offering, and go first and be reconciled to thy brother, and then offer thy gift." The priests would have interrupted me, but the bishop bade them let me alone, for (said he) you shall hear a pretty conclusion anon.

I pray you let me make an end, quoth I, and then find fault with me if you can. Now to the matter. In these two places of scripture, I prove that Christ is the true altar, whereon every Christian man and woman ought to come and offer their gifts. First, wherefore the people are gathered together in Christ's name, there is he in the midst; and where he is, there is the altar, so that we may be bold to come and offer our gift, if we be in love and charity; if not, we must leave there our offering, and go first and be reconciled to our brother, and agree with him quickly, and so forth, and then come and offer our gift. Some will say, How shall I agree with mine adversary, when he is an hundred miles off? May I not pray till I have spoken with him? To all such I answer, If thou dost presume to pray among the faithful, wishing evil to any man, woman or child, thou askest vengeance upon thyself. No such asketh any thing else of the Lord in his prayer. Wherefore agree with thine adversary, that is, make thy life agreeable to God's word. Say in thy heart, without dissimulation, that thou askest God and the world forgiveness from thy heart, intending never to offend them any more. Then all such may be bold to come and offer their gift, their prayer, on the altar, where the people of God are gathered together. Thus have I shewed you my mind, both of the altar, and of the offering, as I understand it.

Chich. Do you understand the offering and the altar so? I never heard any man understand it so, no not Luther, the great heretic, that was condemned by a general council, and his picture burned.

Wood. If he were an heretic, I think he understood it, not so indeed, but I am sure all christians ought to understand it so.

Chich. O what vain-glory is in you, as though you underunderstood all things, and other men nothing? Hear me; I will shew you the true understanding both of the altar, and the offering on the altar. We have an altar (saide Paul, Heb. xiii.) "that ye may not eat of." Meaning, that no man might eat of that which was offered on the altar, but the priest. For in Paul's time all the living that the priest had, the people came and offered it on the altar, money or other things: and when the people came to offer it, and then remembered that they had any thing against their brother, then they left their offering upon the altar, and went and were reconciled to their brother: and they came again and offered their gift, and the priest had it. This is the true understanding of the place that you have rehearsed; wherefore you be deceived.

Wood. My lord, that was the use in the old law. Christ was the end of that. But indeed I perceive by Paul's words, that sacrifice was offered in Paul's time: yet that maketh not that it was well done, but he rebuked it. Wherefore it seemeth to me that you be deceived.

Chib. Who shall be judges between us in this matter?

Wood. The 12th of John declareth who shall be judge in the last day.

Chib. You mean the word shall judge the word, how can that be?

Wood. St. Peter saith, "The scripture hath no private interpretation;" but one scripture must be understood by another.

Chib. You will understand it one way, and I will understand it another; and who shall be judge between us then?

Wood. The true church of God is able to discuss all doubts: to whom I refer it.

Chib. I am glad you say so, if you mean so indeed.

Wood. My lord, I never meant otherwise.

Chib. The church of God doth allow the sacrament of the altar.

Wood. What do you now offer upon the altar?

Chib. We offer up, in the blessed sacrament of the altar, the body of Christ, to pacify the wrath of God the Father; and therewith they all put off their caps to the abominable idol.

Wood. St. Paul saith to the Hebrews, in the 10th chapter, "We are sanctified by offering of the body of Jesus Christ upon the cross once for all:" and all priests are daily ministering, and oftentimes offering one manner of offering, which can never take away sins; and that is the offering that you use to offer. As far as I can see, you be priests after the order of Aaron, that offered up sacrifice for their own sins, and the sins of the people.

Chib. Nay, Aaron's sacrifice was with blood, which signifieth the death of Christ, the which was ended upon the cross by his blood-shedding; but we are priests after the order of Melchisedek, which offereth bread to the king in remembrance, and signifieth the giving of Christ's body in bread and wine at the last supper, which he gave to his disciples, and commanded it to be used to the end of the world. This is the sacrifice that we offer, according to his word.

Wood. I think you have made the matter plain to me, that as Christ was the end of all sacrifices, so was he the beginning of the sacraments, willing them to be used in remembrance of him, to the world's end.

Chib. What in remembrance of him, and not himself, as his word saith, "Take, eat, this is my body;" it is not the sign only, but the thing itself. How say you? is it not his body, after the words are spoken by the priest? How say you? Go briefly to work, for I cannot long tarry with you.

Wood. My lord, if you will answer me to one sacrament, I will answer you to another.

Chib. Yes, I am well content with that.

Wood. If you say the words of baptism over the water, and there be no child there, is there true baptism?

No. 50.

Chib. No, there must be the water, the word and the child, and then it is baptism.

Wood. Very well. Then if a child be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, it is not truly baptized.

Chib. No: the child must be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, or else it is not truly baptized.

Wood. Then there may be nothing added, nor taken away from the sacraments?

Chib. No.

Wood. Now, my lord, I will answer to you, if you please.

Chib. Well, how say you, "Take, eat, this is my body;" is it not Christ's body, as soon as the words be said?

Wood. My lord, I will answer you by your own words, which is true: the water, the word, and the child; all these together make baptism: the bread, wine, and the word, make the sacrament; and the eater, eating in true faith, maketh it his body. Here I prove it is not Christ's body, but to the faithful receiver. For he said, "Take, eat, this is my body." He called it not his body before eating, but after. St. Augustine saith, Believe and thou hast eaten. And St. John saith, "He that believeth in God, dwelleth in God, and God in him:" so it is impossible to dwell in God, and to eat his body, without a true faith.

Priest. Then the faith of the receiver maketh it his body, and not his word, by your saying. I pray you what did Judas eat?

Wood. Judas did eat the sacrament of Christ, and the devil withal.

Priest. He eat the body of Christ unworthily, as St. Paul saith.

Wood. Nay, St. Paul saith no such thing. He speaketh not of eating his body unworthily, but of the sacrament unworthily. For he saith, "Whosoever eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation, because he maketh no difference of the Lord's body." If Judas had eat Christ's body, it must needs follow, that Judas is saved. For Christ saith, in the 6th of John, "Whosoever eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up again at the last day."

Priest. My lord, this man is an interpreter after his own mind.

Chib. I see it is but folly to talk with you; it is but lost labour. How say you? do you not believe that after the words be said, there remaineth neither bread nor wine, but the real body of Christ? Make me a plain answer, for I will talk no more with you.

Wood. I will make you a direct answer, how I believe of the true sacrament. I do believe, that if I come to receive the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ truly ministered, believing that Christ was born for me, and that I shall be saved from my sins by his blood-shedding, and so receive the sacrament in that remembrance, then I believe I do receive wholly Christ, God and man, mystically by faith: this I believe.

Chib. Why, then it is no body without faith; God's word is of no force, as you count it.

Wood. My lord, I have told you my mind without dissimulation, and more you get not of me, without you will talk with me by the scriptures: and if you will do so, I will begin anew with you, and prove it more plainly three or four manner of ways, that you shall not say nay to that I have said.

Then they made a great laughing, and said, This is an heretic indeed; it is time he were burned. Which words moved my spirit, and I said to them, Judge not, lest you be judged. For as you judge me, you shall be judged yourselves. What you call heresy, I serve God truly with, as you all shall well know, when you shall be in hell, and have blood to drink, and shall be compelled to say for pain, This was the man that we jested on, and whose talk we thought foolishness, and his end to be without honour: but now we may see how he is counted among the saints of God, and we are punished. These words you shall say, being in hell, if you repent not with speed, if you consent to the shedding of my blood: wherefore look to it, I give you counsel.

Priest. What, you are angry, methinks. Now I will say more to you than I thought to have done. You were at Baxill a twelvemonth ago, and sent for the parson, and talked with him in the church-yard, and would not go into the church; for you said it was the idol's temple. Yea, I was with mine old lord, when he came to the King's-Bench to you, and you said many stout words to him.

Wood. That I said, I said: and where you said I was angry, I take God to my record, I am not, but am zealous in the truth, and speak out of the Spirit of God with cheerfulness.

Priest. The Spirit of God? hough, hough, hough! think you that you have the Spirit of God?

Wood. I believe surely that I have the Spirit of God, I praise God for it; and you are deceivers, mockers, and scorers before God, and are the children of hell, all the sort of you, as far as I can see. And therewith came in Dr. Story, pointing at me with his finger, speaking to the bishop in Latin, saying at length:

Story. I can say nothing to him, but he is an heretic. I have heard you talk this hour and a half, and can hear no reason in him.

Wood. Judge not, lest you be judged: for as you judge, you shall be judged yourself.

Story. What, be you a preaching? you shall preach at a stake shortly with your fellows. My lord, trouble yourself no more with him.

With these words, one brought word that the abbot of Westminster was come to dine with the bishop, and many other gentlemen and women. Then there was running away with speed to him.

Then said Dr. Story to my keeper, Carry him to the Marshalsea again, keep him close, and let nobody come to speak with him.

And so they departed. Then one of the priests began to flatter me, and said, For God's sake remember yourself. God hath given you a good wit: you have read the scriptures well, and have borne them well in memory. It were a great pity you should do amiss.

Wood. What a flatterer be you, to say my wit is good, and that I have read the scriptures well; and but even now you said I was an heretic, and despised me. If I be an heretic, I can have no good wit, as you have confessed. But I think your own conscience doth accuse you. God give you grace to repent, if it be his will.

Priest. I call it a good wit, because you are expert in all questions.

Wood. You may call it a wicked wit, if it agree not with God's word. Then one cried, Away, away, here come strangers. So we departed, and I came again to the Marshalsea with my keeper.

The Third Examination of Mr. WOODMAN, (copied with his own Hand) before Dr. LANGDALE, Chaplain to my Lord MONTAGUE, and Mr. JAMES GAGE, at my Lord MONTAGUE's House, near St. Mary Overy's, in Southwark, May 12, 1557.

THE 12th of May the marshal came to the Marshalsea, and sent for me to speak with him. When I came before him and had done my duty, he asked my name, and what countryman I was; I informed him both. Then he asked me when I was abroad in the city. To whom I answered, If it shall please your mastership, I was abroad in the city on Monday was seven-night.

Marshal. What took you abroad?

Wood. The bishop of Chichester sent for me to talk with me at his house, near St. Nicholas's Shambles.

Marshal. Were you abroad no otherwise than so?

Wood. No, forsooth: I was never abroad since I was sent hither, but then. For I have nothing to do abroad, unless they send for me.

Marshal. This is a marvellous matter. I promise you I was not so rebuked these seven years, as I was for you within these three days. It is reported that you were abroad in the city at certain taverns, and spake seditious words both in the taverns and streets as you went.

Wood. Sir, the truth is, I was in never a house or tavern while I was abroad, but in the bishop's house, as my keeper can, and will (I am sure) testify: nor did I ever talk with any man in the streets as I came, but with my keeper, except one man indeed, of the parish of Framfield, in Suffex, where Mr. James Gage dwelleth. His name is Robert Smith, being one of my greatest enemies; who stood in a wain as we came by, and was unlading of cheese but a little way from the Marshalsea. Indeed I bade him God speed, and asked him how he did: and he said, well, he thanked me. And he asked me how I did; and I said, well, I praise God; and that was all the talk that we had. And these words were spoken as I came by him: I promise you, sir, I stood not still while I spake them, as my keeper can tell: and I think these words were not seditious words, but might be spoken well enough, I think, or else it were very strait.

Marsh. Then it is to be thought, that that man reported otherwise than it was. I am glad it is as you say. Well, make you ready: for you must go forth straitway, where you shall be examined of that and of other things, where you shall answer for yourself. Go, make haste, for I will tarry till you be ready.

So I departed, and went to my fellow-prisoners, and took my leave of them, desiring them to pray for me, for I expected to see them no more. I did suppose I should have gone before the council, because the marshal said, he would tarry for me himself: and especially because he said, it was reported that I had spoken seditious words, I imagined they had contrived false things against me to bring me to my end. I remembered what Christ said, "The servant is not above his lord." Seeing the Jews brought false witnesses against Christ, I thought they would do much more, or at least do so to me, if God would suffer them, which made me think the worst. But I was sure that all the world could not justly accuse me of any such thing, which made me merry and joyful, being confident withal, that they could do no more against me than God would permit. I took my leave of my fellow-prisoners, and went to the marshal in the porter's lodge, and he delivered me to one of his own men, and one of my lord Montague's men, and bade me go with them: and they carried me to my lord Montague's Place, in Southwark, not far from St. Mary Overy's, and brought me into a chamber in my lord Montague's house; and there was one Dr. Langdale, chaplain to my lord. My keepers said to the doctor, This is the man that we went for.

Lang. Is your name Woodman?

Wood. Yea, forsooth, that is my name.

Then he began with a great circumstance, and said, I am sorry for you, that you will not be ruled, but stand so much in your own conceit, displeasing your father and others, judging that all the realm doth evil, saving a few that do as you do: what think you of them that died long ago, your grandfather, with their fathers before them? You judge them to be damned, and all others that use the same as they did throughout all Christendom, unless it be in Germany, and here in England a few years, and in Denmark; and yet they are returned again. Thus we are sure this is the truth, and I would you should do well. Your father is an honest man, and one of my parish, and hath wept to me divers times because you would not be ruled: and he loveth you well, and so doth all the country, both rich and poor, if it were not for those evil opinions that you hold.

Wood.

Wood. I pray you give me leave to speak a few words to you.

Lang. Yes, say your mind.

Wood. You have told a great long tale, as it were against me (as you think), saying, I hold this and that; I judge my father and my grandfather, and almost all the world, except a few of our sect. But I judge no man. The 12th of John declareth, who it is that judgeth, and shall judge in the last day. The father shall not bear the son's offences, nor the son the father's offences: but that soul that sinneth shall die, as saith the prophet. And again, We may not follow a multitude to do evil, as saith the prophet: for the most go the wrong way. And Christ saith in the 12th of Luke, that his flock is a little flock. Here are places enough to discharge me, although I do not as the most do. But can any man say that I do not as I ought to do? where are my accusers?

Lang. What, you be full of scriptures methinks, and call your accusers as though you were afraid to utter your mind to me. But I would have you not be afraid to talk with me, for I mean no more hurt to you than I do to myself, I take God to be my record.

Wood. I cannot tell; it is hard trusting to fair words. When a man cannot trust his father nor brother, nor others that have been his familiar friends, but they deceive him, a man may lawfully follow the example of Christ towards them that he never saw before, saying, "Be as wise as serpents, and as innocent as doves. Beware of men, for they go about to betray you." And I suspect you, because you blame me for answering with the scriptures. I doubt that you would take advantage of me, if I should speak mine own words. Wherefore I will take as good heed as I can, because I have been deceived already by them I trusted most. So blame me not, though I answer circumspectly. It shall not be said, by God's help, that I will run wilfully into my enemy's hands, and yet I praise God my life is not dear to myself, but it is dear with God: wherefore I will do the uttermost that I can to keep it.

Lang. You are afraid where no fear is, for I was desired by master Sheriff and his brother, and other friends, to talk with you, and they told me that you were desirous to talk with me, and now you make the matter as though you had nothing to do with me, and as though you were sent to prison for nothing: for you call for your accusers, as though there were no man to accuse you. But if there were no man to accuse you, your own hand-writing did accuse you enough, that you set upon the church-door (if you remember it), and other letters that you let fall abroad, at divers places. Wherefore you need not call for your accusers. Your own hand will accuse you, I warrant you; it is kept safe enough. I would not for two hundred pounds there were so much against me.

Wood. I will not deny my own hand; for it cannot easily be counterfeited. I do not deny but I wrote a letter to the priest, and others of the parish, declaring their folly and presumption, to come into my house without my love or leave, and take out my child, and use it at their pleasure: which moved me to write my mind unto them: and because I could not tell how to convey it to them, I set it on the church door: which letter my lord of Chichester hath; for he shewed it me when I was before him: wherein is contained nothing but the very scriptures, to their reproach. Let it be laid before me when you or he will, I will answer to it by the help of God, to all their shames that I wrote it to. And as for any other letters, I wrote none, as you said I did, neither had I wrote that, if they had done like honest neighbours. Wherefore if they be offended with me for that, I will answer them with Christ's words, in Matthew xviii. Woe unto themselves, because they gave me the occasion.

And whereas you said, I was desirous to speak with you, and that master Sheriff and his brother, and other of my friends, willed you to talk with me, and that I set now as though I had nothing to do with you, and as though I were sent to prison for nothing: the truth is,

I know no more why I am sent to prison, than the least child in this town knoweth. And as for me, I desired not master Sheriff to speak with you; but indeed he desired me that I would speak with you, and utter my faith to you. For he supposed that I did not believe well, and he reported you to be learned. But I refused to talk with you at the first. For I remembered not that you were the parson at Baxted: and I said to him, I would not utter my faith to any but to the bishop. I said, he is my ordinary, and I appeal unto him. I am commanded by St. Peter, in the first epistle, chap. iii. to render account of my hope that I have in God, to him that hath authority: wherefore I will talk with none in that matter, but with him. Wherefore send me to him if you will, or else there shall no man know my faith, I tell you plainly.

These words made the sheriff angry, and he went his way, and when he was gone from me, I remembered that it was you that he would have me to talk with; and then I remembered that I had made the promise to my father and Goodman Day, of Vefield, not past a fortnight before I was taken, that whensoever you came into the country, I would speak with you by God's help, because they praised you so much, that you were learned, and they would fain hear us talk.

So all these things called to remembrance, I desired my keeper, which was the sheriff's man, to tell his master that I would fain speak with him; for I had remembered things that were not in my mind before, when I spake to him. So he went to his master, and shewed him the matter, and he came to me; and then I told him my mind, and what promise I had made; and he said he would send for you on the morrow, as he did, and the messenger brought word you could not come; you preached before the queen, he said. Whereupon the sheriff came up himself, and spoke to bishop Christopherson, that he should come down, but he was sick. So when he came home again, he sent me to the bishop, and I have talked with him twice already, and I am sure he can find no fault in me, if he say justly; and yet I know not wherefore I was sent to prison; for I was not guilty of that which was laid to my charge, that I had baptized children, the which I never did, as God knoweth; wherefore I had wrong to be thus handled.

Lang. Indeed it hath been reported, that you have christened children; and that you christened your own child; but since I heard say, you would not have the child christened, which is a damnable way, if you deny baptism? and they said, your child was not christened in a fortnight or three weeks after it was born, and the chiefest of the parish were obliged to fetch it out of your house against your will. So you wrote railing words against the priest and them for their good will: the which declareth that you allow not the baptizing of children. And if the child had died, it had been damned, because it was not christened, and you should have been damned, because you were the hindrance thereof.

Wood. What abominable lies have you told? Be you not ashamed to speak such words as you have? First you say, I christened my own child, and by and by you say, I denied baptizing of children, and that my child was a fortnight or three weeks old before it was baptized. What abominable lies be these? I neither baptized my child myself, neither held against the baptizing of it, but did most gladly allow it; for it was baptized as soon as it was born, and I was glad thereof; therefore you are to blame to report such things of me.

Lang. I pray you, who baptized it? some unthrif of your providing.

Wood. Nay, surely, the midwife baptized it.

Lang. But it was your mind that it should be so.

Wood. Nay sure, I was not nigh home by almost twenty miles, nor heard that my wife was brought to bed till four days after the child was christened. But it was not like to live, so the midwife baptized it.

Lang. Would you have had it to church to have been christened, if it had not been christened?

Wood.

Wood. That is no matter what I would have done. I am sure you cannot deny but it is sufficiently done, if the midwife do it, and I hold not against the doing of it, neither did I it myself, as you said I did.

Lang. Wherefore were you displeased with them that carried it to church?

Wood. First tell me whether the child were not truly baptized by the midwife?

Lang. Yes, it was truly baptized, if she baptized it in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

Wood. Yes, that I am sure she did, and you grant that was sufficient: and the cause that I blamed them was, because they did more to it than need was, as you say. Yea, they fetched it out of the house, without my leave; which was not well done.

Lang. They had it to church, to confirm what was done.

Wood. Yea, but that was more than needs. But God forgive them, if it be his will. Let that matter pass. But I would you should not say, that I hold against baptizing of children; for I do not, I take God to record; but do allow it to be most necessary, if it be truly used. But methought you spake words even now that were unfit to be spoken: if a child die, and be not baptized, it is damned. How think you? be all damned that receive not the outward sign of baptism?

Lang. Yea, that they be.

Wood. How prove you that?

Lang. "Go, faith Christ, and baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and he that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved: and he that believeth not, shall be damned." These be the words of Christ, which are my warrant.

Wood. Then, by your saying, baptism bringeth faith, and all that be baptized in water shall be saved. Shall they?

Lang. Yea, that they shall; if they die before they come to discretion, they shall all of them be saved; and all that be not baptized, shall be damned every one of them.

Wood. Then my spirit was moved with him to reprove him sharply, because I had manifest scriptures fresh in my mind against his saying. Then said I—

O Lord God! how dare you speak such blasphemy against God and his word, as you do? How dare you take upon you to preach and teach the people, and understand not what you say? I protest before God you understand not the scriptures, but as far as natural reason can comprehend. For if you did, you would be ashamed to speak as you do.

Lang. Wherein have I spoken amiss? take heed, you have a toy in your head will make you despair: I dare say you cannot tell what you say. Wherefore reprove you me as you do?

Wood. Because you blaspheme God; and as for despairing, take heed to yourself. For I cannot see but you be out of your wits already; and as for me, I praise God, I can tell what I say, and what you have said; which shall turn to your shame, if you will talk by the scriptures with me.

So when he perceived that I spake in earnest, and challenged him to talk by the word, his colour began to change, and his flesh to tremble and quake. And I said—

Prove your sayings true, if you can; for I will prove them false, with God's help. You said, All children, or others, that be not baptized with water, shall be damned. I dare not say so for all the good in the world. And you brought in Christ's saying as a warrant. In Mark xvi. it is written, "Who so believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved;" which words are true: "and who so believeth not, shall be damned." Which words be true also. He says, "He that believeth not, shall be damned." Yea, St. John saith, "He that believeth not, is condemned already, because he believeth not." But neither of these two scriptures, nor any other in all the New Testament, saith, That he that is not baptized shall be damned, or is damned already; but if he believe not, he shall be damned, and is damned already, as aforesaid. Then he would have interrupted me, and would have laid to my charge that I was an Anabaptist. But I would give him no place to speak, but said—

Let me make an end, and then say what you can. You shall have as much to do, with God's help, in this matter, as ever you had to answer a thing in your life. You know, I am sure, it is no manners to pluck a tale out of a man's mouth, nor is it the order of reasoning, as you know that better than I can tell you. Then Dr. Langdale bade me say on.

Wood. My saying was, that those that believe not, shall be damned, and are damned already. But I dare not say for all the goods under heaven, that all those that receive no material baptism by water shall be damned, as you have said: but I would you should not gather of these words, that I deny baptism, as you were about to accuse me of, before I had half told out my tale. I would not have you, nor any man so rash in judgment, to condemn the thing that they are not able to prove by the word, and to make it seem to the simple, that the outward washing of water were the cause of faith.

Lang. Why, is it not so? Will you deny it? How say you? I say, the child hath no faith before it is baptized; therefore, the baptizing bringeth faith. What say you to it? Make me a plain answer to this question.

Wood. Now I perceive you go about nothing else, but to take advantage of my words. But, by God's help, I will answer you so, that you shall well see your sayings untrue. And yet I will not speak mine own words, but the words of the Holy Ghost, out of the mouth of the prophets and apostles; and then ask them whether they will deny it.

You said, that faith cometh by baptism, had by the use of material water. I must be so bold to ask you where Jacob was baptized before he had faith. St. Paul saith in the 9th chapter to the Romans, "Before ever the children were born, before ever they had done either good or bad, that the purpose of God, which is by election, might stand, not by the reason of works, but by the grace of the Caller, the elder shall serve the younger. Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated." How think you, had this child faith before he were born, or no? Answer to this, if you can.

Lang. What, you speak of the old law. Jacob was not christened, but circumcised. I speak of baptism, and you are gone from baptizing to the time of circumcision; answer me to the baptizing. Remember, by your talk, you deny original sin and free-will, by the words that you brought in of St. Paul.

For if children can be saved without baptism, then it must needs follow, that children have no original sin, which is put away in baptizing. But I think you know not what original sin is, nor free-will neither.

Wood. Yes, I praise God, I think I can tell them all better than you can. First, I pray you what free-will hath man to do good of himself? Tell me this first, and then I will answer to all other questions that you have objected against me.

Lang. I say that all men have as much free-will now, as Adam had before his fall.

Wood. Pray, how prove you that?

Lang. Thus I prove it, that as sin entered into the world, and by the means of one that sinned all men became sinners, which was by Adam; so by the obedience of one man, righteousness came upon all men that had sinned, and set them as free as they were before their fall, which was by Jesus Christ, Rom. v.

Wood. O Lord, what an overthrow have you given yourself here in original sin, and cannot see it! For, in proving that we have free-will, you have quite denied original sin. For you have declared that we be set as free by the death of Christ, as Adam was before his fall; and I am sure that Adam had no original sin before his fall. If we be as free now as he was then, I marvel wherefore Paul complained thrice to God, to take away the sting of it, God making him answer, and saying, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

These

These words, with divers others, prove original sin in us; but not that it shall hurt God's elect people, but that his grace is sufficient for all his. But you say in one place, it is not without baptism; and in another place, you put it away quite by the death of Christ; and in very deed you have spoken truer in the matter than you are aware of. For all that believe in Christ are baptized in the blood of Christ that he shed on the cross, and in the water that he sweat for pain, and the putting away of our sins at his death. And yet I say with David, Ps. li. "In sin was I born, and in sin hath my mother conceived me:" but in no such sin that shall be imputed, because I am born of God by faith, as St. John saith, chap. iii. Therefore I am blessed, as saith the prophet, Ps. xxiii. "Because the Lord imputeth not my sin," and not because I have no sin; but because God hath not imputed my sins. Not of our own deserving, but of his free mercy he hath saved us. Where is now your boasted free will that you speak of? If we have free will, then our salvation cometh of our own selves, and not of God; which is great blasphemy against God and his word.

And St. James saith, chap. i. "Every good and perfect gift cometh from above, from the Father of light, with whom is no variableness, neither is he changed into darkness. Of his own will he begat us. For the wind bloweth where it listeth, and we hear the sound thereof;" as likewise saith St. John, chap. iii. "but we cannot tell from whence it cometh, neither whither it goeth: even so is it with every one that is born of God." For St. Paul saith, Phil. ii. "It is God that worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Seeing then that every good and perfect gift cometh from above, and alighteth upon whom it pleaseth God, and that he worketh in us both to will and to do, methinks all the rest of our own will is little worth, or nought at all, unless it be wickedness. So methinks here be places enough to prove that a man hath no free will to do good of himself, with an hundred places more that I could recite, if time did serve. And as for original sin, I think I have declared my mind therein, how it remaineth in man; which you cannot deny, unless you deny the word of God. Now, if you will suffer me, I will prove my saying of Jacob and Esau, that I brought in to prove that faith was before baptism, and you refused it, because (you said) Jacob was not baptized. If you will give me leave, you shall hear what I can say therein; for I suppose you think my talk long. This I said, because I perceived he was much offended at my sayings.

Lang. Say what you can; for what I have said to you is ineffectual. I was desired to send for you, to teach you, but you go about to reprove me. Say what you will, for me.

Wood. I take not upon me to teach you, but to answer such things as you shall lay to my charge: and I speak not mine own mind, but the mind of the Holy Ghost, written by the prophets and apostles. Will you give me leave to answer briefly in this matter, that you may report to others the opinions I hold? And he said he was contented. But I think it was for nothing but to have taken advantage of my words.

First, if you remember, you said, that if my child had died without baptism, if I had been the cause that it had not been baptized, the child should have been damned, and I too. How say you?

Lang. Yea, that you should.

Wood. That is most untrue. For the prophet saith, "The father shall not bear the child's offences, nor the child the father's: but the soul that sinneth shall die." What could the child have done withal, if it had died without baptism? What say you to this? And I am sure, that which I brought in, in the old law, to prove that faith is before baptism, is not disagreeable to the word. For circumcision is a figure of baptism. And that I may bring to prove baptism by, as well as Peter did: for he brought in Noah's flood, which was a long time before Jacob and Esau, to prove baptism, saying, "While the ark was preparing, wherein few (that is to say eight souls) were saved by water, like as baptism now also saveth us, not in putting away of the filth of the flesh, but there is a good conscience consenting to God."

No. 51.

Here Peter proveth, that water had not saved Noah and the other seven, no more than it saved all the rest; if it had not been for their faith, which faith now saveth us; not in putting away the filthy soil of the flesh, by the washing of the water, but by a good conscience consenting unto God.

But you said, If they be baptized with the water, if they die before they come to years of discretion, they are all saved; which St. Peter is clean against, unless you grant that children have faith before they are baptized.

Now I ask you what consent of conscience the children have, being infants. For you say, they believe not before they are baptized; therefore, they consent not to be baptized, because they believe not. And by this it followeth, that none shall be saved, if they be baptized. I would know how you can answer this.

Lang. You are the most perverse man I ever knew. You know not what you say. The children are baptized in their godfather's and godmother's faith, and that is the good conscience that St. Peter speaketh of: and the christening is the keeping of the law that St. Peter speaketh of, saying, Neither is circumcision any thing worth, nor uncircumcision any thing worth, but keeping of the law is all together. Like as the circumcision was the keeping of the old law, so is baptism the keeping of the new law.

Wood. Ah, I thought if you would talk with me, you would bring in the old law to maintain your sayings by, (for all that you refused it) when I brought it in. But yet it serveth not for your purpose, so much as you think; for here you have confessed, that neither circumcision availeth, nor uncircumcision; which you have coupled with baptism, proving that neither of them availeth, but keeping of the law is all together: which law is kept (you say) by the outward signs; which is not so: for Abraham believed God, and that was counted to him for righteousness, and this was before he was circumcised. So the children believe before they be either circumcised or baptized, according to my first saying of Jacob and Esau, "Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated." These words declare, that Jacob had faith in his mother's womb: and John Baptist was sanctified in his mother's womb, and therefore it was counted to them for righteousness: and I am sure, if they had died before they had either received circumcision or baptism as concerning the outward deed, they should have been saved. For God's gifts and callings are such, that he cannot repent of them. But, by your saying, he doth both repent and change. For you say, keeping of the outward law is all together; but a bad excuse is as good as none at all. And where you said, the children are baptized in their godfathers' and godmothers' faith, they being all unbelievers, in what faith is that child baptized then? In none at all, by your own saying. Which words made him stamp and stare.

Lang. What? then you would count that there were very few believers, if there be not one of three that believeth. You enter into judgment against the people. Possibly you think there be none that believe well, unless they be of your mind. Then indeed Christ's flock was a very little flock.

Wood. Indeed these are Christ's words in Luke xii. which we may see to be very true. Yea, you said, if there were not one amongst three, there were very few. But there is not one amongst three hundred, for any thing that I can see. For if there were, there would not be so many that would seek their neighbour's goods and lives as there be.

Lang. Is the flock of Christ such a little flock as you speak of? You may call it a great flock. How many be there of them, can you tell me?

Wood. A pretty question, I think, it is that you ask me: as though I did make myself equal with God. No, no, you shall catch no such advantage of my words, words, nor do I know how many there be. But I will tell you as near as I can.

Lang. Yea, I pray you tell me as much as you can, seeing you are so cunning.

Wood. You shall see my judgment in it by and by. First, the prophet saith, "Follow not a multitude to do evil, for they must go the wrong way." For the most go the wrong way. This is one point to know them.

Then Christ saith in Matt. vii. "Broad is the way, and wide is the gate that leadeth unto destruction, and many there be that go in thereat: and straight is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." And in Luke xii. it is written (which words were spoken of Christ), "Come, you little flock, it is my Father's will to give you a kingdom." The third point is this, in Mark iii. and Matt. ii. "You (saith Christ) shall know the tree by the fruits. A good tree bringeth forth good fruit, and a bad tree bringeth forth bad fruit:" so by the fruits I know them: for every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, must be hewn down, and cast into the fire (into hell I think Christ meant), and your fruits declare that you be one of them. Thus have I proved four ways, that the people who shall be saved make but a small company in comparison with the rest. But if that be not enough, for the proof thereof, I have twenty more ways to prove it by, and you were never the nearer your purpose.

Lang. What a naughty man are you! you would make the most patient man in the world angry with you. I think your talk is nothing but pride and vain-glory, with mockery, despising and judging of men. It is time such a fellow were apprehended indeed. Such a one is enough to trouble a whole country. I think he is blessed of God that took you; for you are not fit to be in a common-wealth.

With divers such like words that I cannot recite, they came out so thick, with such stamping, as though he had been out of his wits. I held my peace until he had made an end, and then I spake.

Wherein have I said amiss? or have I not answered you unto every question that you demanded of me? what fault can you find in one word that I have said? I dare say you can find none. I marvel why you take on thus against me, having no cause so to do.

Lang. No, no, you have not answered me to original sin, you deny original sin.

With these words Mr. James Gage came in; and I think he stood at the door a good while before he came in, and that Dr. Langdale saw him: for his face was toward the door, and my face was from it.

Gage. Ah, Woodman, I think Mr. Doctor and you cannot agree.

Wood. Yes, sir, I think we agree very well.

Lang. Without doubt, sir, he is the naughtiest man I ever talked with in all my life: for he will have his own way in all things.

Gage. Woodman, leave that pride. Do not trust too much to your own wit. Harken to this man, this is a learned man. He is known to be learned; or he would not be allowed to preach before the queen's majesty: and I dare say he will tell thee nothing, nor will thee to do any thing, but that he will do himself: and I dare say he will not go to the devil to bring you there. How say you, Mr. Doctor? You would think us mad, if we would hurt ourselves to hurt you. No, I promise you, my brother, neither I, nor any gentleman in the country, I think of my conscience, but would you should do as well as their own souls and bodies, as a great many of them have said to thy face, whilst thou wast at my brother's, and which you cannot deny.

Wood. I can say no otherwise but that I was gently treated at your brother's, both with meat and drink, and gentle words, both by you and him, and divers other gentlemen: and I am sure neither you nor they can say, that you found me unreasonable at any time. For I said I was contented to learn of them that were able to teach me, and so I am, God knoweth: and here, Mr. Doctor, I think, can say no otherwise; for I dare say he can find no fault in the talk that we have had.

Lang. No, marry, I can find nothing else in you. I promise you, Mr. Gage, if you had been here, you would have said so yourself. He took me up indeed, and said, he wondered how I durst preach. For he said, I understood not the scripture, but as far as natural reason comprehended: as though he understood all, and I nothing. With many other such like words he made a great complaint to him of me, and said to Mr. James Gage, he would make you believe I could find no fault in him. Yes, I understand, he denies original sin.

Gage. Doth he so? by St. Mary that is a great matter: Woodman, leave your pride. That pride will come to nought. Can you live without sin?

Wood. Sir, now I perceive he will soon belie me behind my back, when he will not stick to lie before my face.

He saith, I denied original sin; and it was he himself, as I will let you be judge in the matter. For, as he went about to prove that man had free will, he said, we were set as free by the death of Christ, as Adam was before his fall: which proves plainly, that we have no original sin: and I took him withal, and said, Had Adam original sin before his fall? and then he could not tell what to say, but cavilled with words, and said he meant not so: and therefore I marvel he is not ashamed to tell such lies to my face. These words made them both astonished.

Gage. Mr. Doctor, he said even now you could find no fault in all his talk. Ask him one question, and you will find fault enough. I pray you ask him, how he believeth in the sacrament of the altar. I think he will make but a bad account thereof.

Wood. Yes, I will make account good enough of that, by God's help.

Lang. Well, how say you to the sacrament of the altar?

Wood. I say, I know no such sacrament, unless Christ be the altar you mean.

Gage. Lo! I told you you should soon find fault in him, if you came to the point with him. You should have begun with that first, and not have talked with him about other things. What, know you not the sacrament of the altar?

Wood. No sure, I know no such, unless Christ be the altar that you mean; for Christ is the altar of all goodnes. And if you mean Christ to be the altar of the sacrament you speak of, you shall soon hear my mind and belief therein.

Lang. Well, we mean Christ to be the altar. Say your mind, and go briefly to work; for I think it almost dinner-time.

Gage. I pray you go roundly to work, that you may make an end before dinner.

Wood. Yes, you shall soon hear my mind therein, by God's help. I do believe, that whensoever I come to receive the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, being truly ministered according to his institution, I believing that Christ was born of the virgin Mary, and that he was crucified on the cross, and shed his blood for the remission of my sins, and so take and eat the sacrament of bread and wine in that remembrance, that then I do receive whole Christ, God and man, mystically by faith. This is my belief of the sacrament, which no man is able to disprove.

Gage. By St. Mary I can find no fault in this. How say you, Mr. Doctor?

Lang. Sir, you see not so much as I do. For he goeth craftily to work, I tell you as I have heard. For though he hath granted, that the faithful receiver receiveth the body of Christ, God and man, yet he hath not granted that it is the body of Christ before it be received, as you shall see by and by, I warrant you, by his own words. How say you? Is it the body of Christ as soon as the words be spoken by the priest, or not? for these words will try him more than all the rest.

Wood. Doth the word say that it is his body before it is received? If it do, I will say so too.

Gage.

Gage. Why then we shall agree well enough, if you will be tried by the word.

Wood. Yes indeed, that I will; God forbid else.

Gage. Why, the word saith it is his body before it is eaten.

Wood. Those words would I fain hear; but I am sure they be not in the Bible.

Lang. No? That you shall see presently (says he to Mr. Gage), and then turned to the 22d of Luke, and there he read, "When supper was done, Christ took bread, gave thanks, and brake it, and gave to his disciples, and said, Take, eat, this is my body:" Then they spake both at once, Here he saith it is his body.

Wood. Mr. Gage, I do not deny that he called it his body, but not before eating, as I said before; wherefore I pray you mark the words. Christ said, "Take, eat:" I pray you, sir, mark these words that he said, "Take and eat," and then he said, "it was his body." So you see, eating goeth before. For he said, "Eat, this is my body." So according to the very word, I do believe it is his body. Which words made them both astonished.

Lang. Why, then, by your saying, Judas eat not the body of Christ. How say you, did he not?

Wood. Nay, I ask you. Did he?

Lang. I ask you.

Wood. And I ask you.

Lang. And I ask you.

Wood. Marry, I ask you: and I bid you answer if you dare for your life; for whatsoever you answer, unless you say as I have said, you will damn your own soul. For, Mr. Gage, I protest before God, I would you should do as well as my own soul and body; and it grieveth me to see how you be deceived with them; they be deceivers all of them. He cannot answer to this, but either he must prove Judas to be saved, or else he must prove that it is no body before it be received in faith, as you shall well perceive, by God's help, if he dare answer the question.

Gage. Yes, I dare say he dareth. What, you need not to threaten him so.

Wood. Then let him answer if he can.

Then he said he knew what I would say to him; therefore he was much in doubt to answer the question.

Lang. Mr. Gage, I will tell you in your ear what are the words he will answer me with, before I speak to him.

Then he told Mr. Gage a tale in his ear, and said, I have told Mr. Gage what you will say.

Gage. Yea, and I will speak the truth for both parties.

Wood. Well, how say you? Did Judas eat the body of Christ, or not?

Lang. Yes, I say Judas did eat the body of Christ.

Wood. Then it must needs follow, that Judas hath everlasting life: for Christ saith in John vi. "Who so eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." If Judas did eat Christ's body, I am sure you cannot deny but that he did both eat his flesh, and drink his blood, and then is Judas saved by Christ's own words. Therefore now you are compelled to say that it was not Christ's body, or else that Judas is saved.

Gage. Surely these be the very words that Master Doctor told me in mine ear that you would say to him.

Wood. Well, let us see how well he can avoid this argument.

Lang. Judas is damned, and yet he eat the body of Christ; but he eat it unworthily: and therefore he is damned.

Wood. Where find you that Judas did eat the body of Christ unworthily?

Lang. They be St. Paul's Words, 1 Cor xi.

Wood. Master Gage, I desire you for God's sake wark well the words that I say. If St. Paul speak any such words there, or in any other place; if there be any such words written in all the whole Bible, that ever any man eat the body of Christ unworthily, then say I am the falsest man you ever heard speak. But indeed, these are the words of St. Paul, "Who so eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation, because he maketh no difference of the Lord's body;" that is, because he presumeth to eat the Lord's body without faith, making no difference between the sacrament and other bread and drink. And that is St. Paul's meaning, and not that any man doth or can eat the body of Christ unworthily. For whosoever eateth the body of Christ, hath everlasting life, as is aforesaid in John vi. with these words one came for them to dinner in all haste.

Gage. I am sorry, I would fain hear more of this talk, but we can have it another day well enough.

Lang. Nay, master Gage, I will never talk with him any more; for he is the most unreasonable man that ever I talked with in all my life.

Then Mr. Gage put off his cap, and desired him that he would not refuse to talk with me, and that it might not be grievous to him. For, he said, we will seek all the means possible to make him an honest man, and to keep him from burning, if we could: for if it had not been for me and my brother, he had been burnt before this.

Lang. Sir, for your sake, and for my master your brother's sake, and for his father's sake, and other of his friends sakes, that have spoken to me many times with weeping tears, I will do the best to him that I can; but for no love nor favour that I bear to him, I tell you truth.

Gage. Woodman, you hear what master Doctor saith: when will you come again?

Wood. Even when you will send for me. For I am a prisoner, and cannot come when I would. Or if I should desire to come, it will cost me money, and I have none to give: but if you send for me, it will cost me none.

Gage. Well, I will send for you on Friday or Saturday at farthest, for to-morrow I must ride out of town; and I would fain hear your talk.

Wood. Sir, I would be very glad you should hear our talk always, and I trust in God you shall hear me say nothing, but the word of God shall warrant.

So Mr. Gage took his leave, and went away to his lodging, which was right in my way to the prison; and when he came without my lord Montague's gates, there we met with one Hood, of Bursted, a smith.

Then said Mr. Gage, Woodman, I had forgot one thing, that Hood had brought me in remembrance of as soon as I saw him; for he heard when the tale was told me. Hood, did you not hear when Smith, of Framfield, told me that he saw Woodman abroad in the city at liberty?

Hood. Yea forsooth, that I did.

Gage. Yea surely, and I was very glad, for I had well hoped you had been conformable. But I heard otherwise afterwards again, that you had leave of the keeper to go abroad and speak openly in the streets as you went up and down.

Wood. Indeed so the marshal told me to-day. But indeed I was never abroad since I came to prison, but when I was sent for; and indeed the same time I was abroad with my keeper, coming from the bishop, and as I was coming, even not far from the Marshalsea, I saw goodman Smith stand in a wain unloading of cheese, and I asked him how he did, even as I went by, and never staid for the matter, and thereupon it did arise. So I departed from them, with my keeper, to the Marshalsea again, where now I am merry, I praise God, as a sheep appointed to be slain.

The Fourth Examination of RICHARD WOODMAN, before the Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Rochester, and a certain Doctor, with divers other Priests and Gentlemen, May 25, 1557.

Wood. I Was brought from the Marshalsea to the said bishops and priests, sitting in St. George's George's church, in Southwark, by one of the marshal's men, and one of the sheriff's men. When I came before them, and had done my duty to them as nigh as I could, then said the bishop of Winchester,

What is your name?

Wood. My name is Richard Woodman.

Winch. Ah, Woodman! you were taken and apprehended for heresy about three years ago, and were sent to the King's-Bench prison, and there remained a long time. Mine old lord of Chichester, being a learned famous man, well known in this realm, and almost through all Christendom, I think came to prison to you, and there, and at other places, called you before him divers times, persuading you many times (because he was your ordinary) to pluck you from your heresies that you held, but he could by no means reform you.

Then you were delivered to the commissioners, and they could do no good with you neither. Then they sent you unto my lord of London. He calling you before him divers times, means were used by your friends, that you might be released. My lord having a good hope in you, that you would become an honest man, because he had heard so of you in times past, yea and of yourself promising him that you would go home and recant the heresies which you held, delivered you; sending also a letter of your recantation to the commissary, that he should see it done. But as soon as you were out of his hands, you were as bad as ever, and would never fulfil your promise, but have hid yourself in the woods, bushes, dens, and caves, and thus have you continued ever since, till it was now of late. Then the sheriff of that county (being a worshipful man) hearing thereof, sent certain of his men, took you in a wood, and carried you to his house. I cannot tell his name. What is your sheriff's name?

Wood. His name is sir Edward Gage.

Bishop. Well, you were apprehended for heresy, and being at master Gage's three weeks or more, you were gently treated there; he and other gentlemen persuading you divers times, little prevailed.

Then you appealed to the bishop of Chichester that now is. The sheriff, like a worshipful man, sent you to him, and he hath reasoned with you, and others also, and can do no good with you, so we have sent for you.

Wood. Then I spake to him, for I thought he would be long before he made an end. I thought he was a year in telling those lies against me already. Yea, I kept silence from good words, but it was great pain and grief to me, as David said. At length the fire was so kindled in my heart, that I could not chuse but speak with my tongue; for I feared lest any of the company should have departed before I had answered to his lies, and so the gospel slandered by long silence. So I said, My lord, I pray you let me now answer for myself, for it is time.

Bishop. I permit you to answer to these things that I have said.

Wood. I thank God for that, and I think myself happy (as Paul said when he was brought before king Agrippa) that I may this day answer for myself. My lord, I promise you there is never a word of your saying true that you have alledged against me.

Bishop. I cannot tell, but thus it is reported of you. As for me, I never saw you before this day; but I am sure it is not all lies that I have said, as you report.

Wood. Yes, my lord, there is never a true word in all that you have said. And further, where you said you never saw me before this day, you have both heard me and seen me before this day, I dare say.

Bishop. I think I heard you indeed on Sunday, where you played the malapert fellow; but I cannot tell that I saw you. But I pray you, were you not taken in the woods by the sheriff's men?

Wood. No, I was taken near my own house, I being in my house when they came, wherefore that is not true.

Bishop. Were you not three weeks at the sheriff's?

Wood. Yes that I was, just a month, and was gently treated by him; I can say no otherwise; for I had meat and drink enough, and fair words.

Bishop. It is not all lies then, as it chance. For I spake but of three weeks, and you confess a month yourself.

Wood. Yet your tale is never the truer for that: for you said, I was there three weeks for heresy, which is not so: for I was not apprehended for heresy at the first, neither did my old lord of Chichester reason with me, to pull me from heresy, as you said; for I held none then, neither do I now, as God knoweth, neither was I sent to the commissioners, nor to the bishop of London for heresy, neither was I delivered to him for any such thing, nor promised him to recant, as you said I did. Wherefore I marvel that you are not ashamed to tell so many lies, being a bishop, that should be an example to others.

Bishop. Lo, what an arrogant heretic he is. He will deny God; for he that denieth his own hand, denieth God.

Wood. My lord, judge not lest you be judged yourself: for as you have judged me, you shall be judged, if you repent not; and if I have set my hand to any recantation, let it be seen to my shame before this audience; for I will never deny my own hand by God's help.

Bishop. It is not here now, but I think it may be had well enough; but if it cannot be found, by whom will you be tried?

Wood. By my lord of London; for he dealt like a good man with me in that matter for which I was sent to prison. For it was upon the breach of a statute, as master Sheriff here can tell. For he was sheriff then, as he is now, and can tell how I was tossed up and down from sessions to sessions; and because I would not consent that I had offended therein, they sent me to prison again.

Then my lord of Chichester being my ordinary, and I being his tenant, came to me, to persuade me to consent to them, and to find myself in fault, when I was in none: to which I would not agree; but I desired that he would see me released of my wrong: but he said he could not; but willed me or my friends to speak to the commissioners for me, because it was a temporal matter: and when I came before them, they sent me to my lord of London, who was certified by the hands of almost thirty men, both esquires, gentlemen, and yeomen, the chief in the county where I dwelt, that I had not offended in the matter I was sent to prison for: whereupon he delivered me, not requiring me to recant heresies, for I held none (as God knoweth), neither do I now: nor do I know for what I was sent to prison, no more than any man here; for I was taken away from my work.

Bishop. No? Why then did you appeal to my lord of Chichester, if it were not for heresy?

Wood. Because there was laid to my charge that I had baptized children, and married folks, which I never did, for I was no where minister. Wherefore I appealed to my ordinary, to clear myself thereof, which I have done. Wherefore if any man have any thing against me, let him speak: for I came not hither to accuse myself, neither will I.

Bishop. Master Sheriff, can you tell upon what breach of statute he was sent to prison first?

Sheriff. Yea, my lord, that I can.

Wood. My lord, if you will give me leave, I will shew you the whole matter.

Bishop. Nay, master Sheriff, I pray you tell the matter, seeing you know it.

Sheriff. My lord, it was for speaking to a curate in the pulpit, as I remember.

Bishop. Ah, like enough, he would not stick to reprove a curate. For did you not see how he fashioned himself to speak to me in the pulpit on Sunday? He played the impudent fellow with me; so it is no great wonder that he played that part with another.

Wood.

Wood. Why, you will not blame me for that, I am sure. For we spake for no other cause, but to purge ourselves of those heresies that you laid to our charge. For these were your words; Good people, these men that be brought before us, being here, deny Christ to be God, and the Holy Ghost to be God (pointing to us with your left hand) which might seem to the whole audience, that you meant us all. Wherefore to clear ourselves thereof we spake, and said we held no such thing. And you said you would cut out our tongues. But I am sure you have no such law.

Bishop. Yes that we have, if you blaspheme, and as it chanced, I found such amongst you.

Wood. Indeed after we spake, you declared who they were, but not before: for you spake generally. Wherefore we blasphemed not, but purged ourselves.

Bishop. But I pray you, how can you purge yourself for speaking to the curate, that it is not heresy?

Wood. Forsooth these be the words of the statute; Whosoever doth interrupt any preacher or preachers, lawfully authorized by the queen's majesty, or by any other lawful ordinary, that all such shall suffer three months imprisonment, and furthermore be brought to the quarter sessions, there (being sorry for the same) to be released upon his good behaviour one whole year. But I had not so offended, as it was well proved; for he that I spoke to was not lawfully authorized, nor had put away his wife. Wherefore it was not lawful for him to preach by your own law; and therefore I brake not the statute, though I spake to him.

Bishop. I am glad I perceive this man speaketh against priests' marriages; he is not contented with priests that have wives. He is an honest man than I took him for, master Sheriff, have him away. I am glad he loveth not priests' marriages.

Wood. Then I would have answered to his saying, but he would in no wise hear me, but bade the sheriff have me away. So the sheriff took me by the hand, and plucked me away, and would not let me speak, but going out of the chancel door, I said, I would shew him the whole matter, if he would have given me leave, but seeing he will not, if he will let me go so, they shall see whether I will not go home to my wife and children, and keep them, as my bounden duty is, by the help of God. So I was sent to the Marshalsea again, where I now am merry, I praise God therefore, as a sheep appointed to be slain.

Moreover, I was credibly informed by one of our brethren that heard our talk, that the bishop said when I was gone, that they would take me whilst I was somewhat good. Which words seemed to many of the people that were there, that I spake against priests' marriages, but I did not, but did only answer to such questions as he asked me, as you shall perceive well by the words, if you mark them, which words were these:

How can you purge yourself from heresy, for talking to the curate in the pulpit, and not offend the statute? said the bishop; meaning thereby, I think, to have advantage of my words; but it was not God's will that he should at that time. For I answered him by the words of the statute, which words be as hereafter followeth, (that is) Whosoever doth interrupt any preacher or preachers, lawfully authorized by the queen's majesty, or by any other lawful ordinary, that all such shall suffer three months imprisonment. But I prove that this man was not lawfully authorized to preach (by their own law) because he had not put away his wife. For their law is, that no priest may say mass, nor preach with the mass, but he must first be separated from his wife. That is, because honest marriages be good and commendable, and their's naught and abominable; therefore they cannot dwell together.

Now I give you all to understand, that I did not reprove this priest because he had a wife, but because he taught false doctrine, which grieved my soul, because he had been a fervent preacher against the mass, and all the idolatry thereof seven years before, and then came and held with it again; for which cause I reprov'd him in the pulpit; and the words that I spake to him are written in divers of my examinations at my first imprisonment. But in very deed, I knew not of the statute when I reprov'd him. But because I was sent to prison upon the breach of it, I bought a statute book, and when I had perused it, I perceived I had not offended by their own law; and therefore still when I was called to answer, I answered them with their own law. But yet they kept me in prison a year and almost three quarters before I was released. I was at mine answer for that eighteen times. If any think I do not allow bishops and priests' marriages, let them look in my first examination before the bishop of Chichester that now is, during this my imprisonment, and there they will find what I have said on the matter. The truth is, I looked to be condemned with my brother that same day: but we may all see that they can do nothing but as God will permit them to do. But when the time is fully come, I trust in God I shall run that joyful race that my brethren have done. Thus I commit you all into the hands of God, who is the preserver, defender, and keeper of all his elect for evermore, Amen.

The Fifth Examination of Mr. RICHARD WOODMAN, before the Bishop of Winchester, the Archdeacon of Canterbury, Dr. LANGDALE, a fat Priest, and others whose Names I know not, at St. Mary Overy's Church, in Southwark, June 15, 1557.

Winch. WOODMAN, you was before us the last day, and would not be known in any wise that you were sent to prison for heresy, and called for your accusers, and stood stoutly in defending of yourself, and on your departing I had thought you had spoke against priests' marriages, thinking by your words we should have found you an honest man, and conformable, when we had called you before us again. You told such a fair tale for yourself, as though you had been free from all that was laid to your charge: for you said it was all lies that I told against you; but since I have proved the contrary, as here is your own hand to shew. By which I have proved, that you reprov'd not the priest for lacking of authority, and because he had not put away his wife, but because you liked not his preaching. For indeed I took it, that you reprov'd him because he was not lawfully authorized, but I have proved the contrary since.

Wood. I told you not that I did either reprove him for lack of authority, or because I liked not his preaching, but I told you wherefore I was first sent to prison. For you said it was for heresy, and made a long tale against me. And indeed I told you that there was never a word of your sayings true, but were all lies, as they were indeed. For I never was sent to prison for heresy, neither held I any then, nor do now, I take heaven and earth to witness; but I told you I was sent to prison upon the breach of a statute, which was for speaking to a priest in the pulpit, and for that cause the justices of that country thought that I had offended the statute, and called me before them, and would have had me bound to my good behaviour, and because I refused it they sent me to prison. And these be the words of the statute, as I told you the last day: "If any man do interrupt any preacher or preachers, lawfully authorized by the queen's majesty, or by any other lawful ordinary, that then every party that so offendeth, shall suffer three months imprisonment, and furthermore be brought to the quarter-sessions, and there being sorry for the same, and also bound for his good behaviour one whole year, to be released, or else to return to prison again."

And when I was in prison I bought a statute book, which when I had perused over, I found by the words thereof that I had not offended, because he was not lawfully authorized, as the bishop of London was certified by the hands of almost thirty of the chief men in the country. For he had not put away his wife, and therefore the statute took not place on me, as I told you the other day. Wherefore my lord of London, seeing me have so much wrong, did like a good man to me in that matter, and released me. Now when I had told you this matter, you bade the sheriff take me away; you said you were glad I held against priests' marriages, because I answered to the question you asked me.

Fat Priest. My lord, do you not hear what he saith by my lord of London? He saith he is a good man in that he released him, but he meaneth that he is good in nothing else.

Wood. What? can you tell what I mean? let every man say as he findeth; he did justly to me in that matter. I say, if he be not good in any thing else, as you say, he shall answer for it, and not I; for I have nothing to do with other matters.

Bishop. Well, how say you? How liked you his preaching? I pray you tell us.

Wood. That is no matter how I liked it. Howsoever I liked it, I offended not the statute. Wherefore you have nothing to say to me for that, I am sure.

Bishop. Well, how like you this then? Here is your own hand-writing. I am sure you will not deny it. Will you look on it?

Wood. It is mine own handy-work indeed, which by God's help I will never deny, nor ever yet did.

Bishop. And here is good gear, I tell you. I pray you hearken well to it: these be the words before the commissioners. How say you? Do not you believe as soon as the words are spoken by the priest, that there remaineth neither bread nor wine, but only the very body of Christ, both flesh and blood, as he was born of the virgin Mary? These were the words of the commissioners.

And then thou saidst, thou durst not say otherwise than the scripture saith. I cannot find (say you) that it is the body of Christ before it is received by faith, bringing in the 22d of Luke, saying, Christ said, "Take, eat, this is my body." So I cannot prove it is his body before it be eaten. Then said the commissioners, Did not Judas eat Christ's body? And if you can prove that Judas is saved (said you), I must grant that he eat his body. For Christ saith in the 6th of John, "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day;" which words prove, said you, that if Judas eat the body of Christ, he must needs be saved. How say you now? Did Judas eat the body of Christ, or not?

Wood. Then I perceived he went about nothing but to catch words of me in his diocese, to condemn me with. Though I should confound him ever so much, I perceived that he was fully bent thereto. To whom I answered and said:

I will answer you to no such thing, for I am none of your diocese; wherefore I will not answer to you.

Bishop. Thou art within my diocese, and thou hast offended within my diocese; and therefore I will have to do with thee.

Wood. Have to do with me if you will; but I will have nothing to do with you, I tell you plainly. For though I be now in your diocese, I have not offended in your diocese; if I have, shew me wherein.

Bishop. Why here is thy own hand-writing, which thou affirmedst in my diocese.

Wood. I do not deny but it is mine own hand-writing; but that does not prove that I have offended in your diocese; for that doth but declare what talk there was betwixt the commissioners and me, with which you have nothing to do.

Bishop. No, hold him a book, and thou shalt swear whether thou holdest now or not, and whether thou didst not write it in my diocese, as I think thou didst; lay thy hand on the book.

Wood. I will not be sworn for you; for I am not of your diocese; and therefore you have nothing to do with me; and as for the writing of the same, I never wrote a word of it in your diocese.

Lang. No, did you not? my lord, let me see; I will find where he wrote it.

Then he took it and looked on it, and presently he found that I was sent for out of the King's Bench to come before the commissioners.

Lang. My lord, here you may see it was in the King's Bench, which is in your diocese.

Wood. Although I was fetched out of the King's Bench, that does not prove I wrote it there; nor did I, I assure you.

The Fat Priest. Where did you write it then?

Wood. Nay, I owe you not so much service as to tell you; find it out as well as you can: for I perceive you go about to shed my blood.

Bishop. It is no matter where it was written, it is here, and he does not deny writing it. You shall hear more of it. Here the commissioners asked you, whether Judas did eat any more than bare bread.

Whereupon they sent you away back to the King's Bench again, and asked you nothing more, for which cause (as you have written here) you had a hell burning in your conscience. For you had thought they would have sent a discharge to the King's Bench, and so let me go (said you) and register my name in their books, that I had granted that Judas did eat the body of Christ, and so the gospel should have been slandered by me. For which cause I was in such case, I could scarcely eat, drink, or sleep for that space, as all my fellow-prisoners can testify. If all you, I say, that go to the church of Satan, and there hear the detestable doctrine that they spit and spew out in their churches and pulpits, to the great dishonour of God; if all you, I say, that come there, had such a hell burning in your conscience for the time, as I had till I came before them again, and had uttered my conscience more plainly, I dare say you would come there no more. All this is your writing; is it not? What say you?

Wood. I do not deny but it was mine own deed.

Bishop. And I pray you where is there such spitting and spewing out false doctrine as you speak of?

Wood. In the synagogue of Satan, where God is dishonoured with false doctrine.

Bishop. And I pray you, where is one of them?

Wood. Nay, that judge yourself; I came not hither to be a judge.

Bishop. Well, here you have affirmed, that Judas (your master) eat more than bread, but yet he eat not the body of Christ, as you have declared by your words. For you had a hell burning in your conscience, because you were in doubt, that the commissioners understood by your words, that Judas had eaten the body of Christ, because you said, he eat more than bare bread. Therefore thou hadst a great many devils in thee: for in hell be many devils; and therefore the devil and Judas is thy master, by thine own words.

Wood. Nay, I defy Judas, the devil, and his servants; for they be your masters, and you serve them, for any thing that I can see, I tell you truth.

Bishop. Nay, they be thy masters. For the devil is master where hell is, and thou saidst thou hadst a burning hell in thee. I pray you tell me how you can avoid it, but that the devil was in thee by thine own saying?

Wood. The hell that I had, was the loving correction of God towards me, to call me to repentance, that I should not offend God and his people in leaving things so dark, as I left that. For which cause my conscience bare me record, I had not done well, as at all times I have felt the sting of it, when I have broken the commandments of God by any means, as all God's people do, I dare say; and it is the loving kindness of God towards them, to drive them to repentance. But it is to be thought, that your conscience is never troubled, how wickedly soever you do. For if it were, it should not be so strange to you as you make it, which plainly proves whose servant you be.

Bishop. What a naughty fellow is this? This is such a perverse villain as I never talked with in all my life. Hold him a book, I will make him swear to answer directly to such things as I will demand of him; and if he will not answer, I will condemn him.

Wood. Call you me a fellow? I am such a fellow, I tell you, that will drive you all to hell, if you consent to the shedding of my blood, and you shall have blood to drink, as St. John saith in his Revelation, chap. ix. and being in hell, you shall be compelled to say for pain of conscience, This is the man that we have had in derision, derision, and thought his life madness, and his end to be without honour; but now we may see how he is counted among the faints of God, and we are punished. This shall you see in hell, if you repent it not, if you do condemn me. This you shall find in the fifth chapter of the Book of Wisdom; and therefore take heed what you do, I give you counsel.

Bishop. Wisdom! what speakest thou of wisdom? thou never hadst it; for thou art as great a fool as ever I heard speak.

Wood. Do you not know, that the foolish things of this world must confound the wise things? Wherefore it doth not grieve me that you call me a fool.

Bishop. Nay, thou art none of those fools; thou art an obstinate fool, and an heretic. Lay thy hand on the book, and answer to such things as I will lay against thee.

Wood. I will lay hold of the book for none of you all. You are not my bishop; and therefore I will have nothing to do with you.

Bishop. I will have to do with you. This man is without law, he careth not for the king nor queen, I dare say; for he will not obey their laws. Let me see the king's commission. I will see whether he will obey that, or not.

Wood. I would you loved the king and queen's majesty no worse than I do, if it pleased God: you would not do then as you do now.

Bishop. Hold him a book, he is a rank heretic. Thou shalt answer to such things as I will demand of thee.

Wood. I take heaven and earth to record I am no heretic, neither can I tell wherefore I am brought to prison, no more than any man here can tell, and therewith I looked round about on the people, and said to the bishop, If you have any just cause against me worthy of death, lay it against me, and let me have it; for I refuse not to die (I praise God) for the truth's sake, if I had ten lives. If you have no cause, let me go home, I pray you, to my wife and children to see them kept, and other poor people that I would set to work by the help of God. I have set to work an hundred persons before this, all the year together, and was unjustly taken from them; but God forgive them that did it, if it be his will.

Bishop. Do you not see how he looketh about for help? but I would not see any man shew thee a chearful countenance, and especially you that be of my diocese. If any of you bid God strengthen him, or take him by the hand, or embrace him, or shew him a chearful countenance, you shall be excommunicated, and shall not be received in again, till you have done open penance; and therefore beware of it.

Wood. I look for no help of men, for God is on my side, I praise him for it; and therefore I need not to care who be against me, neither do I care.

Then they cried, Away with him, and bring us another. So I was carried again to the Marshalsea, where I am now merry (I praise God therefore) as a sheep appointed to be slain. But for want of time, I have left out much of our talk; but this is the chiefest of it.

The Sixth and last Examination of RICHARD WOODMAN, written with his own Hand.

BE it known unto all men by this present writing, that I Richard Woodman, sometime of the parish of Warbleton, in the county of Suffex, was condemned for God's everlasting truth, July 16, 1557, by the bishop of Winchester, in the church of St. Mary Overy's, in Southwark, there sitting with him the same time the bishop of Chichester, the archdeacon of Canterbury, Dr. Langdale, Mr. Roper, with a fat-headed priest, I cannot tell his name. All these consented to the shedding of my blood, upon this occasion, as hereafter followeth.

I affirmed, that Judas received the sacrament with a sop and the devil withal; and because I would not be sworn upon a book, to answer directly to such articles as he would declare to me; and because I would not believe that there remained neither bread nor wine after the words of consecration, and that the body of Christ could not be received of any but of the faithful: for these articles I was condemned, as hereafter shall follow more at large, by the help of God.

First, the bishop said when I came before him:

Bishop. You were before us on Monday last, and there you affirmed certain heresies. How say you now? Do you hold them still, or will you revoke them?

Wood. I held no heresies then, neither do I now, as the Lord knoweth.

Bishop. No? Did you not affirm, that Judas received bread? Which is an heresy, unless you tell what more than bread.

Wood. Is it heresy, to say Judas received no more than bread? I said he received more than bare bread, for he received the same sacrament that was prepared to shew forth the Lord's death, and because he presumed to eat without faith, he eat the devil withal, as the words of Christ declare; after he eat the sop, the devil entered into him, as you cannot deny.

Bishop. Hold him a book. I would have you answer directly, whether Judas did eat the body of Christ or no.

Wood. I will answer no more, for I am not of your diocese; wherefore I will have nothing to do with you.

Bishop. No? You be in my diocese, and you are of my diocese, because you have offended in my diocese.

Wood. I am not of your diocese, although I am in your diocese; and I was brought into your diocese against my will: and I have not offended in your diocese; if I have, tell me wherein.

Bishop. Here is your own hand-writing, which is heresy. These be the words, "I cannot find (say you) that it is the body of Christ to any, before it is received in faith." How say you? Is not this your own hand-writing?

Wood. Yea, I do not deny, but it is my own hand-writing: but when, or where was it written, or where were the words spoken?

Bishop. Before the commissioners, and here is one of them; Master Roper, the words were spoken before you, were they not?

Roper. Yes indeed they were. Woodman, I am sure you will not deny them; for you have written the words even as you spake them.

Wood. No, sir, indeed I will not deny but that I spake them, and am glad that you have seen it. For you may see by that whether I lie, or not.

Roper. Indeed the words be written word for word as you spake them.

Bishop. Well, here you affirm, that it is your own deed. How say you now? Will you be sorry for it, and become an honest man?

Wood. My lord, I trust no man can say, but that I am an honest man; and as for that, I marvel that you will lay it to my charge, knowing that my lord of London discharged me of all matters that were laid against me, when I was released by him.

Bishop. You were released, and it might happen, it was not laid to your charge then; therefore we lay it to your charge now, because you are suspected to be an heretic: and we may call you before us, and examine you upon your faith upon suspicion.

Wood. Indeed St. Peter willeth me to render an account of my hope that I have in God, and I am contented so to do, if it please my bishop to hear me.

Chich. Yes, I pray you let us hear it.

Wood. I do believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in all things visible and invisible, and in one Lord Jesus Christ my Saviour, very God and very man. I believe in God the Holy Ghost, the Comforter of all God's elect people, and that he is equal with the Father and the Son. I believe the true catholic church, and all the sacraments that belong thereto. Thus have I rendered an account of my hope that I have of my salvation.

Bishop.

Bishop. And how believe you in the blessed sacrament of the altar? And with that they all put off their caps.

Wood. I pray you be contented, for I will not answer to any more questions; for I perceive you go about to shed my blood.

Bishop. No, hold him a book. If he refuse to swear, he is an Anabaptist, and shall be excommunicated.

Wood. I will not swear for you, excommunicate me if you will. For you be not meet to take an oath; for you laid heresies to my charge in yonder pulpit, which you are not able to prove; wherefore you are not meet to take an oath of any man. And as for me, I am not of your diocese, nor will have any thing to do with you.

Bishop. I will have to do with thee, and I say thou art a strong heretic.

Wood. Yea, all truth is heresy with you; but I am content to shew you my mind, how I believe on the sacrament of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, without flattering. For that you look for, I am sure. But I will meddle no further, but what I hold myself of it. I will not meddle with any other man's belief on it.

Harpsfield. Why? I am sure all men's faith ought to be alike.

Wood. Yea, I grant you so, that all true christians' faith ought to be alike. But I will answer for myself.

Harpsfield. Well, let us hear what you have to say to it.

Wood. I do believe, that when I come to receive the sacrament of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, if it be truly ministered according to Christ's institution, I coming in faith, as I trust in God I will, whensoever I come to receive it, I believing that Christ was born for me, and that he suffered death for the remission of my sins, and that I shall be saved by his death and blood-shedding, and so receive the sacrament of bread and wine in that remembrance, that then I do receive whole Christ, God and Man, mystically by faith, this is my belief on the sacrament.

Then they spake all at once, saying, Mystically by faith!

Fat Priest. What a fool art thou, Mystically by faith! thou canst not tell what mystical is.

Wood. If I be a fool, so take me: but God hath chosen such fools of this world to confound such wise things as you are.

Fat Priest. I pray thee, what is mystically?

Wood. I take mystically to be the faith that is in us, that the world seeth not, but God only.

Bishop. He cannot tell what he saith. Answer to the sacrament of the altar, whether it be the body of Christ before it be received, and whether it be not the body of Christ to whomsoever receiveth it? Tell me, or else I will excommunicate thee.

Wood. I have said as much as I will say; excommunicate me if you will. I am not of your diocese. The bishop of Chichester is mine ordinary. Let him do it if you will needs have my blood, that it may be required at his hands.

Chich. I am not consecrated yet; I told you so when you was with me.

Wood. No indeed, your kine bring forth nothing but cow-calves, as it now happeneth; meaning thereby he had not his bulls from Rome.

Then they were all in a great rage with me, and called me all to nought, and said I was out of my wits, because I spake fervently to every man's question; all which I cannot remember, but I said:

So Festus said to Paul, when he spake the words of soberness and truth out of the Spirit of God, as I do. But as you have judged me, you be yourselves. You will go to hell all the sort of you, if you condemn me, if you repent it not with speed.

Wood. Then my keeper, and the sheriff's deputy, Fuller, rebuked me, because I spake so sharply to them. And I said, I pray you let me alone; I must answer for my life.

Then there was much ado that I should keep silence, and so I held my peace. Then spake the bishop of Winchester, and the archdeacon of Canterbury, saying, We go not about to condemn thee, but go about to save thy soul, if thou wilt be ruled; and do as we would have thee.

Wood. To save my soul? nay, you cannot save my soul. My soul is saved already, I praise God. There can no man save my soul, but Jesus Christ; and he it is that hath saved my soul before the foundation of the world was laid.

Fat Priest. What an heresy is that, my lord! here is an heresy. He saith his soul was saved before the foundations of the world were laid. Thou canst not tell what thou sayest. Was thy soul saved before it was?

Wood. Yes, I praise God, I can tell what I say, and I say the truth. Look in the first of the Ephesians, and there you will find it, where Paul saith, chap. i. "Blessed be God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all manner of spiritual blessings in heavenly things, by Christ, according as he hath chosen us in himself, before the foundation of the world was laid, that we should be holy and without blame before him through love, and thereto were we predestinated." These are the words of Paul, and I believe they be most true. And therefore it is my faith, in and by Jesus Christ, that saveth, and not you or any man else.

Fat Priest. What! Faith without works! St. James saith, Faith without works is dead, and we have free will to do good works.

Wood. I would not have you think that I disallow good works. For a good faith cannot be without good works. Yet not of ourselves, but it is the gift of God, as saith St. Paul to the Philippians, chap. ii. "It is God that worketh in us both to will and to do, even of his good pleasure."

Bishop. Make an end; answer to me. Here is your ordinary, the archdeacon of Canterbury; he is made your ordinary by my lord cardinal, and he hath authority to examine you of your faith upon a book, to answer to such articles as he will lay to you: and I pray you refuse it not; for the danger is great if you do. Wherefore we desire you to shew yourself a subject in this matter.

Then they all spoke, and said, Lo, my lord desireth you gently to answer unto him, and so we do all. For if you refuse to take an oath, he may excommunicate you. For my lord cardinal may put whom he will in the bishop's office, until he is consecrated.

Wood. I know not so much. If you will give me time to learn the truth of it (if I can prove it to be as you say) I will tell you my mind in any thing that he shall demand of me, without any flattering.

Priest. My lord and we all, tell thee it is true; and therefore answer to him.

Wood. I will believe none of you all, for you are turn-coats and changelings, and be wavering minded, as St. James saith; you be neither hot nor cold, as St. John saith, therefore God will spew you out of his mouth. Wherefore I can believe none of you all, I tell you truth.

Bishop. What, be we turn-coats and changelings? what meanest thou by that?

Wood. I mean, that in king Edward's time you taught the doctrine that was set forth then, every one of you, and now you teach the contrary; and therefore I call you turn-coats and changelings, as I may well enough. Which words made the most part of them to quake.

Bishop. Nay, not all as it chanced.

Wood. No? I pray where were you then?

Bishop. I was in the Tower, as the lieutenant will bear me record.

Wood. If you were in the Tower, it was not therefore, I dare say, it was for some other matter.

Then they all took heart of grace, and said, My lord, he comes to examine you, we think: if he will not answer to the articles, you had best excommunicate him.

Bishop.

Bishop. He is the naughtiest varlet of an heretic that ever I knew. I will read the sentence against him.

Then they spake all at once, and I answered them as fast as I could. But I cannot remember all, the words came out so thick, I spared them not, I praise God therefore; for I spake freely.

Then they that stood by rebuked me, and said; You cannot tell to whom you speak.

Wood. No? think you so? they are but men. I am sure I have spoken to as good as they are, and better than they will ever be, for any thing that I can see, if they repent not with speed.

Bishop. Give ear! for I will read sentence against you.

Wood. Will you so? Wherefore will you? You have no just cause to excommunicate me; and therefore if you do condemn me, you will be condemned in hell, if you repent not: and I praise God, I am not afraid to die for God's sake, if I had an hundred lives.

Bishop. For God's sake? Nay, for the devil's sake. Thou sayest thou art not afraid to die; no more was Judas that hanged himself, as thou wilt kill thyself wilfully, because thou wilt not be ruled.

Wood. Nay, I defy the devil, Judas and all their members. And Judas' flesh was not afraid, but his spirit and conscience was afraid, and there despaired and hung himself. But I praise God, I feel no loathsomeness in my flesh to die, but a joyful conscience, and a willing mind thereto. Wherefore my flesh is subdued to it, I praise God; and therefore I am not afraid of death.

Chich. Woodman, for God's sake be ruled. You know what you said to me at my house. I could say more, if I would.

Wood. Say what you can; the most fault that you found in me was, because I praised the living God, and because I said, I praise God, and the Lord; which you ought to be ashamed of, if you have any grace; for I told you where the words were written.

Bishop. Well, how say you? will you confess that Judas received the body of Christ unworthily? Tell me plainly.

Wood. My lord, if you, or any of you all can prove before all this audience, in all the Bible, that any man ever eat the body of Christ unworthily, then I will be with you in all things that you will demand of me; of which matter I desire all this people to be witness.

Priest. Will you so? Then we shall agree well enough: St. Paul saith so.

Wood. I pray you where saith he so? Rehearse the words.

Priest. In 1 Cor. xi. St. Paul saith, "Who so eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation, because he makes no difference of the Lord's body."

Wood. Do these words prove that Judas eat the body of Christ unworthily? I pray you let me see them. They were contented. Then said I, these be the words even that you said: Good people hearken well to them, "Who so eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily:" he saith not, Who so eateth of this body unworthily, or drinketh of this blood unworthily: but he saith, "Who so eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, (which is the sacrament) eateth and drinketh his own damnation," because he maketh no difference between the sacrament which representeth the Lord's body, and other bread and drink. Here, good people, you may all see they are not able to prove their saying true. Therefore I cannot believe them in any thing they say.

Bishop. Thou art a rank heretic indeed. Art thou an expounder? Now I will read sentence against thee.

Wood. Judge not lest you be judged. For as you have judged me, such be you yourself. Then he read the sentence. Why, said I, will you read sentence against me, and cannot tell wherefore.

Bishop. Thou art an heretic, and therefore thou shalt be excommunicated.

Wood. I am no heretic, I take heaven and earth to witness, I defy all heretics, and if you condemn me, you will be damned, if you repent not. But God give you all grace to repent, if it be his will; and so he read forth the sentence in Latin, but what he said, God knoweth, and not I. God be judge between them and me. When he had done, I would have talked my mind to them, but they cried, Away with him. So I was carried to the Marshalsea again, where I am, and shall be as long as it shall please God; and I praise God most heartily, that ever he hath elected, and predestinated me to come to such high dignity, as to bear rebuke for his name's sake; his name be praised therefore, for ever and ever, Amen.

And thus you have the examinations of this blessed Woodman, or rather Goodman; wherein may appear as well the great grace and wisdom of God in that man, as also the gross ignorance and barbarous cruelty of his adversaries, especially of Dr. White, bishop of Winchester. Now followeth the effect of his letter.

A godly Letter of RICHARD WOODMAN, written to Mrs. ROBERTS, of Hawkhurst.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from his Son our only Saviour Jesus Christ, by the operation of the Holy Ghost, be multiplied plenteously upon you, dear sister Roberts, that you may the more joyfully bear the cross of Christ that you are under, unto the end, to your only comfort and consolation, and to all our brethren and sisters that are round about you, both now and ever, Amen.

In my most humble wise I commend me unto you, and to all our brethren and sisters in those parts, that love our Lord unfeignedly, certifying you, that I and all my brethren with me are merry and joyful, we praise God, looking daily to be dissolved from our mortal bodies, according to the will of our heavenly Father, praising God also for your constancy, and gentle benevolence, that you have shewed unto God's elect people. In this troublesome time of persecution, which may be a sure pledge and token of God's good will and favour towards you, and to all other that hear thereof. Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. Wherefore the fruits declare always what the tree is. For a good man or woman, out of the good treasure of their heart, bring forth good things.

Wherefore (dear sister) it is not as many affirm in these days, (the more to be lamented) that say, God asketh but a man's heart; which is the greatest injury that can be devised against God and his word. For St. James saith; shew me thy faith without deeds, and I will shew thee my faith by my deeds; saying, the devils believe and tremble for fear, and yet shall be but devils still, because their minds were never to do good. Let us not therefore be like them, but let our faith be made manifest to the whole world by our deeds, and in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, as St. Paul saith, let our light shine as in a dark place.

O dear hearts, now is the gospel of God overwhelmed with many black and troublesome clouds of persecution, for which cause very few go about to have their eyes made clear by the true light of the gospel, for fear of losing their treasures of this world, which are but vain, and shall perish.

Let us not be like unto them who light their candle, and put it under a bushel; but let us set our candle upon a candlestick, that it may give light unto all them that are in the house: that is to say, let all the people of the household of God see our good works, in suffering all things patiently that shall be laid upon us for the gospel's sake, if it be death itself. For Christ died for us, leaving us an example, that we should follow his steps; and as he hath given his life for us, so ought we to give our lives for the defence of the gospel, to the comfort of our brethren.

How is it then that some will say, that their faith is good, and yet they do all the deeds of antichrist the devil, and be not ashamed to alledge certain scriptures to maintain their wickedness? St. Paul saith, To believe with the heart justifieth, and to confess with the mouth maketh a man safe. Oh good God, here may all men see, that no man or woman can have a true faith, unless they have deeds also; and he that doubteth, is like the waves of the sea tossed about by the wind, and can look for no good at the Lord's hands. May not a man judge all such to be like those which St. John speaketh of, that be neither hot nor cold; and therefore God will (he saith) spue them out of his mouth? If we judge evil of such, have they not given us occasion? Had it not been better for them to have had a millstone tied about their necks, and to have been cast into the sea, than they should give such offences to God's elect people in condemning them as they do, in going to the synagogues of Satan; and there to receive the mark of the beast, in that they see and hear God blasphemed there, and hold their peace? Doth not that declare to the whole world, that they allow their doings to be good? And these do not only defile themselves, but also be an occasion to confirm the papists in their popery, and so be an occasion of our weak brother's falling, which will be all required at their hands, and will be too heavy a burthen for them to bear, if they repent it not with speed. For they that know their master's will, and do it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. Oh, do we not perceive that now is the acceptable time that Christ speaketh of? Yea even now is the axe put to the roots of the trees, so that every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit now, must be hewn down, and cast into the fire.

Now is the Lord come with his fan in his hand, to try the wheat from the chaff. The wheat will he gather into his barn, and the chaff he will burn as aforesaid. Now is the time come that we must go to meet the bridegroom with oil in our lamps. We are also bidden to the feast, let us make no excuses. Yea, our master hath delivered his talents unto us, God give us grace to occupy them well, that at his coming he may receive his own with advantage. Yea, now is the Lord come to see if there be any fruit upon his trees; so that if he come and find none, he will serve us as he did the wild fig-tree, that is, never fruit shall grow on us more; also, if we go to meet the bridegroom without oil in our lamps, and should go to buy, we should be served as were the foolish virgins; that was, God said to them, depart, I know you not. Or if we would make excuses to come to the feast, others shall be bidden in our room; if we occupy not our talents well, they shall be taken from us, and given to others, and all such unprofitable servants shall be cast into prison in hell, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

Oh good God! what a sort of fearful sayings is here contained? What christian heart will not hearken diligently hereto? Oh, may not all people well perceive that this is the time that Christ speaketh of, that there should be father against son, and son against father, and brother against brother; that the brother shall deliver the brother to death? yea, and the wicked shall say all manner of wicked sayings against us for his name's sake? Which I have found by experience, and I praise God, who hath given me strength to bear it. For I think there is no evil, but it hath been imagined against me, and that by my familiar friends, as David saith: but I praise God, they cannot prove any of their sayings true, but go about to find fault in them that God hath chosen, because they themselves will not take up their cross and follow Christ; and therefore they speak evil of the thing that they know not, who shall give account of it before him that is ready to judge both the quick and the dead.

But my trust is, that all the people of God will be ruled by the counsel of St. John, saying: My sheep will hear my voice, strangers they will not hear: meaning thereby, that ye should not believe them that go about to subvert the gospel. Wherefore mark well what they be, and try them well before you believe them, according to St. John's counsel in his epistle, saying: Believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they be of God, or not; meaning thereby, that they that be not of God, will speak good of none but of them that be as they be. Wherefore (dear sister) be of good cheer, and give no credit to such people, whatsoever you hear them say. For I have no mistrust by God's help, but that all the world shall see and know that my blood shall not be dear in mine own sight, whensoever it shall please God to give my adversaries leave to shed it. I do earnestly believe, that God which hath begun this good work in me, will perform it to the end, as he hath given me grace, and will always, to bear this easy yoke and light burden; which I have always found, I praise my Lord God.

For when I have been in prison, wearing sometimes bolts, sometimes shackles, sometimes lying on the bare ground, sometimes sitting in the stocks, sometimes bound with cords, that all my body hath been swoln, much like to be overcome with the pain that hath been in my flesh, sometimes fain to lie abroad in the woods and fields, wandering to and fro, few I say, that durst keep my company for fear of the rulers, sometimes brought before the justices, sheriffs, lords, doctors, and bishops, sometimes called dog, sometimes devil, heretic, whoremonger, traitor, thief, deceiver, with divers others such like; yea, and even they that did eat of my bread, that should have been most my friends by nature, have betrayed me: yet for all this I praise my Lord God that hath separated me from my mother's womb, all this that happened unto me hath been easy, light, and most delectable and joyful of any treasure that ever I possessed; for I praise God they are not able to prove one jot or tittle of their sayings true. But that way that they call heresy, I serve my Lord God, and at all times before whomsoever I have been brought, God hath given me mouth and wisdom, which all my adversaries have not been able to resist, I praise God therefore.

Wherefore (dear sister) be of good comfort with all your brethren and sisters, and take no thought what you shall say, for it shall be given you the same hour, according to the promises, as I have always found, and as you and all other of God's elect shall well find, when the time is full come. And whereas I and many others have hoped, that this persecution would have been at an end before this time, now I perceive God will have a further trial to root out all dissemblers, that no man should rejoice in himself, but he that rejoiceth shall rejoice in God.

Wherefore if prophecy should fail, and tongues should cease, yet love must endure. For fear hath painfulness, but perfect love casteth out all fear: which love I have no mistrust but God hath poured it upon you so abundantly, that nothing in the world shall be able to separate you from God. Neither high nor low, rich nor poor, life nor death, shall be able to put you from Christ; but by him I trust you shall enter into the new Jerusalem, there to live for ever, beholding the glory of God with the same eyes that you now have, and all other faithful people that continue to the end. Give all honour and glory to God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, three persons and one God, to be honoured now and ever, Amen.

RICHARD WOODMAN.

After these examinations thus had and commenced between Richard Woodman and the bishops, he was (as is aforesaid) judged by sentence of condemnation, and so deprived of his life; with whom also were burned nine others, to wit, five men and four women, which were taken about two or three days before their judgment. The names of which being also before expressed, here again follow in this order, Richard Woodman, George Stevens, William Maynard, Alexander Hofman, his servant, Thomasine Wood, his maid, Margery Moris, James Moris, her son, Denis Burgis, Ashdowne's wife, Grove's wife.

These persons above-named were put to death at Lewes the 22d of June.

Of which number the eight last were apprehended (as is said) either the same day, or the second or third day before, and so with the same Woodman and Stevens, were committed together to the fire; in which space no writ could come down from London to the justices, for their burning. Wherefore what is to be said to such justices, or what reckoning they will make to God and to the laws of this realm, I refer that to them that have to do in the matter. The like whereof is to be found also of other justices, who without any lawful writ of discharge or order of law, have unlawfully and disorderly burnt the servants of Christ (whose blood the law both may and also ought to revenge); especially at Salisbury, Canterbury, and Guernsey. But concerning these matters, though man's law do wink, or rather sleep at them, yet they shall be sure God's law will find such murderers out at length. I pray God the doers may repent betime.

One Ambrose died in Maidstone prison, about the same time.

An Account of the Condemnation of Mr. RICHARD LUSH.

IN the registers of Gilbert, bishop of Bath and Wells, I find a certificate made to king Philip and queen Mary, of one Richard Lush, there condemned and given to the secular power to be burned for the cause of heresy, whose affirmations in the said certificate are expressed in tenor and effect, as follows.

1. For denying the verity of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament of the altar.
2. Item, For denying auricular confession to be made to the priest.
3. Item, For affirming only to be three sacraments: to wit, of baptism, of the supper, and of matrimony.
4. Item, For refusing to call the Lord's supper by the name of the sacrament of the altar.
5. Item, For denying purgatory, and that prayers and alms profit not the dead body.
6. Item, That images are not to be suffered in the church, and that all that kneel to images of the church, be idolaters.
7. Item, That they which were burnt of late for religion, died God's servants and good martyrs.
8. Item, For condemning the single life of priests, and other votaries.
9. Item, For denying the universal and catholic church, meaning the church of Rome.

For these assertions as they are expressed, he was condemned and committed to the sheriffs, and also a certificate directed by the bishop aforesaid, to the king and queen.

A Note concerning JOHN HULLIER, Minister and Martyr, who was burned at Cambridge.

CONCERNING the story of John Hullier, martyr, partly mentioned before, for the more full declaration of the death and martyrdom of that good man, because the story is before but rawly and imperfectly touched; for the more perfecting thereof I thought thereunto to add that which since hath come to my hand, as followeth.

First, John Hullier was brought up at Eaton college, and after, according to the foundation of that house, he was elected scholar in king's college, where also not tarrying full three years of probation, before he was fellow of the college, he after some time was one of the ten conduits in the king's college, which was Anno 1539. Then, in process of time, he came to be curate of Babram, three miles from Cambridge, and went afterwards to Lynn; where he, having divers conflicts with the papists, was from thence carried to Ely, to

Dr. Thurlby, then bishop there; who after divers examinations, sent him to Cambridge Castle, where he remained but a while.

From thence he was conveyed to the town prison, commonly called the Tolbooth, lying there almost a quarter of a year, till at length he was cited to appear at great St. Mary's on Palm-Sunday eve, before divers doctors, both divines and lawyers, amongst whom was chief Dr. Shaxton, Dr. Young, Dr. Sedgewike, Dr. Scot, and others. Where after examination, because he would not recant, he was first condemned, the sentence being read by Dr. Fuller.

Then consequently he was degraded after their popish manner, with scraping crown and hands. When they had degraded him, he said cheerfully, This is the joyfulest day that ever I saw, and I thank you all, that ye have delivered and lightened me of all this paltry.

In the mean time whilst it was doing, one standing by, asked Hullier what book he had in his hand. Who answered, a Testament. Whereat this man in a rage took it and threw it violently from him. Then was he given over to the secular powers; Brassey being mayor, who carrying him to prison again, took from him all his books, writings, and papers.

On Maundy Thursday coming to the stake, he exhorted the people to pray for him, and after holding his peace, and praying to himself, one spake to him, saying, The Lord strengthen thee. Whereat a serjeant, named Briesly, stayed and bade him hold his tongue, or else he should repent it.

Nevertheless Hullier answered and said, Friend, I trust that as God hath hitherto begun, so also he will strengthen me, and finish his work upon me. I am bidden to a Maundy, whither I trust to go, and there to be shortly. God hath laid the foundation, as I by his aid will end it.

Then going to a stool (prepared for him to sit on) to have his hose plucked off, he desired the people to pray for him again, and also to bear witness that he died in the right faith, and that he would seal it with his blood, certifying them, that he died in a just cause, and for the testimony of the verity and truth, and that Christ was the only rock to build upon, under whose banner he fought, and whose soldier he was; and while speaking, he turned himself toward the east, and exhorted the people there likewise.

George Boyes, Henry Barley, and one Gray, all arch-priests of Trinity college, Cambridge, stood on a bank hard by. This Boyes was one of the proctors of the university that year. To whom Mr. Gray spake, saying, Hear you not, master proctor, what blasphemy this fellow uttereth? Surely it is ill done to suffer him.

At whose words, this Boyes spake with a loud voice, Mr. Mayor, what mean you? If you suffer him thus to take liberty, I tell you, the council shall hear of it, and we take you not to be the queen's friend. He is a pernicious person, and may do more harm than you are aware of. Whereat simple Hullier, as meek as a lamb, taking the matter very patiently, made no answer, but made himself ready, uttering his prayer. Which done, he went meekly himself to the stake, and with chains being bound, was beset with reed and wood, standing in a pitch barrel, and the fire being set to, not marking the wind, it blew the flame to his back. Then he feeling it, began earnestly to call upon God. Nevertheless his friends perceiving the fire to be ill kindled, caused the serjeants to turn it, and fire it in that place where the wind might blow it in his face.

That done, there was a parcel of books which were cast into the fire, and by chance a communion book fell between his hands, who receiving it joyfully, opened it, and read as long as the flame and smoak would permit him: and then he fell again to prayer, holding his hands up to heaven, and the book betwixt his arms next his heart, thanking God for sending it: and at that time the day being very fair and hot, yet the wind was somewhat up, and it caused the fire to be fiercer, and when all the people thought he

he had been dead, he suddenly uttered these words; Lord Jesus, receive my spirit, dying very meekly.

The place where he was burned, is called Jesus Green, not far from Jesus College. Seagar gave him certain gunpowder, but little to the purpose; for he was dead before it took fire. All the people prayed for him, and many a tear was shed for him. Which the papists seeing, cried, he was not to be prayed for, and being but a damned man, it could profit him nothing: nevertheless they continued praying; whereat the papists fell into such a rage that they menaced them with terrible threatnings. His flesh being consumed, his bones stood upright even as if they had been alive. Of the people, some took what they could get of him, as pieces of bones. One had his heart, which was distributed so far as it would go: one took the scalp, and looked for the tongue, but it was consumed, except the very root.

An Account of the Martyrdom of SIMON MILLER and ELIZABETH COOPER, who were burnt at NORWICH.

IN the month of July next followed the martyrdom of Simon Miller and Elizabeth Cooper. This Simon dwelling in the town of Lynn, a pious and zealous man in the knowledge of God and his truth, detesting and abhorring the contrary enforced religion then set forth, came from Lynn to Norwich, where he standing in the press and hearing of the people, began to ask them, as they came out of the church from their popish service, where he might go to have the communion. And the people marvelled at his boldness: one that was an evil disposed papist, hearing the same, said, that if he would needs go to a communion, he would bring him where he should be sped of his purpose. So he was brought to the chancellor of Norwich, (whose name was Dunning) who after a few words, and small talk passed with his examine, committed him to ward.

In the mean time as he was in examination, he had in his shoe his confession, written in a paper, whereof a piece appearing above his shoe, was spied and taken out. The chancellor asking if he would stand to the confession of the same faith therein contained, he constantly affirmed the same. Whereupon, as is said, he was committed. Thus the said Simon being in the bishop's house, under custody of the keeper there called master Felow, how it happened is not certain, whether by gentleness of the keeper, (who was somewhat gentle that way) or by leave given of the bishop, or else whether he had condescended on purpose to their articles, he was dismissed, and went home to his house at Lynn, where he continued a certain space, till he had disposed and set all things in order.

That done, he returned again to the bishop's house to his prison and keeper, till the time at length, he constantly abiding in his professed purpose, and defence of God's truth, was by the said bishop and his chancellor, condemned and committed to the fire about the 13th day of July.

With this Simon Miller also was burnt one Elizabeth Cooper (as aforesaid) a pewterer's wife, dwelling in St. Andrew's parish, in Norwich, where she had before recanted; and being unquiet for the same, and greatly troubled inwardly, she came into the said St. Andrew's church, the people being at their popish service, and there standing in the same, said she revoked her recantation before made in that place, and was heartily sorry that ever she did it, willing the people not to be deceived, neither to take her doings before for an example, &c. These or such like words she spake in the church.

Then cried one Bacon of the said parish, laying his arms abroad, saying, Mr. Sheriff, will you suffer this? and repeating the same, urged him to go from the church to her house, at whose knocking she came down, and was taken and sent to prison.

The sheriff (named Mr. Thomas Sutton) and she had before been servants together in one house; and for the friendship he bare unto her, and more for the gospel's sake, he was very loth to do it, but he was enforced by those other persons before mentioned, much against his own conscience, which he now earnestly repenteth.

This good woman being condemned with Simon Miller, to be burnt at the stake, when the fire came to her, she shrunk a little thereat, crying ah! When Simon Miller heard the same, he put his hand behind him towards her, and desired her to be strong and of good cheer; for, good sister, (said he) we shall have a joyful and sweet supper. At which she being, as it seemed, thereby strengthened, stood as still and quiet as one most glad to finish that good work, which she before had so happily begun. And thus she and her companion joyfully ended their lives, committing their souls into the hands of Almighty God.

An Account of the Martyrdom of Five Men and Five Women, at Colchester, Five in the Forenoon, and Five in the Afternoon.

AS it is no new thing in those we call prelates and priests of the church, to be raisers up of persecution against Christ and his poor flock; so it is much to be marvelled, or rather lamented, that noble persons, and men of honour and worship, should be made such ministers, to serve the desires of these tyrants, as is now common, as well in the sorrowful reign of the late queen Mary, as likewise in this present story is to be remarked.

And first thou rememberest, gentle reader, how mention was made a little before of twenty-two, which were sent up prisoners together from Colchester to London, by the earl of Oxford, the lord Darcy, Mr. Tyrrel, of St. Osithes, and other commissioners and justices, &c. which twenty-two, as aforesaid, through a gentle submission put to them, were afterwards released and set at liberty.

In the number of these aforesaid twenty-two, was one William Munt, of Muchbentley in Essex, husbandman, with Alice his wife, and Rose Allin, maid, daughter to the said Alice Munt; who coming home again to their house at Muchbentley aforesaid, refrained themselves from the unfavoury service of the popish church, and frequented the company of good men and women, who gave themselves diligently to reading and calling upon the name of God, through Christ: whereby they so fretted the wicked priest of the town, called sir Thomas Tye, and others like unto him, that laying their heads together, they made a supplication to the lord Darcy, in the name of the whole parish: the substance whereof is as followeth.

A Supplication to the LORD DARCY, and by him delivered to SIR JOHN KINGSTON, Priest and Commissary.

PLEASETH your honourable lordship to be advertised, that we confess whilst your good lordship lay here in the country, the people were stayed in good order, to our great comfort: but since your lordship's departure, they have made digression from good order in some places, and namely in the parish of Muchbentley, by reason of three seditious persons, William Munt and his wife, and Rose her daughter, who by their feigned submission (as doth appear) were dismissed and sent down from the bishop of London; and since their coming home they have not only in their own persons made manifest their disobedience, in not coming to the church, nor yet observing other good orders, but also most maliciously and seditiously have seduced many from coming to the church, and from obeying all other good orders; mocking also those that frequent the church, and calling them church-owls, and blasphemously calling the blessed sacrament of the altar a blind god, with divers such like blasphemies. In consideration whereof, may it please your honour,

(for

(for the love of God, and for the tender zeal your good lordship beareth to justice, and the common peace and quietness of the king and queen's majesty's loving subjects) to award out your warrant for the said William Munt, his wife, and Rose her daughter, that they being attached and brought before your good lordship, we trust the rest will fear to offend (their ringleaders of sedition being apprehended) the quietness of their obedient subjects,

Your daily orators, the parishioners of Muchbentley, Thomas Tye, priest; John Carter, Thomas Chandler, John Barker, Richard Mere, J. Painter, Will. Harris, John Richard, and others.

This being done, the said sir Thomas Tye bethought with himself where the persecuted did resort: for in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, for a twelvemonth and more, he came not to the church, but frequented the company of godly men and women, who abstained from the same, and, as they thought, he laboured to keep a good conscience, but the sequel shewed him to be a false brother.

Now (as I said) he partly knowing the places of refuge for honest men, did further inquire of other men about the same: and being thereof sufficiently (as he thought) instructed to his purpose, immediately about the time the supplication above specified was exhibited to the said lord Darcy, wrote a letter secretly to bishop Bonner, wherein he maketh his account how he had bestowed his time, and complained of divers honest men, among which was the said William Munt and his company: the tenor of which letter here followeth.

A Letter from Sir THOMAS TYE, Priest, to Bishop BONNER.

RIGHT honourable lord, after my bounden duty done in most humble wise, these shall be to signify unto your lordship the state of our parts concerning religion. And first, since the coming down of the twenty-two rank heretics dismissed from you, the detestable sort of schismatics were never so bold since the king and queen's majesty's reign, as they are now at this present. In Muchbentley, where your lordship is patron of the church, since William Munt, and Alice his wife, with Rose Allin her daughter, came home, they do not only absent themselves from the church and service of God, but do daily allure many others away from the same, which before did outwardly shew signs and tokens of obedience.

They assemble together upon the sabbath-day in the time of divine service, sometimes in one house, sometimes in another, and there keep their private conventicles and schools of heresy. The jurates say, the lords' commission is out, and they are discharged of their oath. The quest-men in your archdeacon's visitation alledged, that forasmuch as they were once presented and now sent home, they have no more to do with them nor any other. Your officers say, namely, Mr. Boswel, that the council sent them not home without a great consideration. I pray God some of your officers prove not favourers of heretics. The rebels are stout in the town of Colchester.

The ministers of the church are hem'd at in the open streets, and called knaves. The blessed sacrament of the altar is blasphemed and railed upon in every house and tavern. Prayer and fasting is not regarded. Seditious talks and news are rife both in town and country, in as ample and large a manner, as though no honourable lords and commissioners had been sent for reformation thereof. The occasion riseth partly by reason of John Love of Colchester Heath (a perverse place), which John Love was twice indicted of heresy, and thereupon fled with his wife and household, and his goods seized within the town of Colchester, to the king and queen's majesty's use. Nevertheless the said John is come home again, and nothing said or done to him. Whereupon the heretics are wonderfully encouraged, to the great discomfort of good and catholic people, which daily pray to God for the profit, unity, and restoration of his church again; which thing shall come the sooner to pass, through the travail and pains of such honourable lords and reverend fathers as your lordship is, unto whom I wish long life and continuance, with increase of much honour. From Colchester, December 18.

No. 52.

Your humble beadsman,

THOMAS TYE, Priest.

When this wicked priest had thus wrought his malice against the people of God, within a while after the storms began to arise against those poor persecuted William Munt and his company, whereby they were enforced to hide themselves from the heat thereof. And continuing so a little space, at last, the seventh day of March, 1557, being the first Sunday in Lent, and by two of the clock in the morning, one Mr. Edmund Tyrrel (who came of the house of the Tyrrels which murdered king Edward V. and his brother) took with him the bailiff of the hundred, called William Samuel, dwelling in Colchester, and the two constables of Muchbentley aforesaid, named John Baker and William Harris, with many others; and besetting the house of the said William Munt round about, called to them at length to open the door; which being done, Mr. Tyrrel, with some of the company, went into the chamber where the said father Munt and his wife lay, willing them to rise: for, said he, you must go with us to Colchester-castle. Mother Munt hearing that, being very sick, desired that her daughter might fetch her some drink; for she was (she said) very ill.

Then he gave her leave and bade her go. So her daughter, the forenamed Rose Allin, maid, took a stone pot in one hand, and a candle in the other, and went to draw drink for her mother; and as she came back again through the house, Tyrrel met her, and willed her to give her father and mother good counsel, and advertise them to be good catholic people.

Rose. Sir, they have a better instructor than me. For the Holy Ghost doth teach them, I hope, which I trust will not suffer them to err.

Tyrr. Why, said Mr. Tyrrel, art thou still in that mind, thou naughty housewife? marry, it is time to look upon such heretics indeed.

Rose. Sir, with what you call heresy, do I worship my Lord God, I tell you truth.

Tyrr. Then I perceive you will burn, gossip, with the rest, for company's sake.

Rose. No, sir, not for company's sake, but for Christ's sake; if so I be compelled, and I hope in his mercy, if he call me to it, he will enable me to bear it.

Tyrr. So he turning to his company, said, Sirs, this gossip will burn: what do you think of her? Why truly, sir, faith one, prove her, and you shall see what she will do by and by.

Then that cruel Tyrrel, taking the candle from her, held her wrist, and the burning candle under her hand, burning cross-ways over the back thereof, so long that the very sinews cracked asunder. Witness hereof, William Chandler, then living at Muchbentley, who was there present and saw it. Also Mrs. Bright of Rumford, with Ann Starkey, her maid, to whom Rose Allin also declared the same, and the said Mrs. Bright also ministered salve for the curing thereof, as she lay in her house at Rumford, going up towards London with other prisoners.

In which time of his tyranny, he said often to her, Why, whore, wilt thou not cry? Thou young whore, wilt thou not cry? To which she always answered, that she thanked God she had no cause, but rather to rejoice. But, she said, he had more cause to weep than she, if he considered the matter well. In the end, when the sinews (as I said) brake, that all the house heard them, he then thrust her violently from him, saying, A strong whore, thou shameless beast; thou beastly whore, &c. with such like vile words. But she quietly suffering his rage for the time, at last said, Sir, have you done what you will do? He said, yea, and if thou think not well of it, then mend it.

Rose. Mend it? nay, the Lord mend you, and give you repentance, if it be his will. And now, if you think it good, begin at the feet, and burn the head also: for he that set you on work, shall pay you your wages one day, day, I warrant you: and so went and carried her mother drunk as she was commanded. Likewife, after searching of the house for more company, at last they found one John Thurston and Margaret his wife, whom they also carried to Colchester castle immediately.

And this said Rose Allin, being prisoner, told a friend of her's this cruel act of the said Tyrrel; and shewing him the manner thereof, she said, while my own hand was a burning, I having a pot in my other hand, might have struck him on the face with it, if I had had a mind, for no man held my hand to hinder me therefrom. But I thank God, said she, with all my heart, I did it not.

Also being asked of another, how she could abide the painful burning of her hand, she said, at first it was some grief to her: but afterwards, the longer she burned, the less she felt, or well near none at all.

And because Mr. Tyrrel shall not go alone in this kind of cruelty, you shall hear another like example of a blind harper's hand, burnt by bishop Bonner, as is testified by the relation of Valentine Dingley, sometime gentleman to the said bishop, who declared before credible witnesses, as followeth: How the said bishop Bonner, having this blind harper before him, spake thus unto him, That such blind objects, which follow a sort of heretical preachers, when they come to the feeling of the fire, will be the first that will fly from it.

To whom the blind man answered, that if every joint of him were to be burnt, yet he trusted in the Lord, he should not fly. Then Bonner signifying privily to certain of his men about him what they should do, they brought to him a burning coal; which coal being put into the poor man's hand, they closed it fast again, which burned his hand most piteously. Among the doers thereof was the said Mr. Valentine Dingley, witness and reporter hereof, as is declared.

We read in Titus Livius, of the story of king Porfenna, who after the burning of the right hand of Marcus Scevola, who came purposely to kill him, being only contented therewith, sent him home to Rome again. But thus to burn the hands of poor men and women, who never meant any harm to them, and not contented with that, but also to consume their whole bodies without any just cause, we find no example of such barbarous tyranny, neither in Titus Livius, nor in any other story among the heathen.

But to return to our Colchester martyrs again. With the said William Munt and his family, was joined also in the same prison at Colchester, another faithful brother, named John Johnson, alias Alier, of Thorp, in the county of Essex, labourer, thirty-four years of age, having no wife alive, but three young children, who was also indicted with them of heresy, and so all these four lay together in Colchester castle.

The other six prisoners lay in Mote-hall in the said town of Colchester, whose names were,

1. William Bongeor, of the parish of St. Nicholas, in Colchester, glazier, of the age of sixty years.
2. Thomas Benold, of Colchester, tallow-chandler.
3. W. Purcas, of Bocking, in Essex, fuller, of the age of twenty years.

4. Agnes Silver-side, alias Smith, dwelling in Colchester, widow, of the age of forty years.

5. Helen Ewring, the wife of John Ewring, miller, dwelling in Colchester, of the age of forty-five years, or thereabouts, who was one of the twenty-two prisoners mentioned before, sent up in bands from Colchester to London, and after being delivered with the rest, repaired home to Colchester again to her husband, where notwithstanding she enjoyed her liberty not very long: for shortly after her return, one Robert Maynard, then bailiff of Colchester, met with her, who espying her, came to her, and kissed her, and bade her welcome home from London. Unto whom she considerately answered again, and said, That it was but a Judas's kiss: for in the end, quoth she, I know you will betray me, as indeed it came to pass: for immediately after that discourse she was apprehended by him, and was lodged with the rest in the town prison (as is aforesaid), called the Mote-hall.

6. The sixth of this company was Elizabeth Folks, a young maid, and servant in Colchester, of the age of twenty years. These six were imprisoned in the town prison of Colchester, called Mote-hall, as the other four before-mentioned were in the castle.

Divers examinations these good men had at sundry times before divers justices, priests, and officers, as Mr. Roper, John Kingston, commissary, John Boswell, priest, and Bonner's scribe, and several others, in the presence of the two bailiffs of Colchester, Robert Brown and Robert Maynard, with divers other justices both of the town and country, and a great many other gentlemen: at which time and place, and before the said persons, they had sentence of condemnation read against them, chiefly for not affirming the real presence of the sacrament in their altar. The effect of their words therein, was as follows:

First, The Prisoners in Mote-Hall.

WILLIAM BONGEOR, of the parish of St. Nicholas, in Colchester, glazier, said, that the sacrament of the altar was bread, is bread, and so remaineth bread; and that the consecration made it not more holy, but rather worse. To this he did stand, as also against all the rest of their popish doctrine: and so had sentence read against him.

Thomas Benold, of Colchester, tallow-chandler, affirmed to the like effect as William Bongeor did: and so had sentence also read against him.

W. Purcas, of Bocking, said, that when he received the sacrament, he received bread in an holy use, that preacheth the remembrance of Christ dying for him. To this he stood, and against other their popish matters: and so also had sentence read against him.

Agnes Silver-side, alias Smith, said, that she loved no consecration; for the bread and wine, she said, was made rather worse thereby than better. This good old woman answered them with such sound judgment and boldness, to every thing they asked her, that it rejoiced the hearts of many, and especially to see the patience of such a reverend old age, against the taunts and checks of her enemies. To this she also stood, and had sentence read against her in like manner.

Helen Ewring answered to the like effect as the others did, utterly denying all the laws set forth by the pope, with her whole heart. This good woman was somewhat thick of hearing, but yet in the Lord's matters was quick of understanding, whose name therefore be praised. Against her also was sentence read.

Elizabeth Folks, the young maiden, being examined whether she believed the presence of Christ's body to be in the sacrament substantially and really, or no; answered, that she believed that it was a substantial lie, and a real lie. At which words, the priests and others were very angry, and asked her again, whether after the consecration there remained not the body of Christ in the sacrament. To which she answered, that before consecration and after, it is but bread; and the man that blest without God's word, is cursed and abominable by the word, &c. Then they examined her about confession to the priest, of going to church to hear mass, of the authority of the bishop of Rome, &c. To all which she answered, that by the grace of God, she would neither use nor frequent any of them at all, but utterly detest and abhor them from the bottom of her heart, and all such trumpery.

Then they read the sentence of condemnation against her; at which Dr. Chadsey wept, that the tear trickled down his cheeks. So the sentence being read she kneeled down on her knees, lifting up her hands and eyes unto heaven, with fervent prayer and audible voice praising God, that ever she was born to see that most blessed and happy day, that the Lord would count her worthy to suffer for the testimony of Christ: and Lord, said she, if it be thy will, forgive them that have done this against me, for they know not what they do. Then rising up, she exhorted all those on the bench to repentance, especially those who brought her to prison, as Robert Maynard the bailiff, and such like; which Maynard commonly, monly, when he sat in judgment upon life and death, would sit sleeping on the bench oftentimes, so careful was his mind on his office.

Further, she desired halting gospellers to beware of blood, for that would cry for vengeance, &c. And in the end she told them all, laying her hand upon the bar, that if they did not repent their wicked doings therein, that undoubtedly the very bar would be a witness against them at the day of judgment, that they had that day shed innocent blood.

This Elizabeth Folks, the day before she was condemned, was examined only upon this article, whether she believed there was a catholic church of Christ, or not. To which she answered, Yea. Then was she immediately (by Boswell's means, the scribe) delivered unto her uncle Holt, of the same town of Colchester, to keep, who carried her home to his house; and she being there might have departed thence many times, if she had pleased; for there was means offered to convey her away. But she hearing that some doubted that she had yielded to the pope (although it was untrue), would in no wise content herself, but wept, and was in such anguish of mind and terror of conscience, that by no means she would yield to the papists for any persuasions that could be. And coming before them at Cofin's house at the White Hart in Colchester, she was at utter defiance with them and their doctrine: and so had, as you have heard, in the end a papistical reward, as the rest of her brethren had.

The Prisoners in Colchester Castle.

WILLIAM MUNT, of Muchbentley in Essex, of the age of 61 years, said, that the sacrament of the altar was an abominable idol, and that if he should observe any part of their popish proceedings, he should displease God, and bring his curse upon him, and therefore for fear of his vengeance he durst not do it. This good father was examined of many things, but God be thanked he stood to the truth, and in the end thereof had sentence of condemnation read against him. John Johnson, of Thorp in Essex, widower, thirty-four years of age, was examined as the rest, and made answer in such sort, as the papists counted him none of theirs, and therefore condemned him in their bloody sentence, as they had done the rest before. This John Johnson affirmed, that in the receiving of the sacrament according to Christ's institution, he receiveth the body of Christ spiritually, &c.

Alice Munt, the wife of the said William Munt, forty-one years of age, being also examined as the rest, said and confirmed the same in effect as her husband did, and was therefore also condemned.

Rose Allin, maid, daughter of the said Alice Munt, of the age of twenty years, being examined of auricular confession, going to the church to hear mass, of the popish seven sacraments, &c. answered stoutly, that they stank in the face of God, and she durst not have to do with them for her life, neither was she (she said) any member of theirs; for they were the members of Antichrist, and so should have, if they repented not, the reward of Antichrist. Being asked further what she could say of the see of the bishop of Rome, whether she would obey his authority or no; she answered boldly that she was none of his. As for his see (said she) it is for crows, kites, owls, and ravens to swim in, such as you be: for by the grace of God I shall not swim in that see while I live, neither will I have any thing to do therewith. Then they read the sentence of condemnation against her, and sent her to prison again unto the rest, where she sung with great joy, to the wonder of many.

Thus these poor condemned lambs, being delivered into the hands of the secular power, were all sent to the prison from whence they came, where they remained with much joy and great comfort (in continual reading and invoking the name of God), ever looking and expecting the happy day of their dissolution. In which time the cruel papists left not their mischievous attempts against them, although they would seem now to have no more to do with them. For bloody Bonner, whose throat never cried ho, shortly after got a writ for the burning of the afore said persons; and to shew the more diligence in his cause, he sent a trusty man of his, named Edward Cofin, down with it, and also with his letter, for the furtherance of the matter, the next month after the condemnation.

The writ being thus received by the said bailiffs, and they having then no leisure thereabouts, appointed the day of the execution thereof, to be the second day of August next following. And because the faithful souls were in two several prisons, as the castle was for the county, and Mote-Hall for the town; therefore it was agreed among them, that they in Mote-Hall should be burnt in the forenoon, and those at the castle, by the sheriff of the shire, in the afternoon.

The second day of August, 1557, betwixt six and seven of the clock in the morning, were brought from Mote-Hall unto a plat of ground, hard by the town-wall of Colchester on the out-side, William Bongcor, William Purcas, Thomas Benold, Agnes Silver-side, alias Smith, Helen Ewring, and Elizabeth Folks before-mentioned, who being there, and all things prepared for their martyrdom, they kneeled down, and made their humble prayers to God, but not in such a manner as they would, for the cruel tyrants would not suffer them: especially one Mr. Clere among the rest (who sometime had been a gospeller) shewed himself very extreme unto them; the Lord give him repentance (if it be his good will) and grace to be a better man. When they made their prayers, they rose, and made themselves ready for the fire: and Elizabeth Folks, when she had plucked off her petticoat, would have given it to her mother, who came and kissed her at the stake, and exhorted her to be strong in the Lord) but the wicked there attending, would not suffer her to give it. Therefore taking the said petticoat in her hand, she threw it away from her, saying, farewell all the world, farewell faith, farewell hope; and so taking the stake in her hand, said, welcome love, &c. Now she being at the stake, and one of the officers nailing the chain about her, in the striking of the staple, he missed the place, and gave her a great stroke with the hammer on the shoulder bone: at which, she turning her head, lifted up her eyes to the Lord, and smilingly praying, gave herself to exhorting the people again.

When they were all nailed to the stakes, and the fire about them, they clapped their hands for joy in the fire, that the standers by, (which were by estimation thousands) almost all cried, The Lord strengthen them, the Lord comfort them, the Lord pour his mercies upon them, with such like words, as were wonderful to hear.

Thus yielded they up their souls and bodies into the Lord's hand, for the testimony of his truth. The Lord grant we may imitate the same in the like quarrel, for his mercy's sake. Amen.

In like manner, the said day in the afternoon, were brought forth into the castle-yard, to a place appointed for the same, William Munt, John Johnson, Alice Munt, and Rose Allin afore said: who after they had made their prayers, were joyfully tied to the stakes, calling upon the same name of God, and earnestly exhorting the people to flee from idolatry, suffered martyrdom with such triumph and joy, that the people did no less shout thereat to see it, than at the others that were burnt the same day in the morning.

Thus these ten persons happily ended their lives for the testimony of the gospel. God grant we may well spend our years and days likewise to his glory. Amen.

You have heard before of the taking of John Thurston at Muchbentley, in the house of William Munt of the same town; which said John Thurston, about the month of May, 1557, died in Colchester-castle; a constant confessor of Jesus Christ.

The History of GEORGE EAGLES, otherwife called Trudge-over.

AMONG other martyrs of singular virtue and constancy, one George Eagles deserveth much to be commended, for that he having little or no learning, most manfully served and fought under the banner of Christ's church. For oftentimes the will and pleasure of God is to beautify and adorn his kingdom with the weak and simple instruments of this world; such as Amos was in the Old Testament, who with many others of obscure and unknown names, were called from the herds and folds to the honour of prophets; as likewise we read of the apostles, who were called from the fisherman's craft, and put into churches. Wherefore this George Eagles is not to be despised for his base occupation, whom Christ hath called thence to set forth and declare abroad his gospel. We ought rather to glorify God the more, who by his grace, in so blind a time, inspired him with the gift of preaching, and constancy of suffering: who, after he had used the occupation of a taylor, for some time, being eloquent and of good utterance, gave and applied himself to the service of Christ's church.

Which man, as before in those most bright and clear days of king Edward the Sixth, he had not fruitfully shewed and preached the power and force of the Lord, so afterwards in the tempestuous time and fall of the church (at which time the confessors of Christ and his gospel were troubled, divers of them murdered, some of them banished, and others through fear constrained from appearing publicly), he expressed and uttered his mind with courage. For he, wandering abroad into divers and far countries, where he could find any of his brethren, did there most earnestly encourage and comfort them, now tarrying in this town, and sometimes abiding in that certain months together, as occasion served, lodging sometimes in the country, and sometimes for fear living in fields and woods, who, for his immoderate and unreasonable going abroad, was called 'Trudge-over'. Oftentimes did he lie abroad in the night without cover, spending the most part in devout and earnest prayer.

His diet was so spare and slender above measure, that he used, almost for the space of three years, to drink nothing but water, whereunto he was compelled through necessity in the time of persecution: but when he perceived that by God's providence his body proved well enough with this diet, he thought best to inure himself to it against all necessities.

Now when he had profited Christ's church in this sort, by going about and preaching the gospel a year or two, especially in Colchester and the places thereabout, that privy enemy which envieth always the salvation and blessed estate of the good, lurked and laid wait by all means possible for him, so that there were divers spies sent out, who had in commandment wheresoever they found him, to bring him either alive or dead.

But when this their attempt could not prevail, but was all in vain, (the said Eagles with his brethren keeping in close, and hiding themselves in secret places, as in barns, thickets, holes, &c.) his adversaries went about another way to compass this their enterprise of taking him.

For in the queen's name a grievous edict was proclaimed throughout four shires, Essex, Suffex, Kent, and Norfolk, promising the person that took him twenty pounds for his pains; doubtless a worthy hire to entice any Jew to treachery. For being inflamed with greedy desire of the money, they devised and invented all ways possible to be enriched with the hurt and destruction of this poor man.

At length it came to pass, that he being seen at Colchester, upon Mary Magdalen's day, at which time they kept a fair in the town, would have been taken by his adversaries, if he had not speedily conveyed himself away, a great multitude pursuing after, and seeking diligently for him. Who first hid himself in a grove, and afterwards in a corn-field hard by, and so lay secretly couched from the violence of his enemies, insomuch that they were all, except one, past hope of taking him, and therefore were ready to depart their way.

This one, having more subtlety and wicked craft in his head than the rest, would not depart thence with his fellows, but climbed up into a high tree, there to view and spy if he might see Eagles any where stir or move. The poor man thinking all sure enough, by reason that he heard no noise abroad, rose up on his knees, and lifting up his hands, prayed unto God. And whether it were for that his head were above the corn, or because his voice was heard, the lurker perceiving his desired prey that he hunted after, forthwith came down, and suddenly laying hands on him, brought him as a prisoner to Colchester. Notwithstanding the greedy and Judas knave, which had so much promised him, was fain to be contented with a very small reward, and glad to take that too, lest he should have had nothing at all.

George Eagles being thus taken, was committed to prison at Colchester, and from thence within four days after conveyed to Chelmsford, where he abode all that night in devout prayer, and would not sleep, neither would eat nor drink but bread and water. The next day he was carried to London, to the bishop or the council, and there remained a certain time, and then was brought down to Chelmsford to the sessions, and there was indicted and accused of treason, because he had assembled companies together, contrary to the laws and statutes of the realm in that case provided. For it was ordained a little before, to avoid sedition, that if men should assemble secretly together, above the number of six, they should be attached of treason.

And although it was well known, that George Eagles did never any thing seditiously against the queen, yet to cloak an honest matter withal, and to cause him to be the more hated of the people, they turned religion into a civil offence and crime, and though he defended his cause stoutly and boldly, making a full declaration of his religion or faith, before the judges; yet could he not bring it to pass by any means, but that he must needs be indicted (as is said) of treason; whose indictment did run much after this fashion.

"George Eagles, thou art indicted by the name of George Eagles, otherwife Trudge-over the Word, for that thou didst such a day make thy prayer, that God should turn queen Mary's heart, or else take her away."

He denied that he prayed that God should take her away, but he confessed, he prayed that God would turn her heart in his prayer. Well, notwithstanding, he was condemned for a traitor, although the meaning thereof was for religion.

This being done, he was carried to the sign of the Crown, in Chelmsford; and being there, one Richard Potto, the elder, an inn-holder, dwelling at the sign of the Cock, in the same town, did much trouble him, in persuading him to confess he had offended the queen in his prayer, which he was condemned for, and to ask her forgiveness.

To whom he said, he had not offended her grace in that behalf. So in process of time he was laid upon a sledge, with a hurdle on it, and drawn to the place of execution, being fast bound, having in his hand a psalm book, of which he read very devoutly all the way with a loud voice, till he came there: and being on the ladder, the said Potto did much trouble him with the matter aforesaid; but the sheriff commanded Potto to hold his peace, and trouble him no more.

So he made his confession, and stood very constant still; then he was turned off the ladder. With him were cast certain thieves also, and the next day, when they were brought out to be executed with him, there happened a thing that did much set forth and declare the innocency and piety of this man. For being led between two thieves to the place where he should suffer, when as he exhorted both them and all others to stand stedfastly to the truth, one of them turned the counsel counsel he gave into a jesting matter, and made but a flout at it.

Why should we doubt to obtain heaven, said he, soasmuch as this holy man shall go before us, as captain and leader unto us in the way. We shall flee thither straight, as soon as he hath once made us the entry.

In this, George Eagles and the other did greatly reprove him, who on the other side gave good heed to George's exhortation, earnestly bewailing his own wickedness, and calling to Christ for mercy. But the more that the first was bid to be still, and to leave off his scoffing, the more perverse he continued in his foolishness, and his wicked behaviour. At length they came to the gallows, where they should be hanged, but George was carried to another place hard by to suffer. Between the two he went foremost who was most serious, who being upon the ladder, after he had exhorted the people to beware and to take heed to themselves, how they did transgress the commandments of God, and then having committed his soul into God's hands, he ended his life after a godly and quiet manner.

The mocker's turn came next, who would have likewise said somewhat, but his tongue faltered in his head, that he was not able to speak a word. He would fain have uttered his mind, but he could not bring it out. Then the under-sheriff bade him say the Lord's prayer, which he could not say neither but flutteringly, as a man would say, one word to-day and another to-morrow. Then one did begin to say it, and desired him to say after.

Such as were there and saw it, were much astonished, especially those that beheld the just punishment of God against him that had mocked so earnest a matter. George Eagles in the mean time, after he had hanged a small space, having a great check with the halter, immediately one of the bailiffs cut it asunder, and he fell to the ground being still alive, although much amazed with the check he had off the ladder.

Then one William Swallow, of Chelmsford, a bailiff, drew him to the sledge that he was drawn thither on, and laid his neck thereon, and with a cleaver, such as is occupied in many men's kitchens, and blunt, did hackle off his head, and sometimes hit his neck, and sometimes his chin, and did sadly mangle him, and so opened him. Notwithstanding, this blessed martyr of Christ abode stedfast and constant in the very midst of his torments, till such time as his tormentor, William Swallow, did pluck the heart out of his body. The body being divided into four parts, and his bowels burnt, was brought to the aforesaid Swallow's door, and there laid upon the fish-stalls before his door, till they had made ready a carriage to carry his quarters, one to Colchester, and the rest to Harwich, Chelmsford, and St. Rouse's.

His head was set up at Chelmsford, on the market-cross on a long pole, and there stood, till the wind blew it down, and lying certain days in the street tumbled about, one caused it to be buried in the church-yard in the night. Also a wonderful work of God was in that he shewed on this wicked bailiff Swallow, who within a short space after this was so punished, that all the hair went well near off his head, his eyes were as it were closed up, and could scarcely see, the nails of his fingers and toes went clean off. He was in such case of his body as though he had been a leper, and now in his old age almost a very beggar, and his wife, which he a little after married, God hath punished with the falling sickness, or a disease like unto that: which may be a warning or glass for all men and women to look in, that be enemies to God's true servants.

No less a token of his marvellous judgment did God shew upon the aforesaid Richard Potto, who did so much trouble this George Eagles in the inn, and at the place of execution, as is above specified. He lived till the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign, all which time he little joyed, and being on a time in a great chafe with one or two of his neighbours in his own house, feeling himself not well, he said to one of his servants, go with me into the chamber; and when he came there, he fell down on a low bed, as heavy as it had been lead, and lay there foaming at the mouth, and could never speak after, neither understood what was said to him, but lay as senseless as if he had been a dumb beast, and within three or four days died. God grant that this token sent of God, with many more such, may be a warning to us ever hereafter, while we live unto the world's end.

Besides this, God hath wonderfully shewed his work. For on a time when they laid great wait for George Eagles, that it was thought impossible but that he should be taken, being so beset; his friends put him into apprentice's apparel, viz. watchet-hose, as their manner is, and an old cloak, and set him on a pack of wool, as though he had ridden to carry wool to the spinners, so he rode through the midst of his adversaries, and escaped them all for that time. Another chief troubler of the said George Eagles, was also one justice Brown, who enjoyed not his cruelty many years after.

Also when he was at the sessions at Chelmsford, there was a rumour raised, that he had accused divers honest men that did keep him in their houses, and were conversant with him, and all to discredit him; which rumour was very false and utterly untrue. Witness one Raynold, with divers others dwelling in Chelmsford.

An Account of the Examination of RICHARD CRASHFIELD, of Wymundham, condemned to Death for the Testimony of Jesus Christ.

ABOUT this time suffered at Norwich, a godly man, named Richard Crashfield, whose examinations before the chancellor, named Dunning, as he penned them with his own hand, so have we faithfully recorded the same.

How say you, sirrah, said the chancellor, to the ceremonies of the church?

Then said I, What ceremonies?

He said unto me, Do you not believe that all the ceremonies of the church are good and godly?

My answer was, I do believe so many as are grounded in the testimony of Jesus Christ.

Tush, said he, do you believe in the sacrament of the altar?

I said, I knew not what it was.

Then, said he, Do you not believe that Christ took bread, and gave thanks, brake it, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body?"

Yes verily, said I, and even as Christ did speak, so did he perform the work.

Tush, said he, do you not believe this, that after the words spoken by the priest, there is the substance of Christ's body, flesh, and blood? How say you, do you not believe this? Speak, man.

I do believe that Christ's body was broken for me upon the cross, and his blood shed for my redemption, whereof the bread and wine is a perpetual memory, the pledge of his mercy, the ring and seal of his promise, and a perpetual memory for the faithful unto the end of the world. So then I was commanded into prison until the next day.

Another Examination of RICHARD CRASHFIELD.

THE day following I was brought forth. Then the chancellor said unto me, Richard, how say you? Are you otherwise minded than you were yesterday? He rehearsing all the words that we had before, said, Are not these your words? Whereunto I answered, Yes.

Then said he, How say you, can you not find in your heart, when you come to the church, to kneel down before the rood, and make your prayer?

I answered and said, No, rehearsing the commandment of God forbidding the same.

He said, Have you not read or heard, that God commanded an image to be made?

I answered, What image?
 He said, The brazen serpent.
 I said, Yes, I have heard it read, how that God did command it to be made, and likewise to be broken down.
 Then doctor Bridges said, Wherefore did God command the seraphims and cherubims to be made?
 I said, I could not tell; I would fain learn.
 Then said the chancellor, But how say you to this? Can you find in your heart to fall down before the picture of Christ, which is the rood?
 I answered, No, I fear the curse of God: for it is written, that God cursed his hands that make them, yea, and the hands that make the tools wherewith they are carved.
 Then doctor Bridges raged, and said, Listen now what a piece of scripture he hath here gotten to serve his purpose, for he will not allow but where he listeth.
 Then said the chancellor, How say you to confession to the priest? When were you confessed?
 I said, I confess myself daily unto the eternal God, whom I most grievously offend.
 Then the chancellor said, Do you not take confession to the priest to be good?
 I answered, No, but rather wicked.
 Then the chancellor said, How say you by yonder gear, yonder singing, and yonder playing on the organs? Is it not good and godly?
 I said, I could perceive no godliness in it.
 Then he said, Why, is it not written in the Psalms, that we should praise God with hymns and spiritual songs?
 I said, Yes, spiritual songs must be had: but yonder is of the flesh, and of the spirit of error. For to you it is pleasant and glorious, but to the Lord it is bitter and odious.
 Then said the chancellor, Why, is it not written, my house is an house of prayer?
 I said, Yes. It is written also, that you have made my house a den of thieves.
 With that the chancellor looked and said, Have we?
 I answered and said, Christ said so. Then was I commanded to ward.
 The Thursday next following, doctor Bridges was sent to me to examine me of my faith. And he said, Country-man, my lord bishop (for love he would have you saved) hath sent me unto you, because to-morrow is your day appointed: therefore my lord hath thought it proper, that you should declare your faith unto me. For to-morrow my lord will not have much ado with you.
 I answered and said, Hath my lord sent you?
 It is not you, to whom I am disposed to shew my mind.
 Then he said to me, I pray you let me know your mind concerning the sacrament of the altar.
 I answered, Are you ignorant of what I have said?
 He said, No, for it was well written, except you believe, faith he, as the church hath taught, you are damned both soul and body.
 I answered and said, Judge not, lest you be judged: condemn not, lest you be condemned.
 And he said, Lo, we shall have a traitor as well as an heretic: for he will disallow the king's judgment.
 I said, No, I do not disallow the king's judgment, but your's I do disallow. For I pray you tell me, how came you by this judgment?
 He answered and said, By the church: for the church hath power to save and condemn: for if you be condemned by the church, be you sure, that you be damned both body and soul.
 Then I said, If you have this power, I am fore deceived. For I believe that Christ shall be our judge. But now I perceive that you will do much for him, that you will not put him to the pain.
 Then he said, Stand nearer, country-man, why stand you so far off?
 I answered, I am near enough, and a little too near.
 Then he said, Did not Christ say, is not my flesh meat, and my blood drink indeed?

I asked, To whom spake Christ those words?
 He answered, To his disciples.
 I (intending to rehearse the text) said, Whereat did Christ's disciples murmur inwardly?
 He said, No, they did not murmur, but they were the Infidels, (saith he) for the disciples were satisfied with these words.
 I said, Did not Christ say thus, as he taught at Capernaum, whereat his disciples murmured, saying, This is an hard saying, who can abide the hearing of it? Jesus perceiving their thoughts, said, Doth this offend you?
 Then he raged and said, Oh, thou wrestest the text for thine own purpose: for the disciples did never murmur, but the unbelievers as thou art.
 I answered, Yes, but I perceive you know not the text.
 Then he said with much rage, I will lay my head thereon it is not so.
 Then I said, I have done with you.
 To which he answered, What shall I tell my lord of you?
 If you have nothing to tell him, your errand shall be sooner done, said I. And so he departed.
 Then on Friday I was brought forth to receive judgment, when the chancellor said unto me, Are you a new man, or are you not?
 I answered, I trust I am a new man born of God.
 God give you grace so to be, said he. So he rehearsed all my examination and said, How say you, are not these your words?
 I answered, Yes, I will not deny them.
 Then he said to Dr. Pere, standing by, I pray you talk with him. Then he alledging to me many fair flattering words, said, "Take, eat, this is my body." How say you to this? Do you not believe that it is Christ's body? Speak.
 I answered, Have you not my mind, why do you trouble me?
 He said, What did Christ give you? Was it bread, or was it not?
 I said, Christ took bread, and gave thanks, and gave it, and they took bread, and did eat. And St. Paul maketh it more manifest, where he saith, "So oft as ye shall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall shew forth the Lord's death until he come." St. Paul saith not here as you say: for he saith, "So oft as ye shall eat of this bread." He doth not say, Body.
 So they intending that I should go no further in the text, said, Tush, you go about the bush. Answer to the first question. Let us make an end of that.
 What say you to the bread that Christ gave? Let me have your mind in that.
 I answered, I have said my mind in it.
 Then the chancellor said, No, we will have your mind in that.
 I answered, I have said my mind in it.
 Then said the chancellor, No, we will have your mind more plainly: for we intend not to have many words with you.
 I said, My faith is fully grounded and established, that Christ Jesus the Easter Lamb hath offered his blessed body a sacrifice to God the Father, the priest of my redemption. For by that only sacrifice are all the faithful sanctified, and he is our only Advocate and Mediator, and he hath made perfect our redemption. This hath he done alone, without any of your daily oblations.
 Then Dr. Bridges started up and said, Truth, your words are true indeed: you take well the literal sense: but this you must understand, that like as you said that Christ offered his body upon the cross, which was a bloody sacrifice, and a visible sacrifice; so likewise we daily offer the self-same body that was offered upon the cross, but not bloody and visible, but invisible, unto God the Father.
 Do you offer Christ's body, I said? Why then Christ's sacrifice was not perfect. But Christ is true, when all men shall be liars.

Then

Then he said, Thou shalt not fear him that hath power to kill the body: but thou shalt fear him that hath power to kill both body and soul.

I answered and said, It is not so. But the text is thus, "Thou shalt not fear them that have power to kill the body, and then have done what they can. But thou shalt fear him that hath power to kill both body and soul, and cast them both into hell-fire," and not them.

He said, Yes: for it is the church.

I answered, Why, Christ saith, "I give my life for the redemption of the world. No man taketh my life from me (saith he), but I give it of my own power, and so I have power to take it again." Therefore Christ the Son of God did offer his body once for all. And if you will presume to offer his body daily, then your power is above Christ's power. With that he was angry, and said, What shall we have doctrine? You are not hereto appointed.

Then the chancellor stood up and said, Will you turn from this wicked error, and be an example of goodness, as you have been an example of evil? (for by your wicked reading you have persuaded some simple women to be in this error) and you shall have mercy.

And I said, It is of God that I do crave mercy, whom I have offended, and not you.

Then the chancellor said, When were you at your parish church? You have stood excommunicate these two years and more: wherefore you are condemned. And so I was condemned.

Thus hast thou (gentle reader) the examinations of this pious young man, set forth in writing with his own hand, who, soon after his condemnation, was brought to the stake by the sheriffs and officers, where with much patience and constancy he endured his martyrdom. At whose burning, one Thomas Carman was apprehended, whose story hereafter followeth in its order and place.

About the same time one named Fryer, with a woman accompanying him, who was the sister of George Eagles, suffered the like martyrdom by the unrighteous papists, whose tyranny the Lord of his mercy abate and cut short, turning that generation, if it be his will, to a better mind.

An Account of the Apprehension and Death of Mrs. JOYCE LEWES, the Wife of Mr. THOMAS LEWES, of Manceter.

MISTRESS Joyce Lewes, a gentlewoman born, was first married to one Appleby, and afterwards to Thomas Lewes, of Manceter. In the beginning of queen Mary's time she went to church and heard mass as others did, but when she heard of the burning of that most godly and learned martyr Laurence Saunders, who suffered in Coventry, she began to take more heed to the matter, and inquired earnestly of such as she knew feared God, the cause of his death: and when she perceived it was because he refused to receive the mass, she began to be troubled in conscience, and waxed very unquiet. And because her house was even hard by Mr. John Glover's house, of whom mention was made before, a man of blessed memory, and a singular example of his unfeigned godliness, and manifold troubles which he suffered for the gospel, she did oftentimes resort to him, and desired him to tell her the faults that were in the mass, and other things that at that time were urged as necessary to salvation.

Now he perceiving both her unquiet mind, and the desire she had to know the truth, did most diligently instruct her in the way of the Lord, proving unto her out of God's holy word, that the mass, with all other papistical inventions, was odious in God's sight; and besides this, reproved her, for that she delighted in the vanities of this world so much. By which godly counsel, she began to grow weary of the world, and thoroughly sorrowful for her sins, being inflamed with the love of God, and desirous to serve him according to his word, purposing also to flee from those things which displeased him. And because she had learned the mass to be evil and abominable, she began to hate it. And when at a time she was compelled by the furiousness of her husband to come to the church, at the same time when the holy water was cast, she turned her back towards it, and shewed herself to be displeased with their blasphemous holy water, injurious to the blood of Christ. Whereupon she was accused before the bishop for despising of their sacramentals.

Immediately a citation was sent for her to her husband's house, to appear before the bishop. The sumner that brought the citation delivered it to her husband, who looking upon it, and perceiving that it was moved with anger, desired the sumner to take the citation with him again, or else he would make him eat it. The sumner refused to take it again, for he thought no man durst have been so bold to him. But in the end Lewes compelled the said sumner to eat the citation indeed, by setting a dagger to his heart; and when he had eaten it, he caused him to drink, and so sent him away. But immediately after, the said Lewes with his wife were commanded to appear before the bishop, where the said Lewes by and by submitted himself, and desiring the bishop to be good to him, excusing himself after the best fashion he could. Whereupon the bishop was content to receive his submission, with condition that his wife should submit herself also. But she stoutly told the bishop, that by refusing of the holy water she had neither offended God, nor any part of his laws. At which words the bishop being grievously offended, yet because she was a gentlewoman, he would not take her at the worst (as he said), but gave her one month's respite, binding her husband in an hundred pound to bring her again unto him at the month's end, and so they were both let go.

When they came to their own house, the said Mrs. Joyce Lewes gave herself to most diligent prayer, and invoking of the name of God, resorting continually to the abovenamed man of God, Mr. John Glover, who did most diligently instruct her with God's word, willing her in any case not to meddle with that matter in respect of vain glory, or to get herself a name, shewing her the great danger she was like to cast herself in, if she should meddle in God's matter otherwise than Christ doth teach.

When the month was now almost expired, and the time at hand that she should be brought before the said bishop, her husband being advertised by the said Mr. John Glover and others, not to carry her to the bishop, but to seek some way to save her, or if the worst should come, to be content to forfeit so much money, rather than to cast his own wife into the fire; he answered, he would not lose or forfeit any thing for her sake; and so, like a murderer of his own wife, he carried her to the bloody bishop, where she was examined, and found more stout, than she was before death was threatened. And to begin withal, she was sent to such a stinking prison, that a certain maid, which was appointed to keep her company, did swoon in the same prison.

Being thus kept in prison, and oftentimes examined, at length she was brought to judgment, and pronounced an heretic worthy to be burned. When the bishop reasoned with her, why she would not come to the mass, and receive the sacraments and sacramentals of the Holy Ghost; she answered, Because I find not these things in God's word, which you so urge and magnify, as things most needful for men's salvation. If these things were in the word of God commanded, I would, with all my heart, receive, esteem, and believe them. The bishop answered, If thou wilt believe no more than is in the scripture, concerning matters of religion, thou art in a damnable case. At which words she was wonderfully amazed, and being moved by the Spirit of God, told the bishop, that his words were ungodly and wicked.

After

After her condemnation, she continued a whole twelve-month in prison, because she was committed to the sheriff, that was of late chosen, who could not be compelled to put her to death in his time, as he affirmed; for which things, after her death, he was sore troubled, and in danger of his life. All that time she was in prison, her behaviour was such both in words and deeds, that all they, that had any spark of godliness and honesty, did greatly lament her case, that she should be put to death.

Now when the time drew near which God had appointed for her deliverance, the writ De comburendo (as they term it) being brought down from London, she desired some of her friends to come to her, with whom, when they came, she consulted how she might behave herself, that her death might be more glorious to the name of God, comfortable to his people, and also most discomfortable to the enemies of God. As for death (saith she), I do not greatly heed it: when I behold the amiable countenance of Christ my dear Saviour, the ugly face of death doth not greatly trouble me. In which time also she reasoned most comfortably out of God's word, of God's election and reprobation.

In the evening before her suffering, two of the priests of the clove of Litchfield, came to the under sheriff's house, where she lay, and sent word to her by the sheriff, that they were come to her confession; for they would be sorry she should die without. She sent them word again, she had made a confession to Christ her Saviour, at whose hands she was sure to have forgiveness of her sins. As concerning the cause for which she should die, she had no cause to confess that, but rather to give most humble praise to God, that he had made her worthy to suffer death for his word: and as concerning that absolution that they were able to give unto her, being authorized by the pope, she did defy the same, even from the bottom of her heart.

Which when the priests heard, they said to the sheriff, Well, to-morrow her stoutness will be proved and tried: for although perhaps she hath now some friends that whisper in her ears, to-morrow we will see who dare be so hardy as to come near her: and so they went their ways, with anger, that their confession and absolution was nought set by.

All that night she was wonderfully chearful and merry, with a certain gravity, insomuch that the majesty of the Spirit of God did manifestly appear in her, who did expel the fear of death out of her heart, spending the time in prayer, reading and talking with them that were purposely come unto her, to comfort her with the word of God.

About three o'clock in the morning, Satan (who never sleepeth, especially when death is at hand) began to stir himself busily, shooting at her that fiery dart, which he is wont to do against all that are at defiance with him, by questioning her, how she could tell that she was chosen to eternal life, and that Christ died for her. I grant that he died, but that he died for thee, how canst thou tell: whilst she was troubled with this suggestion, they that were about her counselled her to follow the example of Paul, Gal. ii. where he saith, "Which hath loved me, and given himself for me." Also, that her vocation and calling to the knowledge of God's word, was a manifest token of God's love and desire towards God working in her heart, that love and desire towards God to please him, and to be justified by him through Christ, &c. By these and like persuasions, and especially by the comfortable promises of Christ, brought out of the scripture, Satan was put to flight, and she comforted in Christ.

About eight o'clock, Mr. Sheriff came into her chamber, saying these words, Mrs. Lewes, I am come to bring you tidings of the queen's pleasure, which is, that you shall live but one hour longer in this world: therefore it behoveth you to prepare yourself for it. At which words, being so grossly uttered, and so suddenly, by such an officer as he was, made her somewhat cast down. Wherefore one of her friends and acquaintance standing by, said these words: Mrs. Lewes, you have great cause to praise God, who has vouchsafed so soon to take you out of this world, and made you worthy to be a witness of his truth, and to bear record unto Christ, that he is the only Saviour.

After which words, she said, Mr. Sheriff, your message is welcome to me, and I thank my God that he has made me worthy to offer my life for his service. At which words the sheriff departed: but in the space of an hour he came back again, with swords and clubs; and when he came up into her chamber, one of her friends desired him to give him leave to go with her to the stake, and to comfort her, which the sheriff granted at that time; but afterwards, when she was dead, he was sore troubled for the same.

Now when she was brought through the town by a number of bill-men, a great number of people being present, she was led by two of her friends, namely, Mr. Michael Reniger, and Mr. Augustine Bernher, and so brought to the place of execution: and because the place was far off, and the throng of the people great, and she not acquainted with the fresh air, (being so long in prison) one of her friends sent a messenger to the sheriff's house for some drink: and after she had prayed three several times, in which prayers she desired God most instantly to abolish the idolatrous mass, and to deliver this realm from popery (at the end of which prayers most part of the people cried Amen; yea, even the sheriff that stood hard by her, ready to cast her into the fire for not allowing the mass, at this her prayer said with the rest of her people, Amen); when she had thus prayed, she took the cup into her hands, saying, I drink to all them that unfeignedly love the gospel of Jesus Christ, and wish for the abolishment of popery. When she had drank, they that were her friends drank also. After that a great number, especially the women of that town, drank with her; who afterwards were put to open penance in the church by the cruel papists, for drinking with her.

When she was chained to the stake, she shewed such chearfulness, that it passed man's reason, being so well coloured in her face, and being so patient, that most of them that had honest hearts were moved, and even with tears bewailed the tyranny of the papists. When the fire was set to her, she made no other resistance than by lifting up her hands towards heaven, being dead very soon: for the under sheriff, at the request of her friends, had provided such stuff, that she was suddenly dispatched out of this miserable world.

This, amongst other things, is not to be forgotten, that the papists had appointed some to rail upon her, and to revile her, both as she went to the place of execution, as also when she was at the stake. Amongst others there was an old priest, who had a pair of writing tables, wherein he set down the names of those women that drank of the cup, (as before mentioned), and also described her friends by their apparel, for he could not presently learn their names, and afterwards inquired for them: and so immediately after process was sent out for them, both to Coventry and other places: but God, whose providence sleeps not, did defend them from the hands of these cruel tyrants. Unto which God, with the Son and the Holy Ghost, be honour and glory for ever, Amen.

ABOUT the seventeenth day of September, were burned at Islington, near London, these four professors of Christ, Ralph Allerton, James Austoo, Margery Austoo his wife, and Richard Roth. Among which it first appeareth, that this Ralph Allerton was, more than a year before his condemnation, apprehended and brought before the lord Darcy, of Colchester, and was there accused, as well for that he would not consent to come unto the idolatry and superstition which then was used, as also that he had by preaching enticed others to do the like.

Being examined thereupon, he confessed that he coming into his parish of Bentley, and seeing the people sitting there, either gazing about, or else talking together, he exhorted them that they would fall unto prayer, and meditation of God's most holy word, and not sit so idly: to which they willingly consented. Then after prayer ended, he read to them a chapter out of the New Testament, and so departed.

In which exercise he continued until Candlemas, and then being informed that he might not do so by the law, (for that he was no priest or minister) he left off, and kept himself close in his house till after Easter. At which time, certain men sworn for inquiry of such matters came unto his house, and attached him for reading in the parish of Welley.

But when they understood that he had read but once, and that it was of obedience (whereunto he earnestly moved the people) they let him for that time depart. Notwithstanding for fear of their cruelty, he was not long after constrained to forsake his own house, and keep himself in woods, barns, and other solitary places, until the time of his apprehension.

After his examination, the lord Darcy sent him up to the council; but they (not minding to trouble themselves with him) sent him unto Bonner, who by threatnings and other subtle means, so abused the simple and fearful heart of this man, that within a short time he won his most wicked will, and made him revoke and recant his former profession, and thereupon set him at liberty of body: which yet brought such a bondage and terror of soul and conscience, and so cast him down, that except God (whose mercies are immeasurable) had supported and lifted him up again, he had perished for ever.

But God, who never suffereth his children utterly to fall, casting his pitiful eyes on his lost sheep, with his merciful and fatherly chastisements, did, with Peter, raise him up again, giving unto him not only hearty and unfeigned repentance, but also a most constant boldness to profess again, even unto death, his most holy name and glorious gospel. Wherefore at the procurement of Thomas Tye, priest, sometime an earnest professor of Christ, but now a fierce persecutor of the same (as appeareth more at large before in the history of William Munt and his wife), he was again apprehended, and sent to bishop Bonner, before whom he was the eighth day of April, and sundry other times else examined. The report of which examination, written by his own hand with blood, for lack of other ink, here followeth.

The Examination of RALPH ALLERTON, at his second Apprehension, before the Bishop of London, at Fulham, April 8, 1557.

Bonner. AH, sirrah, how chanceth it that you are come hither again on this fashion? I dare say thou art accused wrongfully.

Ralph. Yea, my lord, so I am. For if I were guilty of such things as I am accused of, then I would be very sorry.

Bonner. By St. Mary, that is not well done. But let me hear, art thou an honest man? For if I can proye no heresy by thee, then shall thine accusers do thee no harm at all. Go on, let me hear thee; for I did not believe the tale to be true.

Ralph. My lord, who did accuse me? I pray you let me know, and what is mine accusation, that I may answer thereunto.

Bonner. Ah, wilt thou so? Before God, if thou hast not dissembled, then thou needest not be afraid, nor ashamed to answer for thyself. But tell me in faith, hast thou not dissembled?

Ralph. If I cannot have mine accusers to accuse me before you, my conscience doth constrain me to accuse myself before you: for I confess, that I have grievously offended God in my dissimulation, at my last being before your lordship, for which I am very sorry, as God knoweth.

Bonner. Wherein, I pray thee, didst thou dissemble, when thou wast before me?

Ralph. Forsooth, my lord, if your lordship remember, I did set my hand to a certain writing, the contents whereof (as I remember) were, That I believe in all things as the catholic church teacheth, &c. In which I did not disclose my mind, but shamefully dissembled, because I made no difference between the true church and the untrue church.

No. 52.

Bonner. Nay, but I pray thee let me hear more of this trash. For I fear me thou wilt smell of an heretic anon. Which is the true church as thou sayest? Dost thou not call the heretics' church the true church, or the catholic church of Christ? Now which of these two are the true church, sayest thou? Speak, for in faith, I will know of thee, before I leave thee.

Ralph. As concerning the church of heretics, I utterly abhor the same, as detestable and abominable before God, with all their enormities and heresies; and the church catholic is it that I only embrace, whose doctrine is sincere, pure, and true.

Bonner. By St. Augustine, but that is well said of thee. For, by God Almighty, if thou hadst allowed the church of heretics, I would have burned thee with fire for thy labour.

Then said one Morton, a priest, My lord, you know not yet what church it is that he calleth catholic. I warrant you he meaneth naughtily enough.

Bonner. Think you so? Now by our blessed lady, if it be so, he might have deceived me. How say you, sirrah, which is the catholic church?

Ralph. Even that which hath received the wholesome sound, spoken of by Isaiah, David, Malachi, and Paul, with many other more. Which sound, as it is written, hath gone throughout all the earth in every place, and unto the ends of the world.

Bonner. Yea, thou sayest true before God. For this is the sound that hath gone throughout all Christendom, and he that believeth not the sound of the holy church, as St. Cyprian saith, doth err. For he saith, that whosoever is out of the church, is like unto them that were out of Noah's ship, when the flood came upon all the whole world; so the ark of Noah is likened unto the church; and therefore thou hast well said in thy confession. For the church is not alone in Germany, nor was here in England in the time of the late schisms, as the heretics do affirm. For if the church should be there alone, then were Christ a liar: for he promised that the Holy Ghost should come to us, and lead us unto all truth, yea, and remain with us, unto the end of the world. So now, if we will take Christ for a true sayer, then must we needs affirm, that the way which is taught in France, Spain, Italy, Flanders, Denmark, Scotland, and all Christendom over, must needs be the true catholic church.

Ralph. My lord, if you remember, I spake of all the world, as it is written, and not of all Christendom only, as methinks your lordship takes it, which kind of speaking you do not find in all the bible. For I am sure, that the gospel hath been both preached and persecuted in all lands. First, In Jewry, by the scribes and pharisees, and since that time, by Nero, Dioclesian, and such like, and now here in these our days, by your lordship knoweth whom. For true it is that the church which you call catholic, is not otherwise catholic than was figured in Cain, observed of by Jeroboam, Ahab, Jezebel, Nebuchodonosor, Antiochus, and Herod, with innumerable more of the like: and as both Daniel and Esdras make mention of these last days, by a plain prophecy, and now fulfilled, as appeareth, and affirmed by our Saviour Christ and his apostles, saying, There shall come grievous wolves to devour the flock.

Bonner. Now, by the blessed sacrament of the altar, Mr. Morton, he is the rankest heretic that ever came before me. How say you? Have you heard the like?

Morton. I thought what he was, my lord, at the first.

Bonner. Now, by All-hallows, thou shalt be burnt with fire for thy lying, thou whorson, varlet, and prick-louse thou. Dost thou find a prophecy in David of us? Nay, you knave, it is you that he speaketh of, and of your false pretended holiness. Speak, let me hear what is the saying of Esdras, and take heed you make not a lie, I advise you.

7 M

Ralph. The saying of Esdras is this: "The heat of great multitude is kindled over you, and they shall take away certain of you, and feed the idols with you, and he that consenteth unto them shall be had in derision, laughed to scorn, and trodden under foot; yea, they shall be like madmen, for they spare no man: they shall spoil and waste such as fear the Lord," &c.

Bonner. And have you taken this thing, to make your matter good? Ah, firrah, wilt thou so? By my faith, a pretty instruction, and a necessary thing to be taught among the people. By my troth, I think there be more of this opinion. I pray thee tell me: is there any that understandeth this scripture on this fashion? Before God, I think there are none in all England, but thou.

Ralph. Yes, my lord, there are in England three religions.

Bonner. Sayest thou so? Which be these three?

Ralph. The first is that which you hold, the second is clean contrary to the same; and the third is a neuter, being indifferent: that is to say, observing all things that are commanded outwardly, as though he were of your part, his heart being set wholly against the same.

Bonner. And of these three which art thou? For now thou must needs be one of them.

Ralph. Yea, my lord, I am of one of them; and that which I am of, is even that which is contrary to that which you teach to be believed under pain of death.

Bonner. Ah, fir, you were here with me at Fulham, and had good cheer, yea, and money in your purse when you went away, and by my faith I had a favour unto thee, but now I see thou wilt be a naughty knave. Why wilt thou take upon thee to read the scripture, and canst understand never a word? for thou hast brought a text of scripture which maketh clean against thee. For Esdras speaketh of the multitude of you heretics, declaring your hate against the catholic church, making the simple or idle people believe, that all is idolatry that we do, and so intice them away till you have overcome them.

Ralph. Nay, not so, my lord. For he maketh it more plain, and saith on this wise; "They shall take away their goods, and put them out of their houses, and then shall it be known who are my chosen (saith the Lord), for they shall be tried, as the silver or gold in the fire." And we see it so come to pass, even as he hath said. For who is not now driven from house and home, yea, and his goods taken up for other men that never sweat for them, if he do not observe as you command and set forth? Or else, if he be taken, then must he either deny the truth, as I did, in dissembling, or else he shall be sure to be tried, as Esdras saith, even as the gold is tried in the fire. Whereby all the world may know that you are the bloody church, figured in Cain the tyrant, neither are you yet able to avoid it.

Morton. I promise you, my lord, I like him better now than ever I did, when he was here before you the other time. For then he did but dissemble, as I perceived well enough; but now methinks he speaketh plainly.

Bonner. Marry, fir, as you say indeed, he is plain. For he is a plain heretic, and shall be burned. Have the knave away. Let him be carried to Little-ease, at London, until I come.

Ralph. And so I was carried to London unto Little-ease, and there I remained that night, and on the next morning I appeared before him again, the dean of St. Paul's and the chancellor of London being present. Then were brought forth certain writings that I had set my hand unto.

Bonner. Come on your ways, firrah. Is not this your hand, and this, and this?

Ralph. Yea, they are my hand all of them; I confess the same, neither yet will I deny any thing that I have set my hand unto. But if I have set my hand to any thing that is not lawful, therefore am I sorry. Nevertheless, my hand I will not deny to be my doing.

Bonner. Well said, now you must tell me; were you never at the church since you went from me, at mass, mattins? &c.

Ralph. No, my lord, not at mass, mattins, nor any other strange worshipping of God.

Bonner. Yea, sayest thou so? Wast thou neither at thine own parish church, nor at any other? And dost thou also say, that it is a strange worshipping? Why, I pray thee, wilt thou not believe the scripture to be true?

Ralph. Yea, my lord, I believe the scripture to be true, and in defence of the same I intend to give my life, rather than I will deny any part thereof, God willing.

Dean. My lord, this fellow will be an honest man, I hear by him. He will not stand in his opinion; for he sheweth himself gentle and patient in his talk.

Bonner. Oh, he is a glorious knave. His painted terms shall no more deceive me. Ah, whose-son prick-louse, doth not Christ say, This is my body? And how darest thou deny these words, thou knave? I have a writing to shew, and thine own hand to the same. Let me see, pray wilt thou deny this? Is not this thine own hand?

Ralph. Yes, my lord, it is mine own hand, neither am I ashamed thereof, because my confession is agreeable to God's word. And whereas you do lay unto my charge, that I should deny the words of our Saviour Jesus Christ; oh, good Lord, from whence cometh this rash, hasty, and untrue judgment? Forsooth not from the Spirit of truth; for he leadeth men into all truth, and is not the father of liars. Whereupon should your lordship gather or say of me so defamously; wherefore, I beseech you, if I deny the scriptures canonical, or any part thereof, then let me die.

Tye, the Priest. My lord, he is a very seditious fellow, and persuadeth other men to do as he himself doth, contrary to the order appointed by the queen's highness and the clergy of this realm. For a great many of the parish will be gathered one day to one place, and another day to another place to hear him, so that very few come to church to hear divine service: and this was not only before that he was taken and brought unto the council, but also since his return home again, he hath done much harm. For where both men and women were honestly disposed before, by St. Anne now they are almost as bad as he. And furthermore, he was not ashamed to withstand me before all the parish, saying, that we were of the malignant church of Antichrist, and not of the true church of Christ, alledging a great many scriptures to serve his purpose, saying, Good people, take heed, and beware of these blood-thirsty dogs, &c. And then I commanded the constable to apprehend him, and so he did. Nevertheless, after this apprehension, the constable let him go about his business all the next day, so that without putting in of surcutes, he let him go into Suffolk and other places, for no goodness, I warrant you, my lord: it were alms to teach such officers their duty, how they should let such rebels go at their own liberty, after that they be apprehended and taken, but to keep them fast in the stocks until they bring them before a justice.

Ralph. As I said before, so say I now again; thou art not of the church of Christ, and that I will prove, if I may be suffered. And where you said, that you commanded the constable to apprehend me, you did so indeed, contrary to the laws of this realm, having neither treason, felony, nor murder to lay to my charge: no, neither had you precept, process, nor warrant to serve on me; and therefore I say without a law was I apprehended. And whereas you seek to trouble the constable, because he kept me not in the stocks three days and three nights, it doth shew in part what you are. And my going into Suffolk was not for any evil, but only to buy half a bushel of corn for bread for my poor wife and children, knowing that I had no long time to tarry with them. But if I had run away, then you would surely have laid somewhat to his charge.

Bonner. Go to, thou art a merchant indeed. Ah, firrah, before God thou shalt be burnt with fire. Thou knowest knowest Richard Roth, dost thou not? Is he of the same mind that thou art of, or no? canst thou tell?

Ralph. He is of age to answer, let him speak for himself; for I hear that he is in your house.

Bonner. Lo, what a knave here is. Go, Cluny, fetch me Roth hither. By my troth he is a false knave; but yet thou art worse than he. Ah, firrah, did you not set your hand to a writing, the tenor whereof was, that if you should at any time say or do heretically, then it should be lawful for me to take thee with a relapse, and to proceed in sentence against thee?

Ralph. Yea, that is so. But here is to be asked, whether it is sufficient, that my hand or name in writing be able to give authority to you or to any other to kill me? For if I by writing can do so much, then must my authority be greater than your's. Nevertheless, I have neither said nor done heretically, but like a true christian man have I behaved myself. And so I was committed unto prison again, and the 24th day of the same month I was brought before the bishop, the lord North, Dr. Story, and others, and after a long story in Latin amongst themselves (unto which I gave no answer, because they spake not to me, although they spoke of me), at last the bishop said—

How say you, firrah? Tell me briefly at one word, wilt thou be contented to go to Fulham with me, and there to kneel down at mass, shewing thyself outwardly as though thou didst it with a good will? come, speak.

Ralph. I will not say so.

Bonner. Away with him, away with him.

The second day of May I was brought before the bishop, and three noblemen of the council, whose names I do not remember.

Bonner. Lo, my lords, this same is the fellow that was sent unto me from the council, and did submit himself, so that I had half a hope of him: but by St. Anne I was always in doubt of him. Nevertheless, he was with me, and fared well, and when I delivered him, I gave him money in his purse. How sayest thou? Was it not so as I tell my lords here?

Ralph. Indeed, my lord, I had meat and drink enough; but I never was in bed all the while. And at my departing you gave me twelve pence, although I asked none, nor would have any.

A Lord. Be good to him, my lord, he will be an honest man.

Bonner. Before God, how should I trust him? He hath deceived me once already. But ye shall hear what he will say to the blessed sacrament of the altar. How say you, firrah? After the words of consecration be spoke by the priest, there remaineth no bread, but the very body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, God and man, and none other substance, under the form of bread.

Ralph. Where find you that written, my lord?

Bonner. Lo, fir. Why, doth not Christ say, "This is my body?" How sayest thou? Wilt thou deny these words of our Saviour Christ? Or else was he a dissembler, speaking one thing, and meaning another? Go to, now I have taken you.

Ralph. Yea, my lord, you have taken me indeed, and will keep me until you kill me. However, my lord, I marvel why you leave out the beginning of the institution of the supper of our Lord? For Christ said, "Take ye, and eat ye, this is my body." And if it will please ye to add the former words to the latter, then shall I make you an answer. For sure I am, that Christ was no dissembler, neither did he say one thing and mean another.

Bonner. Why, then must thou needs say, that it is his body; for he saith it himself, and thou confessest that he will not lie.

Ralph. No, my lord: he is true, and all men are liars. Notwithstanding, I utterly refuse to take the words of our Saviour so fantastically as you teach us to take them: for then should we conspire with certain heretics called the Nestorians; for they deny that Christ had a true natural body, and so methinks you do, my lord. If you will affirm his body to be there, as you say he is, then must you needs also affirm, that it is a fantastical body; and therefore look to it for God's sake, and let these words go before; "Take ye, and eat ye," without which words the rest are not sufficient; but when the worthy receivers do take and eat, even then are fulfilled the words of our Saviour unto him, or every of them that so receiveth.

Bonner. Ah, I feel well thou canst not understand these words; I will shew thee a parable. If I should set a piece of beef before thee, and say, Eat, it is beef: and then take part of it away, and send it to my cook, and he shall change the fashion thereof, and make it look like bread; what, wouldst thou say that it were no beef, because it hath not the fashion of beef?

Ralph. Let me understand a little further, my lord, shall the cook add nothing thereunto, nor take any thing therefrom?

Bonner. What is that to the matter, whether he do or no, so long as the shape is changed into another likeness?

Ralph. Ah, will you so, my lord? your sophistry will not serve; the truth will have the victory nevertheless, as Isaiah saith, He that restraineth himself from evil, must be spoiled. And Amos hath such like words also: For the wise must be fain to hold their peace; so wicked a time it is, saith he: nevertheless, he that can speak the truth, and will not, shall give a strait account for the same.

A Doctor. By my lord's leave, here methinks thou speakest like a fool. Wilt thou be a judge of the scripture? Nay, thou must stand to learn, and not to teach; for the whole congregation hath determined the matter long ago.

A Priest. No, by your leave, we have a church, and not a congregation. You mistake that word, Mr. Doctor.

Ralph. Then I said to my fellow-prisoners standing by, My brethren, do ye not hear how these men help one another? Let us do so also. But we never came all in together. Then was I carried away for that time. The 19th day of May I was brought before the bishops of Rochester and Chichester, with others.

Roch. Were you a companion of George Eagles, otherwise called Trudge-over? My lord of London telleth me that you were his fellow companion.

Ralph. I know him very well, my lord.

Roch. By my faith, I had him once, and then he was as drunk as an ape, for he stunk so of drink, that I could not abide him, and so sent him away.

Ralph. My lord, I dare say you took your mark amiss. It was either yourself, or some of your own company, for he did neither drink ale, wine, nor beer, for a quarter of a year before that time; and therefore it was not he forsooth.

The rest of mine examinations you shall have after I am condemned, if I can have any time after my coming into Newgate, which I trust shall touch the matter a great deal more plainly; for the pithy matters are yet unwritten. Thus fare you well, good friends all. Yea, I say, farewell for ever in this present world. Greet ye one another, and be joyful in the Lord. Salute the good widows among you, with all the rest of the congregation in Barfold, and Dedham, and Colchester.

This promise of his, being either not performed, for that he might not thereto be permitted, or else if he did write, the same not coming to my hands; I am fain in the rest of his examinations to follow the only report of the register, who witnesseth, that the 15th day of May, 1557, in the bishop's palace at London, he was examined upon certain interrogatories, the contents whereof be these.

First, That he was of the parish of Muchbentley, and so of the diocese of London.

Secondly, That the 10th day of January, then last past, Mr. John Morant preaching at St. Paul's, the said Ralph Allerton did there openly subscribe himself unto the church of Rome, with the rites and ceremonies thereof.

That he did consent and subscribe himself as well unto the same submission, as also to one other bill, in which he granted, that if he should at any time turn again again unto his former opinions, it should be then lawful for the bishop immediately to denounce and adjudge him as an heretic.

Fourthly, That he had subscribed to a bill, wherein he affirmed, that in the sacrament, after the words of consecration be spoken by the priest, there remaineth still material bread and material wine; and that he believeth that the bread is the bread of thanksgiving, and the memorial of Christ's death; and that when he receiveth it, he receiveth the body of Christ spiritually in his soul, but material bread in substance.

Fifthly, That he had openly affirmed, and also advisedly spoken that which is contained in the said former fourth article above specified.

Sixthly, That he had spoken against the bishop of Rome, with the church and see of the same, and also against the seven sacraments and other ceremonies and ordinances of the same church, used then within this realm.

Seventhly, That he had allowed and commended the opinion and faith of Mr. Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, and others of late that were burned within this realm, and believed that their opinions were good and godly.

Eighthly, That he had divers times affirmed, that the religion used within this realm, at the time of his apprehension, was neither good nor agreeable to God's word, and that he could not conform himself thereunto.

Ninthly, That he had affirmed, that the book of common prayer, set forth in the reign of king Edward VI. was in all parts good and godly; and that the said Ralph and his fellow prisoners, did daily use amongst themselves in prison some part of the book.

Tenthly, That he had affirmed, that if he were out of prison he would not come to mass, mattins, nor even-song, nor bear taper, candle, nor palm, nor go in procession, nor would receive holy water, holy bread, aches, or pax, or any other ceremony of the church then used within this realm.

Eleventhly, That he had affirmed, that if he were at liberty he would not confess his sins to any priest, nor receive absolution of him: nor yet would receive the sacrament of the altar, as it was then used.

Twelfthly, That he had affirmed, that praying to saints, and praying for the dead, were neither good nor profitable, and that a man is not bound to fast and pray, but at his own will and pleasure; neither that it is lawful to reserve the sacrament, or to worship it.

Thirteenthly, That the said Allerton hath, according to these his affirmations, abstained and refused to come to his parish church ever since the tenth day of January last, or to use, receive, or allow any ceremonies, sacraments, or other rites then used in the church.

To all these articles he answered affirmatively, denying precisely none of them; saving to this clause contained in the twelfth article, that a man is not bound to fast and pray but at his own will and pleasure, he said that he had affirmed no such thing, but he confessed that he had not fasted nor prayed so oft as he was bound to do. And unto this answer he also subscribed in this sort.

Except it be proved otherwise by the holy scripture, I do affirm these articles to be true. By me,

RALPH ALLERTON.

The next examination was the fourth day of July; the act whereof, because they do appear more amply in his other examination, on the tenth of September, I here omit, giving you farther to understand, that on the seventh day of July, he was brought before Dr. Darbshire in the bishop's palace, who examined him again on the former articles, and after persuading him to recant, threatening him that otherwise he should be burned. To whom he boldly answered, I would I might be condemned even to-morrow; for I perceive my lord (meaning Bonner) doth nothing but seek men's blood. Upon which saying Dr. Darbshire committed him again to prison, and the tenth of September, the bishop caused him (with the other three above-named) to be brought unto Fulham, and there in his private chapel within his house, he judicially propounded unto him certain other new articles; of which, the tenor of the first, fifth, sixth, and seventh are already mentioned in the second, third, and fourth former objections: as for the rest, their contents here follow.

"Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that the information given against thee, and remaining now in the acts of this court of thine ordinary, Edmund bishop of London, was and is a true information."

This information was given by Thomas Tye, curate of Bentley (of whom you have already heard), and certain others of the same parish and affinity; as namely, John Painter, William Harris, John Barker, John Carter, Thomas Candeler, Jeffery Bestwood, John Richard, Richard Meer.

The effect whereof was, that one Laurence Edwards, of Bentley aforesaid, had a child that was unchristened, and being demanded by the said Tye, why the child was not baptized, he made answer it should be when he could find one of his religion (meaning a true professor of Christ's gospel). Whereat the curate said, Ah, you have had some instructor that hath schooled you of late. Yea, (quoth Edwards) that I have, and if your doctrine be better than his, then I will believe you; and thereupon fondly offered to fetch him.

Whereupon the constable going with him, they brought before the said curate the said Ralph Allerton; of whom in this information they make this report, that he was a seditious person, who since his coming down from the bishop, had set upon the constables doors seditious letters, moving and persuading thereby the people to follow his malicious disobedience; and that these his persuasions had taken effect in many: and farther, that the said Ralph Allerton (the curate asking him whether he had instructed this Laurence Edwards, that it was against God's commandment to enter into the church) casting his hands abroad, should say, Oh, good people, now is fulfilled the saying of the godly priest and prophet Esdras, who saith, Esdras iv. 16. "The fire of a multitude is kindled against a few; they have taken away their houses, and spoiled their goods," &c. Which of you hath not seen this, this day? who is here amongst you, that seeth not all these things done upon us this day? The church which they call us to, is the church of Antichrist, a persecuting church, and the church malignant. With these, and many more words (said they, most maliciously and falsely alledged out of the scriptures) he thus persuaded great multitudes there present (as much as in him lay) unto disobedience. For which cause the constables did then apprehend him.

3. Item, thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but the letter sent unto me by my lord Darcy, beginning with these words, [Pleaseth it your lordship, &c.] was thine own letter, and was subscribed by thine own hand.

The contents of the letter mentioned in this article, and written by Allerton unto the lord Darcy, was a confession of his demeanour before his first apprehension, the effect and purport whereof, because it appeareth in the beginning of this history, I do here omit.

4. Item, thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that the other letter, sent also to me from my said lord Darcy, beginning thus, [Pleaseth it your lordship, &c.] and ending with these words, [whensoever it be] is thine own letter, and subscribed with thine own hand.

This was also another letter written by him unto the lord Darcy, the contents whereof were, that where the said lord had commanded him to declare where he had been ever since Whitsuntide last before his first apprehension, this was to certify his lordship, that he was not able so to do, otherwise than as he had already shewed him by his former letters. And moreover, whereas he charged him to have read unto the people abroad in the woods, he certified him that he did never read any thing abroad, saving once when he was in the company of George Eagles, and others, Richard Roth took a writing out of his bosom, and desired the said Ralph to read read it, which request he then accomplished; and demanding of him whose doing the same was, the said Roth told that it was Mr. Cranmer's, late archbishop of Canterbury; and farther he could not shew him. Nevertheless, he was ready and willing to suffer such punishment as his lordship should think meet, desiring yet that the same might be with favour and mercy, although he feared neither punishment nor death: praying the Lord, that it might be in his fear, whensoever it should be.

8. Item, Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that the letters written with blood, beginning with these words, [Grace, mercy, and peace] and ending thus, [Farewel in God,] remaining now registered in the acts of this court, were written voluntarily with thine own hand.

He wrote this letter in the prison with blood for lack of other ink, and did mean to send the same unto Agnes Smith, alias Silver-side, at that time imprisoned, and afterwards burned at Colchester for the testimony of the gospel of Christ, as before mentioned. The copy of which letter here ensueth.

L E T T E R I.

From RALPH ALLERTON unto AGNES SMITH, Widow.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, with the assistance of God's Holy Spirit, and the abundant health both of soul and body, I wish unto you, as to my own soul, as God knoweth, who is the searcher of all secrets.

Forasmuch as it pleaseth almighty God of his infinite mercy, to call me to the state of grace, to suffer martyrdom for Jesus Christ's sake, although heretofore I have most negligently dallied therewith; and therefore far unworthy I am of such an high benefit, to be crowned with the most joyful crown of martyrdom: nevertheless, it hath pleased God not so to leave me, but hath raised me according to his promise, which saith, "Although he fall, yet shall he not be hurt: for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand, Psal. xxxvii." Wherefore we perceive God's election to be most sure, for undoubtedly he will preserve all those that are appointed to die. And as he hath begun this work in me, even so do I believe that he will finish the same, to his great glory, and to my wealth, through Jesus Christ, so be it.

Dearly beloved sister (I am constrained so to call you, because of your constant faith and love unfeigned), consider, that if we be the true servants of Christ, then may not we in any wise make agreement with his enemy Antichrist. For there is no concord and agreement between them, saith the scriptures, and a man cannot serve two masters, saith Christ. And also it is prefigured unto us in the old law, where the people of God were most straitly commanded that they should not mingle themselves with the ungodly heathen, and were also forbidden to eat, drink, or to marry with them. For as often as they did either marry unto their sons, or take their daughters unto them, or to their sons, even so often came the great and heavy wrath of God upon his own people, to overthrow both them and all their cities, with the holy sanctuary of God; and brought in strange princes to reign over them, and wicked rulers to govern them, so that they were sure of hunger, sword, pestilence, and wild beasts to devour them. Which plagues never ceased, until the good people of God were clean separated from the wicked idolatrous people.

Oh, dearly beloved, this was written for our learning, that we, through patience and comfort of the scriptures, might have hope. And is it not in like case happened now in this realm of England? For now are the people of God had in derision, and trodden under foot, and the cities, towns, and houses where they dwelt, are inhabited with them that have no right thereunto, and the true owners are spoiled of their labours: yea, and the holy sanctuary of God's most blessed word is laid desolate and waste, so that the very foxes run over it, &c. yet is it the food of our souls; the lantern of our feet, and the light unto our paths; and where it is not preached, the people perish. But the prophet saith, "He that refraineth himself from evil, must be spoiled, Isai. lix." Why should men then be ashamed to be spoiled, seeing that it is told us before, that it must so happen unto them that refrain from evil? And thus I bid you farewell in God.

RALPH ALLERTON.

Item, Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that the letter written with blood, beginning with these words in the over part thereof, [The angel of God, &c.] and ended thus, [Be with you, Amen,] and having also this postscript [Do ye suppose that our brethren, &c.] remaining now registered in the acts of this court, is thine own hand writing.

9. For the better understanding of this article, I have also inserted the copy of the letter mentioned in the same; which letter he wrote (by his own confession) unto Richard Roth, then in danger of the subtle snares of that bloody wolf Bonner.

L E T T E R II.

From RALPH ALLERTON unto RICHARD ROTH, his Fellow Martyr.

THE angel of God pitch his tent about us, and defend us all in our ways, Amen, Amen.

O dear brother, I pray for you: for I hear say, that you have been divers times before my lord in examination. Wherefore take heed for God's sake what the wise man teacheth you, and shrink not away when you are enticed to confess an untruth, for hope of life, but be ready always to give an answer of the hope that is in you. For whosoever confesseth Christ before men, him will Christ also confess before his Father. But he that is ashamed to confess him before men, shall have his reward with them that do deny him. And therefore, dear brother, go forward: you have a ready way, so fair as ever had any of the prophets or apostles, or the rest of our brethren, the holy martyrs of God. Therefore covet to go hence with the multitude while the way is full. Also (dear brother) understand that I have seen your letter, and although I cannot read it perfectly, yet I partly perceive your meaning therein, and very gladly I would copy it out, with certain comfortable additions thereunto annexed. The which as yet will not be brought to pass for lack of paper, until my lord be gone from hence, and then your request shall be accomplished, God willing without delay. Thus fare you well in God. Our dear brother and fellow in tribulation, Robert Allin, saluteth you, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with you, Amen.

RALPH ALLERTON.

P. S. Do you suppose that our brethren and sisters are not yet dispatched out of this world? I think that either they are dead, or shall be within these two days.

And for the other objection yet remaining, and not specified, if it were not more somewhat to shew the folly of these bloody tyrants (which of so small trifles take occasion to quarrel with the saints of God) than for any weighty thing therein contained, I would neither trouble you with the reading thereof, nor yet myself with writing. But that you may judge of them as their actions do give occasion, I will now proceed in the matter.

Item, Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but confesseth, that the writing of letters in a little piece of paper on both sides of it, with this sentence following on the one side, "Look at the foot of the stocks for a knife," and the following sentence on the other side, "Look between the post and the wall for two books and two epistles, leave them here when you go," remaining now in the register and acts of this court, is voluntarily written by thee, Ralph Allerton, with thine own hand.

Item, Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that that thou art privy to a certain writing, remaining now in the register and acts of this court, the beginning whereof is with these words, "I would have men wife," &c. and ending thus, "From house to house."

Item, Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that thou art privy, and by consent and maintenance, to a certain great wood-knife, a long sword, a hook, a stone, and a trencher written upon with chalk, having this sentence, "All is gone and lost, because of your folly:" also of two boards written upon with chalk, the one having this sentence, "Under the stone look:" and the other having this sentence, "Whereas you bid me take heed, I thank you, I trust in God that I shall be at peace with him shortly:" remaining now registered in the acts of this court.

For answer unto all these articles, he granted that the first nine were true, as the register recordeth. Howbeit, I find noted in the backside of the information, specified in the second article (although crossed out again), that he denied such things as were there on information against him. Therefore it is not likely that he did simply grant the contents of the second article, but that he only affirmed, that such an information was given against him, and not that the same was true.

Thus much I thought to acquaint the reader of, lest in mistaking his answers, it might seem that he granted himself to be a seditious and a rebellious person; of which fact he was both clear and innocent. And being farther demanded upon the contents of the eighth article, where he had the blood he wrote that letter withal? He said, that Richard Roth, sometime fellow-prisoner with him, did make his nose bleed, and thereby he got the blood wherewith he did then write. The bishop again asked him, to whom he would have sent the same. He answered, Unto one Agnes Smith, alias Silverfide, of Colchester. Why (says the bishop) Agnes Smith was an heretic, and burnt for heresy. Nay, said Allerton, she is in better case than I myself, or any of us all. And being again demanded, upon the ninth objection, to whom he would have sent the letter mentioned in the same: he answered, that he intended to have sent it unto Richard Roth, at that time separated from him. Whereupon the bishop farther inquired, what he meant by these words, "Brethren and sisters," specified in the said letter? He answered, that he meant thereby, such as were lately condemned at Colchester, and were like (at the writing thereof) shortly to be burned. As for the contents of the tenth and eleventh articles, he utterly denied them. But to the twelfth, he confessed, that he wrote upon the said trencher and other boards, the words mentioned in the said article, and that he did leave the same in the prison-house, to the intent that Richard Roth should read them. Bonner also bringing out the wooden sword, mentioned in the said articles, asked him who made it, and for what purpose. Whereunto he answered, that he was the maker thereof, howbeit for no evil purpose. But being idle in the prison, and finding there an old board, he thought the time better spent in making thereof, than to sit and do nothing at all.

The forenoon being now spent, the rest of this tragedy was deferred till the afternoon. Wherein was ministered unto him yet certain other objections, the tenor whereof was,

First, that he had misliked the mass, calling upon saints, and carrying the cross in procession, with other ceremonies, calling them idolatry, and also had dissuaded them therefrom.

2. Item, That he was much desirous to have the people believe as he did; and therefore being in prison with his fellows, did sing psalms and other songs against the sacrament of the altar, and other ordinances of the church, so loud that the people abroad might hear them and delight in them.

3. Item, That he had divers times conspired against his keeper, and had provided things to kill him, and so to break the prison and escape away.

4. That he had railed against the bishop, being his ordinary, calling him a bloody butcher, tyrant, and ravening wolf, and also against his officers, especially Cluny, his sumner, calling him butcher's cur, with other such names.

5. Item, That he had murmured, grudged, disdained, and misliked, that the bishop had proceeded against some of his diocese, and had condemned them as heretics, or that he should proceed now against him and others yet remaining in errors, notwithstanding that he and his chaplains had charitably admonished and exhorted them from the same.

6. Item, That he ought faithfully to believe, that there is one catholic church, without which there is no salvation; of which church Jesus Christ is the very priest and sacrifice, whose body and blood is really and truly contained in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine; the bread and wine being by the divine power transubstantiated into his body and blood.

7. Item, That he had kept himself, and also distributed to others, certain heretical and corrupt books, condemned and reproved by the laws of this realm.

8. Item, That he had, contrary to the orders and statutes of this realm, kept company with that seditious heretic and traitor, George Eagles, commonly called Trudge-over, and had heard him read in woods and other places, yet not accusing, but allowing and praising him.

Unto which articles, because they were for the most part foolish and full of lies, he would in a manner make no answer, saving he granted, that he misliked their mass and other ceremonies, because they were wicked and naught. And moreover, he told the bishop, that he and his accomplices did nothing but seek how to kill innocents.

The bishop then asked him, whether he would believe in all points touching the sacrament of the altar, as is contained in the general council holden and kept under Innocent the Third, and therewithal he did read the decree of the said council concerning the sacrament.

Whereupon Allerton again made answer and said, I believe nothing contained in the same council, neither have I any thing to do therewith; and it were also very necessary, that no man else should have to do therewith.

Then (quoth Bonner) thou art of the opinion that the heretics lately burnt at Colchester were of.

Yea, said he, I am of their opinion, and I believe that they are saints in heaven.

This done, the bishop perceiving that he would not recant, demanded what he had to say, why he should not pronounce the sentence of condemnation against him. To whom he answered, You ought not to condemn me as an heretic, for I am a good christian. But now go to, do as you have already determined: for I see right well, that right and truth is suppressed and cannot appear upon the earth.

These words ended, the bishop pronounced the sentence of condemnation, and so delivered him to the temporal officers: who kept him in their custody till the 17th of September, at which time, both he and the other three before mentioned, were all burned, as you have already heard. Of which other three, because as yet little is said, I will therefore now proceed to declare such cause of their cruel deaths, as in the register is recorded.

An Account of JAMES AUSTOO, and MARGERY his Wife:

I Cannot find why these two persons were first apprehended; howbeit, as the days then served, it was no hard or strange matter to fall into the hands of such, as with cruelty persecuted the true professors of God's gospel, especially having so many promoters, and unkind neighbours to help them forwards. By which kind of people, it is not unlike these two godly yoke-fellows were accused and taken: and being once delivered into the merciless hands of Bonner, their examinations (ye may be sure) were not long deferred. For the 16th of July, 1557, they were brought before him at London; where where first he demanded of the said James Austoo (amongst other questions) where he had been confessed in Lent, and whether he received the sacrament of the altar at Easter, or not?

To whom he answered, that indeed he had been confessed of the curate of Allhallows Barking, nigh to the Tower of London, but that he had not received the sacrament of the altar; for he defied it from the bottom of his heart.

Why (quoth the bishop) dost thou not believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, there is the true body and blood of Christ?

No, said Austoo, not in the sacrament of the altar, but in the supper of the Lord, to the faithful receiver is the very body and blood of Christ by faith.

Bonner, not well pleased with this talk, asked then the wife, how she liked the religion then used in the church of England?

She answered, that she believed, that the same was not according to God's word, but false and corrupted, and that they which did go thereunto, did it more for fear of the law, than otherwise.

Then he again asked her, if she would go to the church and hear mass, and pray for the prosperous estate of the king, being then abroad on his affairs.

Whereunto she said, that she defied the mass with all her heart, and that she would not come into any church wherein were idols.

After this the bishop objected unto them certain articles, to the number of eighteen. The tenor whereof (because they touch only such common and trifling matters as are already mentioned in divers places before) I do here for brevity's sake omit and pass over; giving you yet thus much to understand, that in the matters of faith they were as sound, and answered as truly as ever any did, especially the woman, to whom the Lord had given the greater knowledge, and more fervency of spirit. Notwithstanding, according to the measure of grace that God gave them, they both stood most firmly unto the truth. And therefore to conclude, the 10th day of September they were (with Ralph Allerton) brought again before the bishop within his chapel at Fulham, where he speaking unto them, said first on this wife; Austoo, dost thou know where thou art now, and in what place, and before whom, and what thou hast to do?

Yea, quoth Austoo, I know where I am; for I am in an idol's temple.

After which words, their articles being again read, and their constancy in faith perceived, Bonner pronounced against either of them severally the sentence of condemnation, and delivering them unto the sheriff there present, did rid his hands (as he thought) of them; but the Lord in the end will judge that: to whom I refer his cause.

An Account of RICHARD ROTH.

IN the godly fellowship of the forenamed three martyrs, was also this Richard Roth, as is already specified; who being apprehended and brought up unto the bishop of London, was by him examined the fourth day July, at which time the bishop earnestly persuaded him to believe that there were seven sacraments in Christ's church, and that in the sacraments of the altar (after the words of consecration duly spoken) there remained the very substance of Christ's body and blood, and none other. Whereunto (at that present) he made only this answer; that if the scripture did so teach him, and that he might be by the same so persuaded, he would so believe, otherwise not. But at another examination (which was the 9th of September) he declared plainly, that in the said sacrament of the altar, as it was then used, there was not the very body and blood of Christ, but that it was a dead god, and that the mass was detestable, and contrary to God's holy word and will, from which faith and opinion he would not go or decline.

The next day, being the tenth of the said month, the bishop, at his house at Fulham (by way of an article), laid and objected against him, That he was a comforter and supporter of heretics; and therefore had written a letter to that effect unto several that were burned at Colchester; the copy whereof followeth.

A LETTER

O Dear brethren and sisters, how much reason have you to rejoice in God, that he hath given you such faith to overcome this blood-thirsty tyrant thus far? And no doubt he that hath begun that good work in you, will fulfil it unto the end. O dear hearts in Christ, what a crown of glory shall ye receive with Christ in the kingdom of God? O that it had been the good will of God that I had been ready to have gone with you. For I lie in my lord's Little-chase in the day, and in the night I lie in the Coal-house, from Ralph Allerton, or any other: and we look every day when we shall be condemned. For he said, that I should be burned within ten days before Easter; but I lie still at the pool's brink, and every man goeth in before me; but we abide patiently the Lord's leisure, with many bonds, in fetters and stocks; by which we have received great joy of God. And now fare you well, dear brethren and sisters, in this world, but I trust to see you in the heavens face to face.

Oh, brother Munt, with your wife and my sister Rose, how blessed are you in the Lord, that God hath found you worthy to suffer for his sake! with all the rest of my dear brethren and sisters known and unknown. O be joyful even unto death. Fear it not, faith Christ, for I have overcome death. Oh dear hearts, seeing that Jesus Christ will be our help, oh tarry you the Lord's leisure. Be strong, let your hearts be of good comfort, and wait you still for the Lord. He is at hand. Yea, the angel of the Lord pitcheth his tent round about them that fear him, and delivereth them which way he seeth best. For our lives are in the Lord's hands; and they can do nothing unto us before God suffer them. Therefore give all thanks to God.

O dear hearts, you shall be clothed in long white garments upon the mount of Sion, with the multitude of saints, and with Jesus Christ our Saviour, which will never forsake us. O blessed virgins, ye have played the wise virgins' part, in that you have taken oil in your lamps, that ye may go in with the bridegroom, when he cometh, into the everlasting joy with him. But as for the foolish, they shall be shut out, because they made not themselves ready to suffer with Christ, neither go about to take up his cross. Oh dear hearts, how precious shall your death be in the sight of the Lord! For dear is the death of his saints. O fare you well, and pray. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all, Amen, Amen. Pray, pray, pray.

Written by me, with my own blood,

RICHARD ROTH.

This letter he confessed indeed (upon the said examination) that he had written with his blood, and that he meant to have sent the same unto such as were condemned at Colchester for the gospel of Jesus Christ, and were afterwards burned there, as you have already heard.

The bishop then farther asked him, what he thought his fellow-prisoner, Ralph Allerton, to be.

He answered, that he thought him to be one of the elect children of God; and that if at any time hereafter he happened to be put to death for his faith and religion, he thought he should die a true martyr. And moreover, finding himself grieved with the bishop's privy and secret condemning of God's people, he said unto him in this sort: My lord, because the people should not see and behold your doings, you cause me and others to be brought to our examinations by night, being afraid to do it by day.

The bishop not much minding his talk, proceeded to examine him of other matters, amongst which this high and weighty thing was one, How he did like the order and rites of the church then used here in England.

To whom he said, That he ever had, and yet then did abhor the same with all his heart.

Then divers of the bishop's accomplices intreated and persuaded him to recant, and crave mercy of the bishop.

No (quoth Ralph), I will not ask mercy of him that cannot give it. Whereupon he was (as the rest before-mentioned) condemned and delivered unto the sheriff, and the 17th day of September they all most joyfully ended their lives in one fire at Islington, for the testimony of Christ.

The Martyrdom of AGNES BONGEOR, and MARGARET THURSTON, two pious Women, burnt at Colchester, for the sincere Profession of Christ's Gospel.

A Little before (gentle reader) mention was made of ten that suffered martyrdom at Colchester; at which time there were also two other women, one called Margaret Thurston, and the other Agnes Bongeor, that should have suffered with them, and were likewise condemned at the same time and place, for the like cause with the other ten before-mentioned, and answered also in their examinations to the same effect as the other did. But the one, namely Margaret Thurston, the morning she should suffer with those that went from the castle, was for that time deferred. What the cause was, the testimony of Joan Cook shall declare unto us. Which Joan Cook, now the wife of John Spark, being then in the castle of Colchester for religion, did demand of this Margaret Thurston, whose husband died in prison, being imprisoned for religion, wherefore the said Margaret, being a condemned woman, should be reserved when the others suffered in the castle Bailly? She answered, That it was not for any fear of death; but being prepared, as the rest were that suffered the same day, she was taken with a great shivering and trembling of the flesh: whereupon, forsaking the company, she went aside to pray; and whilst she was a praying, she thought she was lifted up by a mighty wind that came round about her. Even at that instant came in the gaoler and company with him, and whilst she turned herself to fetch her psalter, they took the other prisoners and left her alone. Shortly after she was moved out of the castle, and put into the town-prison, where she continued until Friday seven-night after her company were burnt. That day, not two hours before her death, she was brought to the castle again, where she declared thus much to the aforefaid Joan Cook.

The other, named Agnes Bongeor, who should have suffered in like manner with the six that went out of Mote-hall, was also kept back at that time, but not in like sort, because her name was wrong written within the writ.

The same morning, the second of August, that the said six in Mote-hall were called out to go to their martyrdom, Agnes Bongeor was also called with them, by the name of Agnes Bower. Wherefore the bailiffs, understanding her to be wrong named within the writ, commanded the said Agnes Bongeor to prison again, as you have heard in the letter before-mentioned, and so that day sent her from Mote-hall to the castle, where she remained till her death.

But when she saw herself separated from her fellow-prisoners in such a manner, oh! what piteous complaints that good woman made; how bitterly she wept, what strange thoughts came into her mind, how naked and desolate she esteemed herself, and to what a plunge of despair and care her poor soul was brought, it was both sad and moving to behold; and all because she went not with them to give up her life for the cause of Christ; for of all things in the world, life was the least thing that she expected. For the morning, on which she was kept back from burning, she had put on a smock that she had prepared only for that purpose. And also having a child, a little young infant suckling on her, whom she kept with her tenderly all the time she was in prison, that day likewise did she send away to another nurse, and prepared herself presently to give herself for the testimony of the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ. So little did she look for life, and so greatly did God's gifts work in her above nature, that death seemed much better welcome than life. But this took not effect at that time as she thought it would; and therefore (as I said) she was greatly troubled.

Being in this great perplexity of mind, a friend of her's came to her, and required to know whether Abraham's obedience was accepted before God, for that he did sacrifice his son Isaac, or in that he would have offered him? Unto which she answered thus:

I know, said she, that Abraham's will before God was allowed for the deed, in that he would have done it, if the angel of the Lord had not stayed him: but I (said she) am unhappy, the Lord thinketh me not worthy of this dignity, and therefore Abraham's case and mine is not alike.

Why then, said her friend, would you not willingly have gone with your company, if God should so have suffered it?

Yes, said she, that I would with all my heart, and because I did not, it is now my chief and greatest grief.

Then, said her friend, my dear sister, I pray thee consider Abraham and thyself well, and thou shalt see thou dost nothing differ with him in will at all.

Alas, said she, there is a far greater matter in Abraham than in me; for Abraham was tried with the offering of his own child, but so am not I; and therefore our cases are not alike.

Good sister, said her friend, weigh the matter but indifferently. Abraham, I grant, would have offered his son: and have not you done the like in your little sucking babe? But consider further than this, my good sister (said he), where Abraham was commanded but to offer his son, you are heavy and grieved because you offer not yourself, which goeth somewhat more near you than Abraham's obedience did; and therefore before God, assuredly, is no less accepted and allowed in his holy presence; which further the preparing of your shroud also doth argue full well, &c. After which talk between them, she began a little to stay herself; and gave her whole exercise to reading and prayer, wherein she found a great deal of comfort.

During the time that these aforefaid two good women were prisoners, one in the castle, and the other in Mote-hall, God by a secret means called the said Margaret Thurston unto his truth again; who having her eyes opened by the working of his Spirit, did greatly sorrow and lament her backsliding before, and promised faithfully to the Lord in hope of his mercies, never more while she lived to do the like again, but that she would constantly stand to the confession of the same, against all the adversaries of the cross of Christ. After which promise made, came in a short time a writ from London for the burning of them, which was accordingly executed the 17th day of September, in the year aforefaid.

Now when these aforefaid women were brought to the place at Colchester, where they should suffer, they fell down upon their knees, and made their humble prayers to God, which being done, they rose and went to the stake joyfully, and were immediately chained thereto, and after the fire had compassed them about, they with great joy and glorious triumph gave up their souls, spirits, and lives, into the hands of the Lord, under whose government and protection, for Christ's sake, we beseech him to grant us his holy defence and help for evermore, Amen.

An Account of JOHN KURDE, Martyr.

IN the story before, something was mentioned of a certain shoemaker suffering at Northampton, being un-named; yet, because we understand by a letter sent from from the said parties, that he suffered in this year, 1557, and in the month of September, we therefore thought to place him there. His name was John Kurde, a shoemaker, late of the parish of Syrfam, in Northamptonshire, who was imprisoned in Northampton castle for denying the popish transubstantiation, for which cause William Binsley, bachelor of law, and chancellor unto the bishop of Peterborough, and now archdeacon of Northampton, did pronounce sentence of death against the said Kurde, in the church of All-Saints, in Northampton, in August 1557, and in September following, at the commandment of Sir Thomas Tresham, sheriff then of the shire, he was led by his officers without the North-gate of Northampton, and in the stone pits was burned. A popish priest standing by, whose name was John Rote, vicar of St. Giles's, in Northampton, did declare unto him, that if he would recant, he was authorised to give him his pardon. His answer was, that he had his pardon by Jesus Christ, &c.

An Account of the apprehending of JOHN NOYES, of Laxefield, in the County of Suffolk, Shoemaker, April 19, 1557.

IN the month of September this present year, or (as some report) in the year past, suffered the blessed martyr, John Noyes, whose story here followeth.

First, Mr. Thomas Lovel, being then chief constable of Hoxton Hundred, in the county aforesaid, and one John Jacob, and William Stannard, then being under-constables of the aforesaid town of Laxefield, and Wolfren Dowling, and Nicholas Stannard, of the same town, being then accounted faithful and catholic christians, though undoubtedly they proved most cruel hinderers of the true professors of Christ and his gospel, with others, were commanded to be that present day before the justices, whose names were Mr. Thurston, sir John Tyrrel, and Mr. Kene, and sir Jo. Silliard being high sheriff.

These sitting at Hoxton, in the county of Suffolk, aforesaid, and there the said townsmen aforesaid, having commandment of the said justices to inquire in their town if there were any that would neglect to come to their service and mass, further to examine the cause why they would not come, and thereupon to bring the true certificate to the said justices within fourteen days then next ensuing; they then coming homeward, being full of hatred against the truth, and desirous to get promotion, without any such commandment of the justices (as far as we can learn), took counsel one with another how to attach the said John Noyes without any more delay.

This devilish enterprize agreed upon, chiefly through the counsel of Mr. Thomas Lovel, Wolfren Dowling, and Nicholas Stannard, aforesaid, with expedition his house was beset on both sides. This done, they found the said John Noyes, in the backside of the said house, going out, and Nicholas Stannard called to the said John, and said, Whither goest thou? and he said, To see some of my neighbours. And the said Nicholas Stannard said, Your master hath deceived you; you must go with us now. But the said John Noyes answered, No, but take you heed your master deceive not you. And so they took him and carried him to the justices the next day. After his appearance and sundry causes alledged, the justices and the sheriff together cast him into Eye-dungeon, and there he lay a certain time; and then was carried from thence to Norwich, and so came before the bishop, where were ministered unto him these positions following:

First, Whether he believed that the ceremonies used in the church were good and godly, to stir up men's minds to devotion.

2. Item, Whether he believed the pope to be supreme head of the church here on earth.

3. Item, Whether he believed the body of our Lord Jesus Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar under the forms of bread and wine, after the words of consecration.

Whereunto he answered, That he thought the natural body of Christ to be only in heaven, and not in the sacrament, &c.

For which, sentence at last was read by the bishop against him, in the presence of these there sitting the same time, Dr. Dunning, chancellor, sir W. Woodhouse, sir Thomas Woodhouse, Mr. George Heyden, Mr. Spencer, W. Farrar, alderman of Norwich, Mr. Thurston, Mr. Winefsden, with divers others.

No more of his examination than this came to our hands.

In the mean time his brother-in-law, Nicholas Fisk, of Dinnington, going to comfort him at such time as he remained in the Guildhall of Norwich, after christian exhortation, asked him if he did fear death when the bishop gave judgment against him, considering the terror of the same; and the said Noyes answered, he thanked God he feared death no more at that time, than he or any other did, being at liberty. Then the said Nicholas required of him to shew the cause of his condemnation. Upon which request the said John Noyes wrote with his own hands as follows.

I said, That I could not believe, that in the sacrament of the altar there is the natural body of Christ, that same body that was born of the virgin Mary. But I said, that the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ is received by christian people in the remembrance of Christ's death, as a spiritual food, if it be ministered according to Christ's institution.

But they said, That I could not tell what spiritual meant.

The bishop said, That the sacrament was God, and must be worshipped as God. So said the chancellor also.

Then answered I, and said, My lord, I cannot so believe.

Then said the bishop, Why? Then say thou dost believe. Notwithstanding, these collusions could not prevail.

Now being condemned, he was sent again from Norwich to Eye-prison, and about the 21st day of September, about midnight, he was brought from Eye to Laxefield, to be burned; and on the next morning was brought to the stake, where were waiting for his coming, the aforesaid justice, Mr. Thurston, one Mr. Waller, being then under-sheriff, and Mr. Thomas Lovell, high constable, as is before expressed; who commanded men to make ready all things meet for this sinful purpose. Now the fires in most houses of the street were put out, saving that a smoak was espied by the said Thomas Lovell, proceeding out from the top of a chimney, to which house the sheriff and Grannow his man went, and brake open the door, and thereby got fire, and brought the same to the place of execution. When John Noyes came to the place where he should be burned, he kneeled down and said the 50th Psalm, with other prayers, and then they making haste bound him to the stake, and being bound, the said John Noyes said, "Fear not them that can kill the body, but fear him that can kill both body and soul, and cast it into everlasting fire."

When he saw his sister weeping and making moan for him, he told her that she should not weep for him, but weep for her sins.

Then one Nicholas Cadman brought a faggot and set against him; and the said John Noyes took up the faggot and kissed it, and said, Blessed be the time that ever I was born to come to this.

Then he delivered his psalter to the under-sheriff, desiring him to be good to his wife and children, and to deliver to her that same book; and the sheriff promised him that he would, notwithstanding he never performed his promise. Then the said John Noyes said to the people, They say they can make God of a piece of bread, believe them not.

Then said he, Good people, bear witness that I do believe to be saved by the merits and passion of Jesus Christ, and not by mine own deeds; and so the fire was kindled, and burning about him, he then said, Lord, have mercy upon me. Christ have mercy upon me. Son of David have mercy upon me.

And so he yielded up his life, and when his body was burned, they made a pit to bury the coals and ashes, and amongst the same they found one of his feet that was unburned, whole up to the ankle with the hose on, and that they buried with the rest.

Now while he was burning, there stood by one John Jarvis, a servant in the same town, a plain fellow, who said, Good Lord, how the sinews of his arms shrink up. And there stood behind him Grannow and Benet, the sheriff's men, and they told their master, that John Jarvis said, What villainous wretches are these? And their master ordered them to apprehend him, and they took him and pinioned him, and carried him before the justice that same day, and the justice did examine him of the words afore said, but he denied them, and answered that he said nothing but this, Good Lord, how the sinews of his arms shrink up. But for all this the justice did bind his father and his master in 5l. a piece, that he should be forthcoming at all times. And on the Wednesday following, he was brought again before the justices, Mr. Thurston and Mr. Kene, sitting at Fressingfield, Hoxton Hundred, and there they did appoint and command, that the said John Jarvis should be set in the stocks the next market-day, and whipt about the market naked. But his master, one William Jarvis, did after crave friendship of the constables, and they did not set him in the stocks till Sunday morning, and in the afternoon they did whip him about the market with a dog-whip, having three cords, and so they let him go.

A L E T T E R

From JOHN NOYES to his Wife, to comfort her at such Time as he lay in Prison.

WIFE, you desired me that I would send you some tokens that you might remember me. As I did read in the New Testament, I thought it good to write unto you certain places of the scripture for a remembrance. St. Peter saith, 1 Pet. iv. "Dearly beloved, be not troubled with this heat that is now come among you to try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you, but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory appeareth ye may be merry and glad. If ye be railed on for the name of Christ, happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory, and the Spirit of God resteth upon you."

"It is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing than for evil doing."

"See that none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or an evil doer, or as a busy body in other men's matters; but if any man suffer as a christian man, let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God in this behalf; for the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God. If it first begin with us, what shall the end of them be, that believe not the gospel of God? Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God, commit their souls unto him in well doing."

St. Paul saith, 2 Tim. iii. "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution."

St. John saith, 1 John ii. "See that ye love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, as the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world, which vanisheth away and the lust thereof, but he that fulfilleth the will of God abideth for ever."

St. Paul saith, Col. iii. "If ye be risen again with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection on things that are above, and not on things which are on earth."

Our Saviour Christ saith, Matt. xviii. "Whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were cast into the sea."

The prophet David saith, Psal. xxxiv. "Great are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of all."

"Fear the Lord, ye faints: for they that fear him lack nothing."

"When the righteous cry, the Lord heareth them, and delivereth them out of all their troubles: but misfortune shall slay the ungodly, and they that hate the righteous shall perish."

"Hear, O my people. I assure thee, O Israel, if thou wilt hearken unto me, there shall no strange god be in thee, neither shalt thou worship any other God. Oh that my people would obey me: for if Israel would walk in my ways, I should soon put down their enemies, and turn mine hand against thine adversaries."

Our Saviour Christ saith, "The disciple is not above the master, nor yet the servant above his lord. It is enough for the disciple to be as his master is, and that the servant be as his lord is. If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household so? fear not them therefore."

St. Paul saith, 2 Cor. iv. "Set yourselves there at large, and bear not a stranger's yoke with the unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? what company hath light with darkness? or what part hath the believer with the infidel? &c. wherefore come out from among them, and separate yourselves now (saith the Lord), and touch no unclean thing; so will I receive you, and I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

"For neither eye hath seen, nor the ear hath heard, neither can it enter into the heart of man what good things the Lord hath prepared for them that love him." 1 Cor. ii.

"Ye are bought neither with silver nor gold, but with the precious blood of Christ," 1 Pet. i.

"There is none other name given to men wherein we must be saved," Acts iv.

So fare ye well, wife and children; and leave worldly care, and see you be diligent to pray.

"Take no thought, (saith Christ, Matt. vi.) saying, What shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or wherewith shall we be clothed? (for after all these things seek the Gentiles) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things, but seek ye first the kingdom of heaven, and the righteousness thereof, and all these things shall be ministered unto you."

The Martyrdom of CICELY ORMES, at Norwich.

ABOUT the 23d day of the said month of September, next after the others above-mentioned, suffered at Norwich, Cicely Ormes, wife of Edmund Ormes, worsted-weaver, dwelling in St. Laurence parish in Norwich: she being of the age of twenty-two, or more, was taken at the death of Simon Miller and Elizabeth Cooper above-mentioned, in a place called Lollard's Pit, without Bishopsgate, at the said Norwich, for that she said that she would pledge them of the same cup that they drank of. For so saying, one Mr. Corbet, of Sprowson, by Norwich, took her and sent her to the chancellor. When she came before him, he asked her what she said unto the sacrament of Christ's body? And she said, she did believe that it was the sacrament of the body of Christ. Yea, said the chancellor, but what is that that the priest holdeth over his head? she answered him and said, It is bread: and if you make it any better, it is worse. At which words the chancellor sent her to the bishop's prison, to the keeper called Fellow, with many threatenings and hot words, as a man being in great rage.

The 23d of July she was called before the chancellor again, who sat in judgment with Mr. Bridges and others. The chancellor offered her, if she would go to the church and keep her tongue, she should be at liberty, and believe as she would. But she told him she would not consent to his wicked desire therein, do with her what he would; for if she should, she said, God would surely plague her. Then the chancellor told her, he had shewed more favour to her, than ever he did to any, and that he was loth to condemn her, considering that she was an ignorant, unlearned, and foolish woman. But she, not weighing his words, told him, if he did, he should not be so desirous of her sinful flesh, as she would (by God's grace) be content to give it in so good a quarrel. Then he rose and read the bloody sentence of condemnation against her, and so delivered her to the secular care of the sheriffs of the city, Mr. Thomas Sutherton, and Mr. Leonard Sutherton, brethren, who immediately carried her to the Guildhall in Norwich, where she remained until her death.

This Cicely Ormes was a very simple woman, but yet zealous in the Lord's cause, being born in East Deram, and was the daughter of one Thomas Haund, taylor. She was taken the 5th day of July, and did for a twelve-month before she was taken recant, but never after was she quiet in conscience, until she was utterly driven from all their popery. Between the time that she recanted, and that she was taken, she had got a letter written to give to the chancellor, to let him know that she repented her recantation from the bottom of her heart, and would never do the like again while she lived. But before she exhibited her bill, she was taken and sent to prison as is before said. She was burnt the 23d of September, between seven and eight in the morning, the said two sheriffs being there, and to the number of two hundred people. When she came to the stake, she kneeled down, and made her prayers to God: that being done, she rose up and said, Good people, I believe in God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, three persons and one God.

This do I not, nor will I recant; but I recant utterly from the bottom of my heart the doings of the pope of Rome, and all his popish priests I utterly refuse, and never will have to do with them again, by God's grace. And, good people, I would you should not think of me, that I believe to be saved in that I offer myself here unto the death of the Lord's cause, but I believe to be saved by the death and passion of Christ; and this my death is and shall be a witness of my faith unto all here present. Good people, as many of you that believe as I believe, pray for me.

Then she came to the stake, and laid her hand on it, and said, "Welcome the cross of Christ." Which being done, she looked on her hand, and seeing it blacked with the stake, she wiped it upon her smock, for she was burnt at the same stake that Simon Miller and Elizabeth Cooper were. Then after she had touched it with her hand, she came and kissed it, and said, "Welcome the sweet cross of Christ," and so gave herself to be bound thereto. After the tormentors had kindled the fire to her, she said, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit rejoiceth in God my Saviour:" and in saying so she set her hands together right against her breast, casting her eyes and head upward, and so stood, heaving up her hands by little and little, till the very sinews of her arms did break asunder, and then they fell; but she yielded her life unto God, as quietly as if she had been in a slumber, or as one feeling no pain; so wonderfully did the Lord work with her; his name therefore be praised evermore. Amen.

After the death and martyrdom of Mrs. Joyce Lewes, a little above specified, divers good men and women in the same town of Litchfield, were had up before the bishop and his chancellor, for kissing the said Joyce Lewes and drinking with her about the time of her death; the names of which persons were these; John Love, Elizabeth Smith, Margaret Biddle, Helen Boring, Margaret Cotesfore, Nicholas Bird, John Haristone and his wife, Agnes Glyn, Agnes Glover, Agnes Penifather, &c. These with others were produced to their examination before the bishop and his chancellor for the cause above-named, and therefore adjudged for heretics, because they did pray and drink with the said

Mrs. Lewes, but especially Agnes Penifather sustained the most trouble, for that she accompanied the said Joyce Lewes going to her death. Which Agnes being examined further of the said bishop, what words she had spoken to two priests of the church of Litchfield, called John Ady and James Fox, concerning the said Joyce Lewes after her burning, said as followeth, That she being asked by the said two priests being at her father's house in the city of Litchfield, at such time as she came from the burning of the said Joyce Lewes, why she the said Agnes did weep for such an heretic, meaning Joyce Lewes, whose soul they said was in hell; the said Agnes Penifather to their demand made this answer, That she thought the said blessed martyr to be in better case than the said two priests were.

With which words being charged, and desired to submit herself as the others had done above, rehearsed to such penance as they should enjoin unto her, she refused so to do, and therefore was commanded to close prison, the sheriffs being charged with her under pain of an hundred pounds, that none should have any access unto her. At length, at the persuasion of her friends, she was compelled to do as the others had done before. And thus much concerning things done at Litchfield.

And now from Litchfield we come to Chichester, although we have but little to report thereof, for want of certain relation and records of that county, yet it seemeth no little trouble and persecution have there raged also, as in other countries. For what place was there almost in all the realm, where the pope's ministers did not bestir them, murdering some or other, as in the acts of this ecclesiastical history may sufficiently appear? Wherefore as this plague of the pope's tyranny was general to all other people and counties of England, so likewise in the diocese of Chichester, divers and many there were condemned and martyred for the true testimony of righteousness within the compass of queen Mary's reign. In the number of whom were these: John Foreman, of Estgrenested; John Warner, of Berne; Christian Grover, of the archdeaconry of Lewes; Thomas Athoth, priest; Thomas Avington, of Erdingly; Dennis Burgis, of Buxsted; Thomas Ravensdale, of Rye; John Milles, of Hellinginglegh; Nicholas Holden, of Withiam; John Hart, of Withiam; Margery Morice, of Hethfield; Anne Try, of Estgrenested; John Oseward, of Woodman-cote; Thomas Harland, of Woodman-cote; James Morice of Hethfield; Thomas Dougate, of Estgrenested; John Ashedon, of Katherfield.

The greatest actors against these faithful martyrs were these: Christopheron, the bishop of Chichester, Richard Briefly, doctor of law, and chancellor of Chichester, Robert Taylor, bachelor of the law, his deputy, Thomas Piccard, civilian, Anthony Clarke, Albane Longdale, bachelor of divinity, &c.

THE bishop's chancellor asked me, if I had been before the priest, and confessed my sins unto him?

And I said, No, I had confessed my sins to God, and God saith, in what hour soever a sinner repenteth and is sorry for his sins, and asketh forgiveness, willing no more so to do, he will no more reckon his sin unto him; and that is sufficient for me.

Then said the chancellor, Thou deniest the sacrament of penance.

I said, I deny not penance, but I deny that I should shew my sins to the priest.

Then said the chancellor, That is denying of the sacrament of penance.

Write this article.

Have you received the blessed sacrament of the altar (said he) at this time of Easter?

And I said, No.

And why have you not? said he.

I said, I dare not meddle with you in it, as you use it.

Why,

Why, do we not use it truly? said he.

I said, No: for the holy supper of the Lord serveth for the Christian congregation, and you are none of Christ's members; and therefore I dare not meddle with you, lest I be like unto you.

Why are we none of Christ's members? said the chancellor.

I said, Because you teach laws contrary to God's laws.

What laws are those? said he.

I said, These three articles, that you swear the people unto here, be false and untrue, and you do evil to swear the people unto them.

Then said he, Good people, take no heed unto his words; for he is an heretic, and teacheth you disobedience: and so he would no more speak of that matter.

Then said he, How believest thou in the blessed sacrament of the altar: dost thou not believe that after it is consecrated, it is the very same body that was born of the Virgin Mary?

I said, No, not the same body in substance; for the same body hath a substance in flesh, blood, and bones, and was a bloody sacrifice, and this is a dry sacrifice.

And I said, Is the mass a sacrifice?

Unto which a doctor answered that sat by him, It is a sacrifice both for the quick and the dead.

Then said I, No, it is no sacrifice; for St. Paul saith, that Christ made one sacrifice once for all; and I do believe in none other sacrifice, but only in that one sacrifice that our Lord Jesus Christ made once for all.

Then said the doctor, That sacrifice that Christ made was a wet sacrifice, and the mass is a dry sacrifice.

Then said I, That same dry sacrifice is a sacrifice of your own making, and it is your sacrifice, it is none of mine.

Then said the chancellor, He is an heretic, he denieth the sacrament of the altar.

Then said I, Will ye know how I believe in the holy supper of the Lord?

And he said, Yes.

Then said I, I believe that if I come rightly and worthily, as God hath commanded me, to the holy supper of the Lord, I receive him by faith, as by believing in him. But the bread being received is not God, and the bread that is yonder in the pyx is not God. God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither will he be worshipped with the works of men's hands. And therefore you do very evil to cause the people to kneel down and worship the bread; for God did never bid you hold it above your heads, neither had the apostles such use.

Then said the chancellor, He denieth the presence in the sacrament. Write this article also. He is a very heretic.

The said I, The servant is not greater than his master. For your predecessors killed my master Christ, the prophets and apostles, and holy virtuous men, and now you also kill the servant of Christ, so that all the righteous blood that hath been shed, even from righteous Abel, until this day, shall be required at your hands.

Well, said the chancellor, have him away.

Another Examination of SPURDANCE, before the Bishop in his House.

Bishop. SIRRAH, dost thou not believe in the catholic faith of the holy church?

Spurd. I believe Christ's catholic church.

Bishop. Yea, in Christ's church, of which the pope is head? Dost thou not believe that the pope is supreme head of the catholic church?

Spurd. No. I believe not that he should be above the apostles, if he takes them to be his predecessors. For when there came a thought among the apostles, who should be the greatest when their master was gone, Christ answered them unto their thoughts, "The kings of the earth bear dominion above each other, but ye shall not do so, for he that will be greatest among you shall become servant unto you all. How is it then (said I) that he will climb so high above his fellows? And also we were sworn in my master king Henry's time, that we should, to the utmost of our power, never consent to him again. And therefore as he hath nothing to do here in England, so neither hath he in his own country more than a bishop hath in his diocese.

Bishop. Yea, what of that? We were then in error and sin, now we are in the right way again, and therefore thou must come again with us, and acknowledge thy fault, and become a christian man, and be sworn unto the pope as our supreme head. Wilt thou be sworn unto the pope? How sayest thou?

Spurd. No, I warrant you, by the grace of God, not as long as I live. For you cannot prove by the scripture that the pope is head of the church, and may do therein what he listeth.

Bishop. No? yes I trow; for as the bell-wether which weareth the bell, is head of the flock of sheep, even so is the pope the head of the church of Christ. And as the bees in the hive have a master bee, when they are gone out, to bring them home to the hive; even so the pope, when we be gone astray, and wandered from the fold, from the hive, &c. then is ordered our head by succession of Peter, to bring us home again to the true church; as thou now, my good fellow, hast long wandered out of the way, like a scattered sheep, &c. Hear therefore that bell-wether, the master bee, &c. and come home with us again to thy mother the church.

Spurd. My lord, all this is but natural reason, and no scripture: but since you cannot prove the pope to be authorized by scripture, you answer me not as I thought you would.

Bishop. Ha, I see well you will be stout, and will not be answered: therefore you shall be compelled by law, whether you will or no.

Spurd. My lord, so did your forefathers treat Christ and his apostles. They had a law, and by their law they put him to death; and so likewise you have a law which is tyranny, and by that you would enforce me to believe as you do: but the Lord, I trust, will assist me against all your beggarly ceremonies, and make your foolishness known to all the world.

Bishop. When were you at church, or joined in the procession, and did the ceremonies of the church?

Spurd. Never since I was born.

Bishop. No? How old are you?

Spurd. I think about forty.

Bishop. Why, how did you use yourself at church twenty years ago?

Spurd. As you do now.

Bishop. And even now, you said you did not use the ceremonies since you were born.

Spurd. No more I did, since I was born anew; as Christ said unto Nicodemus, "Except ye be born anew, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Then said a doctor that sat by, He is a very anabaptist: for that is their opinion plain.

Spurd. No, sir, you say falsely, for I am no anabaptist: for they deny children to be baptized, which I do not.

Bishop. Well, why dost thou not go to church, and do the ceremonies?

Spurd. Because they are contrary to God's word and laws, as you yourself have taught: but now you say it is good again: and I think if there were a return to-morrow, you would say that was false again which you hold now. Therefore, I may well say, there is no truth in you.

Bishop. Then thou art a stubborn fellow, and an heretic, and a traitor.

Spurd. No, I am no traitor, for I have done, I think, better service for the crown imperial of England than you.

Bishop. If you had done such good service, you would be obedient to the laws of the realm.

Spurd. So I am. There is no man alive, I thank God, that can accuse me justly that ever I was disobedient to any civil laws. But you must consider, my lord, that I have a soul and body, and my soul is none of the queen's, queen's, but my body and my goods are the queen's. And I must give God my soul, and all that belongeth unto it, that is, I must do the laws and commandments of God; and whosoever commandeth laws contrary to God's laws, I may not do them for fear of losing my soul, but rather obey God than man.

Bishop. Why dost thou not these laws then? Are they not agreeable to God's law?

Spurd. No, you cannot prove them to be God's laws.

Bishop. Yes, that I can.

Spurd. Then if you can prove by the word of God, that you should have any graven images made to set in your churches for laymen's books, or to worship God by them, or that you should have the ceremonies in your church as you have, prove them by the word of God, and I will do them.

Bishop. Then it is a good and decent order to furnish the church: as when you shall go to dinner, you have a cloth upon the table to furnish the table before the meat shall come upon it; so are these ceremonies a comely, decent order to be in the church among christian people.

Spurd. These are inventions and imaginations out of your own brain, without any word of God to prove them. For God saith, Look what you think good in your own eyes, if I command the contrary, it is abominable in my sight. And these ceremonies are against God's laws. For St. Paul saith, they be weak and beggarly, and rebuketh the Galatians for doing them.

Bishop. Well, if you will not do them, seeing they be the laws of the realm, you are an heretic and disobedient: and therefore come home again and confess your faults with us, that you have been in error, &c. Will you do so?

Spurd. No, I have been in no error: for the spiritual laws were never more truly set forth than in my master king Edward's time, and I trust unto God I shall never leave them while I live.

Then came a gentleman to me and said, Are you wiser than all men? and have you more knowledge than all men? Will you cast away your soul willingly? My lord and other men also would fain you would save yourself: therefore chuse some man where you will, either spiritual or temporal, and take a day, my lord will give it you.

Spurd. If I save my life, I shall lose it; and if I lose my life for Christ's sake, I shall find it in life everlasting. And if I take a day, when the day cometh, I must say then even as I do now, except I will lie, and therefore that needeth not.

Well, then have him away, said the bishop.

This above-named Thomas Spurdance was one of queen Mary's servants, and was taken by two of his fellows, the said queen's servants, named John Haman, otherwise called Barker, and George Loofon, both dwelling in Codman, in the county of Suffolk, who carried him to one Mr. Gosnal, dwelling in the said Codman, and by him he was sent to Bury, where he remained in prison, and was afterwards burned in the month of November.

An Account of the Martyrdom of JOHN HALLINGDALE, WILLIAM SPARROW, and RICHARD GIBSON.

SOON after the martyrdom of the two good women at Colchester, the three above-mentioned persons were put to death in Smithfield, at London, the 18th of November.

Being brought before Bonner, bishop of London, the 5th day of November, 1557, the following articles were exhibited unto them.

Articles ministred unto JOHN HALLINGDALE.

FIRST, That the said John Hallingdale is of the diocese of London, and so subjea to the jurisdiction of the bishop of London.

No. 53.

Secondly, That the said John, before the reign of king Edward the Sixth, late king of England, was of the same faith and religion that was then observed, believed, taught and set forth in this realm of England.

Thirdly, That during the reign of the said king Edward the Sixth, the said John Hallingdale, upon occasion of the said preaching of certain ministers in that time, did not abide by his former faith and religion, but did depart from it, and so did and doth continue till this present day, and so determineth to do (as he saith) till his life's end.

Fourthly, That the said John Hallingdale hath thought, believed, and spoken divers times, that the faith, religion, and ecclesiastical service received, observed, and used now in this realm of England, is not good and laudable, but against God's commandment and word, especially concerning the mass, and the seven sacraments; and that he the said John, will not in any wise conform himself to the same, but speak and think against it during his natural life.

Fifthly, That the said John absenteth himself continually from his own parish church of St. Leonard's, neither hearing mass, mattins, nor even-song, nor yet confessing his sins to the priest, nor receiving the sacrament of the altar at his hands, or using other ceremonies as they are now used in this church and realm of England: and as he remembereth, he never came but once to the parish church of St. Leonard, and careth not if he never comes there any more, the service being as it is there, and so many abuses being there, especially the mass, the sacraments, and the ceremonies and service being set forth in Latin.

Sixthly, That the said John, when his wife, called Alice, was brought to bed of a male child, caused the said child to be christened in English, after the same manner and form in all points, as it was used in the time of the reign of king Edward the Sixth, as aforesaid, and caused it to be called Josue, and would not have the said child christened in Latin, after the form and manner as it is now used in the church and realm of England, nor will have it by his will to be confirmed by the bishop.

Unto all which articles the said John Hallingdale made answer, confessing them all, and every part of them to be true, and saying that he would not revoke his said answers, but stand unto them according as it was in every article above written.

Furthermore, the said John Hallingdale being demanded by the said Bonner, whether he firmly believed, that in the sacrament, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, there is really and truly the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ, or no; made answer, that he neither in the time of the said king Edward the Sixth, nor at that present did believe, that in the said sacrament there is really the very body and blood of Christ. For he said, that if he had so believed, he would (as others had done) have received the same, which he did not, because he had and then did believe, that the very body of Christ is only in heaven and no where else. And furthermore the said John Hallingdale said, that Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Hooper, and generally all that have of late been burned for heretics, were no heretics at all, because they did truly preach the gospel; upon whose preaching he grounded his faith and conscience, as he said, according to the saying of St. John, Rev. xviii. where he saith, That the blood of the prophets, and of the saints, and of all them that were slain upon earth, was found in the Babylonical church, by which, he said, is understood the church where the pope is the head.

After which examination, the said John was sent unto prison again. And the next day, being the sixth of the said month, he was called before the bishop again, who persuading him with some wrested sentences of the scripture, the said John Hallingdale answered, Because I will not, saith he, come to your Babylonical church, therefore (speaking unto Bonner), you go about to condemn me. And being further demanded by bishop Bonner, whether he would persevere and stand in his opinions or no: he made answer, that he would continue and persist in them unto his death. Then Bonner read the sentence of condemnation. At which time the said John affirmed openly, that (thanking God) he never came into the church since the abomination came into it, and so he was sent to prison again.

Upon the same forenoon, William Sparrow was brought before the bishop, and had the following articles laid to him.

Articles ministred to WILLIAM SPARROW.

FIRST, That thou, William Sparrow, wast in times detested and presented lawfully unto thy ordinary, the bishop of London, called Edmund, who also is now thine ordinary of the said diocese, and thou wast presented and detested unto him for heresy, error, and unlawful opinions, which thou didst believe, set forth, and hold.

Secondly, That thou before the said ordinary didst openly and judicially confess the said heresies, errors, and unlawful opinions, as appears plainly in the acts of the court, had and made before the said ordinary.

Thirdly, That thou, after the premises, didst make thy submission in writing, and didst exhibit and deliver the same as thy deed, to thy said ordinary; openly confessing and recognizing thy heresies, errors, unlawful opinions, and thine offences and transgressions in that behalf.

Fourthly, That thou, after the premises, didst promise unto thy said ordinary, voluntarily and of thine own mind, that always after the said submission, thou wouldst in all points conform thyself unto the common order of the catholic church observed and kept here in this realm of England, and in no wise fall again to heresies, errors, or unlawful opinions.

Fifthly, That thou, since thy said submission, hast willingly fallen into certain heresies and errors, and hast holden and set forth divers unlawful opinions, to the great hurt of thine own soul, and also to the great hindrance and loss of several others, especially against the sacrament of the altar, against auricular confession, with the other sacraments of the catholic church.

Sixthly, That thou, since the said commission, hast wilfully gone about divers places within the diocese of London, and sold divers heretical, erroneous, and blasphemous ballads about, and wast apprehended and taken with the said ballads about thee, and committed to prison.

Unto the first, second, third, and fourth articles, he answered affirmatively.

To the fifth article he answered, That if he had spoke against them, he had spoke but the truth: for they are naught, meaning the contents of the said article.

To the sixth, he granted to the article, adding, that he did sell the said ballads, and that the same did contain God's word.

After which answers, the said William Sparrow was sent unto prison. And the same day in the afternoon, being brought before the bishop again, and there charged with his said submission made the year before unto the bishop, he answered thus: I am sorry, said he, that ever I made it, and it was the worst deed that ever I did: adding further unto them, Hold up your abomination as long as you can. Also being laid unto him, and charged by the bishop that he went to church, and there was confessed and heard mass; he made answer and confessed, that he did so, but with a troubled conscience, he said, God knoweth.

And being further demanded of Bonner, whether he would persist and continue in the same; he made answer, That he would not go from his opinions: and adding thereunto, he said, That which you call heresy, speaking to the bishop, is good and godly, and if every hair of my head were a man, said he, I would burn them all rather than go from the truth.

Then being demanded, What ground of learning he had to cleave to his opinions: he made answer and said, That all the laws now used (meaning the ecclesiastical laws) are naught and abominable. Which words being spoken, the bishop immediately read the sentence of condemnation against him, and so delivered him to the secular power, by whom he was sent to prison again.

An Account of Mr. RICHARD GIBSON, Martyr.

WITH the other two above named, suffered also in the same fire, Richard Gibson, who first was cast into the Compter, in the Poultry (where he had been prisoner for the space of two years for a surety in a matter of debt, and then stood upon his deliverance), then upon suspicion and evil will was accused to bishop Bonner, because he was never confessed in the prison, nor received at the popish altar: by reason whereof he was called for, and sustained divers conflicts and examinations in the cause of his faith and religion. But first he seemed to make a certain submission which he also exhibited with the other twenty-eight before-mentioned: but because it seemed in words to differ something from the other, it appeareth not to be received: or whether it was received or no, it is not fully certain. This is certain, that although his submission was recorded in the bishop's register, yet he was not delivered from imprisonment till the day of his burning.

The greatest matter which he was charged with, was for not coming to confession, being thereunto required, for not receiving of the sacrament of the popish making, and for that he would not swear to answer to their interrogatories laid against him.

Notwithstanding after these his first examinations he continued in the prison of the Compter, from the month of May to November, when he was again produced against the final judiciary. Where is to be noted, that Mr. Gibson being a very big and tall man, of a personable and heroical stature, was sent for by Bonner by a little man, a promoter, like Robin Papist, called Robin Caley.

This Robin Caley having the conducting of the said gentleman from the Poultry, would needs haul him through Cheapside, the gentleman desiring him to turn some other way. But the more the gentleman intreated, the more fierce was he upon him; and drawing and holding him by the arm, would needs haul him through the High-street, that all the world might see what he could do in his office. Mr. Gibson, desirous to go without holding, intreated him to let his arm loose, and he would go quietly with him whither he would, only craving that he might go by him freely without being noticed by the people.

But he saucily answered him, Nay, thou shalt not escape me so, come on thy ways. Thou shalt not chuse but come; and so reaching at his arm, would needs drag him unto the bishop. The gentleman content to go, yet loth to be noted in the streets, gently requested again and again, that refraining his hold, he would suffer him to go of his own free will, he should not need to fear him, for he would not start from him. To which he replied, Come on thy way, I will hold thee fast, spite of thy beard, and whether thou wilt or no.

Mr. Gibson beholding his intolerable bragging, and being greatly moved therewith, could bear no longer; but said, Wilt thou? adding moreover, That if he did not immediately pluck away his hand, he would wring his head from his body. Whereupon he let go his hold, and so they proceeded unto the bishop to be examined again before him.

After this, another day being assigned him to appear again, much talk passed between him and Darbyshire, then chancellor. But in fine, being required to swear that he should answer unto all they would demand, he denied to answer unto all things the bishop should command him as ordinary: For he is not, faith he, mine ordinary, and so bade him go tell the bishop. Before which bishop, he being then commanded to appear the Friday following, was brought into the Justice-hall, without Newgate, where he had the like conflicts with the aforesaid bishop and divers other justices. At length he was assigned the Saturday following, to be present at the bishop's consistory court, to hear his final sentence.

sentence. At which day and place, the said examine appearing as he was commanded, the bishop, after other matter of communication, asked him if he knew any cause why the sentence should not be read against him. To whom Mr. Gibson answered, that the bishop had nothing whereof justly to condemn him. The bishop's reason was again objected to him, that men said he was an evil man. To whom Gibson replying again; Yea, faith he, and so may I say of you also. To be short, after this and such other talk, the bishop hastened unto the sentence. Which being read, Bonner yet again admonished him to remember himself, and to save his soul: he said, that he would not hear the bishop's babbling; and said moreover, boldly protesting and affirming that he was contrary, and an enemy to them all in his mind and opinion, although he had before kept it secret in mind, for fear of the law. And speaking to the bishop, Blessed, said he, am I, that am cursed at your hands. We have nothing now, but thus will I: for as the bishop faith, so must it be. And no heresy it is to turn the truth of God's word into lies, and that do you, meaning the bishop and his fellows.

Thus this valiant soldier, fighting for the gospel and sincere doctrine of Christ's truth and religion, against falsehood and error, was committed, with his fellows, to the secular power.

And so these three godly men, John Hallingdale, William Sparrow, and Mr. Gibson, being thus appointed to the slaughter, were, the 12th day after their condemnation (which was the 18th day of November), burnt in Smithfield. And being brought thither to the stake, after their prayer made, they were bound thereunto with chains, and wood set unto them, and after wood, fire, in which being encompassed about, and the fiery flames consuming their flesh, at last they yielded gloriously and joyfully their souls and lives into the holy hands of the Lord, to whose tuition and government I commend thee, good reader. Amen.

An Account of the Martyrdom of JOHN ROUGH, Minister, and MARGARET MEARING, burned at London, December 22.

JOHAN ROUGH was born in Scotland, who, (as himself confesseth in his answers to Bonner's articles) because some of his kinsfolk would have kept him from his right of inheritance which he had to certain lands, did at the age of seventeen years, in despite (and rather to displease his friends), profess himself into the order of the black friars at Sterling, in Scotland; where he remained the space of sixteen years, until such time as the lord Hamilton, earl of Arran, and governor of the realm of Scotland (as a favour unto him) did apply unto the archbishop of St. Andrew's, to have him out of his professed order, that as a secular priest he might serve him for his chaplain. At which request the archbishop caused the provincial of that house, having thereto authority, to dispense with him for his habit and order.

This suit being thus obtained by the earl, the said Rough remained in his service one whole year: during which time it pleased God to open his eyes, and to give him some knowledge of his truth, and was thereupon sent by the said governor to preach in the freedom of Ayre, where he continued four years, and then after the death of the cardinal of Scotland, he was appointed to abide at St. Andrew's, and there had assigned unto him a yearly pension of twenty pounds from Henry the Eighth, king of England. However, at last weighing with himself his own danger, and also abhorring the idolatry and superstition of the country, and hearing of the freedom of the gospel within this realm of England, he determined with himself not to tarry any longer there: and therefore, soon after the battle of Muffelborough, he came first unto Carlisle, and from thence unto the duke of Somerset, then lord protector of England, and by his assignment had appointed unto him out of the king's treasury twenty pounds of yearly stipend, and was sent (as a preacher) to serve at Carlisle, Berwick, and Newcastle, where he married. From whence he was called by the archbishop of York that then was, unto a benefice in the town of Hull, where he continued till the death of good king Edward VI.

But in the beginning of the reign of queen Mary (perceiving the alteration of religion, and the persecution that would thereupon arise, and feeling his own weakness) he fled with his wife into Friezeland, and dwelt there at a place called Norden, labouring truly for his living, in knitting of caps, hose, and such like things, till about the end of the month of October, before his death. At which time, lacking yarn, and other such necessary provision for the maintenance of his occupation, he came over again into England, here to provide for the same, and the tenth day of November arrived at London. Where, hearing of the secret society, and holy congregation of God's children there assembled, he joined himself unto them, and afterwards being elected their minister and preacher, did continue most virtuously exercised in that godly fellowship, teaching and confirming them in the truth of the gospel of Christ. But in the end (such was the providence of God, who disposes all things to the best) the 12th day of December, he with Cutbert Simson and others, through the crafty and traitorous suggestion of a false hypocrite and dissembling brother, named Roger Serjeant, a taylor, were apprehended by the vice-chamberlain of the queen's house, at the Saracen's Head in Islington; where the congregation had then purposed to assemble themselves to their accustomed exercises of prayer, and hearing the word of God: which pretence, for the safeguard of all the rest, they yet at their examinations covered and excused, by hearing of a play that was then appointed to be at that place. The vice-chamberlain, after he had apprehended them, carried Rough and Simson unto the council, who charged them to have assembled together to celebrate the communion or supper of the Lord, and therefore after sundry examinations they sent unto the bishop of London, with a letter signed with their hands: the copy whereof here follows.

A L E T T E R

From the Queen's Council to BONNER, Bishop of London, concerning the Examination of JOHN ROUGH, Minister.

AFTER our hearty commendations to your good lordship, we send you here inclosed the examination of a Scottish man, named John Rough, who, by the queen's command, is just sent to Newgate, being of the chief of them that upon Sunday last, under the colour of coming to see a play at the Saracen's Head, at Islington, had prepared a communion to be celebrated and received there among other certain seditious and heretical persons. And forasmuch as by the said Rough's examination, containing the story and progress of his former life, it well appeareth of what sort he is; the queen's highness hath willed us to remit him unto your lordship, to the end that being called before you out of prison, as oft as your lordship shall think good, you may proceed, both to his further examination, and otherwise ordering of him according to the laws, as the case shall require. And thus we bid your lordship heartily well to fare. From St. James's, December 15, 1557. Your lordship's loving friends, Nicholas Ebor, F. Shrewsbury, Edward Hastings, Anthony Montague, John Bourne, Henry Iernegam.

Bonner, now minding to make quick dispatch, did, within three days after the receipt of the letter, send for Rough out of Newgate, to be examined before him and others; who, when they perceived his constancy, determined the next day after to bring him openly into the consistory, there to adjudge and condemn him as an heretic. Which purpose they accomplished: for the twentieth day in the afternoon, in the presence of the bishop of London, and St. David's, with Fécknam, abbot of Westminster, and others, he was there produced. Where, after many persuasions, Bonner read unto him the articles and answers, in in which they charged him to have received the orders of the church, and therefore might not marry: and that he had refused to consent to the Latin service then used in the church. Whereunto he then answered and said, That their orders were nothing at all, and that he being a priest, might lawfully marry, and that the children which he had by his wife were lawful. And concerning the service then used, he utterly detested it, saying, That if he should live as long as did Methuselah, yet he would never come to the church to hear the abominable mass and other service being as it was then. Upon which words the bishop proceeded to the degradation of the said Rough; and after condemning him as an heretic, committed his body to the secular power, who taking him into their custody, carried him unto Newgate.

Moreover, as touching the said Mr. Rough, this is further to be noted, that he being in the north country in the days of king Edward VI. was the cause of saving Dr. Watson's life (who in queen Mary's days was bishop of London), for a sermon that he had preached there. The said Watson after that, being with Bonner at the examination of the said Mr. Rough, to requite him in saving his life, detected him there to be a pernicious heretic, who did hurt more in the north parts than an hundred besides of his opinion. Unto whom Mr. Rough said, Why, sir, is this the reward I have for saving your life, when you preached erroneous doctrine in the days of king Edward VI.? This Mr. Rough said, he had lived thirty years, and yet had never bowed his knee to Baal: and being before Bonner, among other talk he affirmed, that he had been twice at Rome, and there had seen plainly with his eyes, which he had many times heard of before, namely, that the pope was the very Antichrist; for there he saw him carried on men's shoulders, and the false-named sacrament borne before him. Yet there was more reverence given to him, than to that which they counted to be their god. When Bonner heard this, rising up, and making as though he would have torn his garment, Hast thou, said he, been at Rome, and seen our holy father the pope, and dost thou blaspheme him after this sort: and with flying upon him, he plucked off a piece of his beard, and after making speedy haste to his death, he burnt him half an hour before six o'clock in the morning, because the day belike should not be far spent before he had done a mischievous deed.

LETTER I.

From JOHN ROUGH, to some of his Friends, confirming and strengthening them in the Truth, which he had before taught.

THE comfort of the Holy Ghost make you able to give consolation to others in these dangerous days, when Satan is let loose, but to the trial only of the chosen, when it pleaseth our God to sift his wheat from the chaff. I have not leisure and time to write the great temptations I have been under. I speak to God's glory; my care was to have the senses of my soul open, to perceive the voice of God, saying, Whosoever denieth me before men, him will I deny before my Father and his angels. And to save the life corporal, is to lose the life eternal. And he that will not suffer with Christ, shall not reign with him. Therefore, most tender ones, I have by God's Spirit given over the flesh, with the fight of my soul, and the spirit hath the victory. The flesh shall now before it be long, leave off to sin, the spirit shall reign eternally. I have chosen death to confirm the truth by me taught. What can I do more? Consider with yourselves, that I have done it for the confirmation of God's truth. Pray that I may continue unto the end. The greatest part of the assault is past, I praise my God. I have in all my assaults felt the present aid of my God, I give him most hearty thanks therefore. Look not back, nor be ye ashamed of Christ's gospel, nor of the bonds I have suffered for the same, thereby you may be assured it is the true word of God. The holy ones have been sealed with the same mark. It is no time for the loss of one man in the battle, for the camp to turn back. Up with men's hearts, down with the daubed walls of heresy. Let one take the banner, and the other the trumpet; I mean not to make corporal resistance, but pray, and ye shall have Elias's defence, and Elizeus's company to fight for you. The cause is the Lord's. Now, my brethren, I can write no more, time will not suffer, and my heart with pangs of death is assaulted; but I am at home with my God, yet alive. Pray for me, and salute one another with the holy kiss. The peace of God rest with you all, Amen. From Newgate prison in haste, the day of my condemnation.

JOHN ROUGH.

LETTER II.

From JOHN ROUGH, written unto the Congregation two Days before he suffered.

THE Spirit of consolation be with you, aid you, and make you strong to run to the fight that is laid before you, wherewithal God in all ages hath tried his elect, and hath found them worthy of himself, by coupling to their head Jesus Christ; in whom, whoso desireth to live godly, the same must needs suffer persecution. For it is given unto them, not only to believe, but also to suffer. And the servant or scholar cannot be greater than his lord and master: but by the same way the head is entered, the members must follow: no life is in the members which are cut from the body: likewise we have no life but in Christ; for by him we live, move, and have our being. My dear sons, now departing this life to my great advantage, I make change of mortality with immortality, of corruption to put on incorruption, to make my body like unto the corn cast into the ground, which except it die first, it can bring forth no good fruit. Wherefore death is to me great advantage: for thereby the body ceaseth from sin, and after turneth into the first original; but after shall be changed, and made brighter than the sun or moon. What shall I write of this corporal death, seeing it is decreed of God, that all men shall once die? Happy are they which die in the Lord, which is to die in the faith of Christ, professing and confessing the same before many witnesses. I praise God I have passed the same journey by many temptations, the devil is very busy to persuade, the world to entice with promises and fair words: which I omit to write lest some might think I did hunt after vain-glory, which is farthest from my heart. Lastly, the danger of some false brethren, who before the bishop of London purposed to confess an untruth to my face: yet the God that ruled Balaam, moved their hearts; where they thought to speak to my accusation, he made them speak to my purgation. What a journey (by God's power) I have made these eight days before this day, it is above flesh and blood to bear: but as St. Paul saith, I may do all things in him which worketh in me, Jesus Christ. My course, brethren, have I run, I have fought a good fight, the crown of righteousness is laid up for me, my day to receive it is at hand. Pray, brethren, for the enemy doth yet assault. Stand constant unto the end, then shall you possess your souls. Walk worthily in that vocation wherein you are called. Comfort the brethren. Salute one another in my name. Be not ashamed of the gospel of the cross, by me preached, nor yet of my suffering; for with my blood I affirm the same. I go before, I suffer first the baiting of the butcher's dogs; yet I have not done what I should have done; but my weakness, I doubt not, is supplied in the strength of Jesus Christ; and your wisdom and learning will accept the small talent, which I have distributed unto you, (as I trust) as a faithful steward: and what was undone, impute that to frailty and ignorance, and with your love cover that which is and was naked in me. God knoweth ye are all tender unto me, my heart bursteth for the love of you. Ye are not without the great pastor of your soul, who so loveth you, that if men were not to be sought out, (as God be praised there is no want of men) he would cause stones to minister unto you. Cast your care on that rock, the wind of temptation shall not prevail: fast and pray, for the days are evil. Look up with your eyes of hope, for the redemption is not far off (but my wickedness hath deserved that I shall not see it). And also that which is behind of the blood of our brethren, which shall also be be laid under the altar, shall cry for your relief. Time will not now suffer me to write long letters. The Spirit of God guide you in and out, rising and sitting, cover you with the shadow of his wings, defend you against the tyranny of the wicked, and bring you happily unto the port of eternal felicity, where all tears shall be wiped from your eyes, and you shall always abide with the Lamb.

JOHN ROUGH.

An Account of MARGARET MEARING, Martyr.

IT is before related, that in the company of John Rough, was burned one Margaret Mearing, who, as the register maketh mention, was at one time and day brought with the said Rough forth to examination: where the bishop having no private matters to charge her withal, did the 18th day of December object against her those common and accustomed articles mentioned before; to which she answered as follows.

1. That there is here on earth a catholic church, and that there is the true faith of Christ observed and kept in the same church.

2. Item, That there were only two sacraments in the church, namely, the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and the sacrament of baptism.

3. Item, That she was baptized in the faith and belief of the said church, renouncing there, by her godfathers and godmothers, the devil and all his works, &c.

4. Item, That when she came to the age of fourteen years, she did not know what her true belief was, because she was not then of discretion to understand the same, neither yet was taught it.

5. Item, That she had not gone from the catholic faith at any time; but she said that the mass was abominable before the sight of God, and before the sight of all true christian people, and that it is the plain cup of fornication, and the whore of Babylon. And as concerning the sacrament of the altar, she said, she believed there was no such sacrament in the catholic church. Also she said, that she utterly abhorred the authority of the bishop of Rome, with all the religion observed in the same Antichrist's church.

6. Item, She answered to the 6th article, as to the first, before specified.

7. Item, That she hath refused to come to her parish church, because the true religion of Christ was not then used in the same; and further said, that she had not come unto the church for the space of one year and three quarters then last past, neither yet did mean any more to come unto the same in these idolatrous days.

8. Item, As touching the manner of her apprehension, she said, That Cluney, the bishop's sumner, did fetch her to the bishop.

These answers being then registered, they were again (with the said articles) propounded against her the 20th day of December, and there being demanded if she would stand unto those her answers, she said, I will stand to them unto death; for the very angels of heaven do laugh you to scorn, to see your abomination that you use in the church. After which words, the bishop pronounced the sentence of condemnation against her; and then delivering her unto the sheriffs, she was, with the before-mentioned John Rough carried unto Newgate. From whence they were both together led unto Smithfield, the 22d of December, and there most joyfully gave their lives for the profession of Christ's gospel.

Continuation of the Persecution of PROTESTANTS during the Reign of QUEEN MARY I. with the providential Deliverances of many from their cruel Enemies the PAPISTS.

An Account of the Sufferings and cruel Torments of CUTBERT SYMSON, Deacon of the Christian Congregation in London.

CUTBERT SYMSON was a man of a faithful and zealous heart to Christ and his true flock, insomuch that he never ceased labouring, and studying most earnestly, not only how to preserve them without corruption of the popish religion, but also his care was very vigilant, how to keep them together without danger or peril of persecution. The pains, travail, zeal, patience, and fidelity of this man, in caring and providing for this congregation, as it is not easily to be expressed; so it is wonderful to behold the providence of the Lord by vision, concerning the troubles of this faithful minister and godly deacon, as in this here following may appear.

The Friday night before Mr. Rough, minister of the congregation (of whom mention was made before), was taken, being in his bed he dreamed, that he saw two of the guards leading Cutbert Symson, deacon of the said congregation, and that he had the book about him, wherein were written the names of all them which were of the congregation. Whereupon, being fore troubled he awaked, and called his wife, saying, Kate, strike a light, for I am much troubled with my brother Cutbert this night. When she had so done, he began to read in his book a while, and there feeling sleep to come upon him, he put out the candle, and so gave himself again to rest. Being asleep, he dreamed the like dream again; and, awaked therewith, he said, Oh, Kate, my brother Cutbert is gone. So they lighted a candle again, and rose. And as the said Mr. Rough was making him ready to go to Cutbert to see how he did, in the mean time the said Cutbert came in with the book containing the names and accounts of the congregation. Whom when Mr. Rough had seen, said he, Brother Cutbert, you are welcome; for I have been fore troubled with you this night, and so told him his dream. After he had so done, he desired him to lay the book away from him, and to carry it no more about him. Unto which Cutbert answered, he would not so do; for dreams, he said, were but fancies, and not to be credited. Then Mr. Rough straitly charged him in the name of the Lord to do it. Whereupon the said Cutbert took such notes out of the book as he had desired him to do, and immediately left the book with Mr. Rough's wife.

The next night following, the said Mr. Rough had another dream in his sleep, concerning his own trouble. The matter whereof was this: he thought in his dream that he was carried himself forcibly to the bishop, and that the bishop pluckt off his beard, and cast it into the fire, saying these words, Now I may say I have had a piece of an heretic burned in my house, and so accordingly it came to pass.

Now to return to Cutbert again; as we have touched something concerning these visions, so now remaineth to mention his pains and sufferings upon the rack, and otherwise, like a good Laurence for the congregation's sake, as he wrote it with his own hand.

A true Account how he was used in the Tower of London, being sent thither by the Council, the 13th Day of December.

ON the Thursday after, I was called into the Warehouse, before the constable of the Tower, and the recorder recorder of London, Mr. Cholmley; they commanded me to tell, whom I did will to come to the English service. I answered, I would declare nothing. Whereupon I was set in a rack of iron, the space of three hours, as I judged.

Then they asked me if I would tell them. I answered as before. Then was I loosed, and carried to my lodging again. On the Sunday after I was brought into the same place again, before the lieutenant and the recorder of London, and they examined me. As before I had said, I answered. Then the lieutenant did swear by God I should tell. Then did they bind my two fore fingers together, and put a small arrow betwixt them, and drew it through so fast that the blood followed, and the arrow brake.

Then they racked me twice. Then was I carried to my lodging again, and ten days after the lieutenant asked me if I would not confess that which they had before asked me. I answered, I had said as much as I would. Then five weeks after he sent me unto the high priest, where I was greatly assaulted, and at whose hand I received the pope's curse, for bearing witness of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. And thus I commend you unto God, and to the word of his grace, with all them that unfeignedly call upon the name of Jesus, desiring God of his endless mercy, through the merits of his dear Son Jesus Christ, to bring us all to his everlasting kingdom, Amen. I praise God for his great mercy shewed upon us. Sing Hosanna unto the highest with me Cutbert Symson. God forgive me my sins. I ask all the world forgiveness, and I do forgive all the world; and thus I leave this world, in hope of a joyful resurrection.

A Note of CUTBERT SYMSON's Patience.

NOW as touching this Cutbert Symson, this is further to be noticed, that Bonner in his consistory, speaking of Cutbert Symson, gave this testimony of him there to the people, saying, You see this man, saith he, what a personable man he is; and after he had thus commended his person, added moreover, And furthermore concerning his patience, I say unto you, that if he were not an heretic, he is a man of the greatest patience that ever yet came before me: for I tell you, he hath been thrice racked upon one day in the Tower. Also in my house he hath felt some sorrow, and yet I never saw his patience broken, &c.

It is thought and said by some, that that arrow which was grated between his fingers, being tied together, was not in the Tower, but in the bishop's house.

The day before this blessed deacon and martyr of God, Cutbert Symson, after his painful racking, should go to his condemnation before Bonner to be burned, being in the stocks in the bishop's Coal-house, he had a very strange vision or apparition, which he himself with his own mouth declared to that learned man Mr. Austen, to his own wife, and Thomas Symson, and to others besides, in the prison of Newgate a little before his death. The relation whereof I stand in no little doubt whether to report abroad or not, considering with myself the great diversity of men's judgments, by the reading of histories, and variety of affections. Some I see will not believe it, some will deride the same, some also will be offended with setting forth such uncertain things of that sort, esteeming all things to be uncertain and incredible which appear any way strange from the common order of nature.

Others will be perhaps grieved, thinking with themselves, or else thus reasoning with me, that although the matter were as is reported, yet, forasmuch as the common error of believing those rash miracles, fancies, visions, dreams, and apparitions, thereby may be confirmed, it is thought more expedient for the same to be omitted.

These, and such like, will be, I know, the sayings of many. Whereunto I briefly answer, granting first, and admitting with the words of Basil, Not every dream is straightway a prophecy. Again, neither am I ignorant that the papists in their books and legends of saints have their prodigious visions and apparitions of angels, of our lady, of Christ, and other saints: which as I will not admit to be believed as true; so will they ask me, why should I require more to be credited by them, than their's by us.

First, I write not this, to oblige any man precisely to believe the same, as they do their's, but only report it as it hath been heard of persons known, naming also the parties who were the hearers hereof, leaving the judgment thereof notwithstanding free unto the arbitrament of the reader. Although it is no good argument, proceeding from the singular or particular, to the universal, to say that visions be not true in some: Ergo, they be true in none. And if any shall muse, or object again, Why should such visions be given to him, or a few other singular persons, more than to all the rest, seeing the others were in the same cause and quarrel, and died also martyrs as well as he? To this, I say, concerning the Lord's times and doings I have not to meddle nor make, who may work where and when it pleaseth him. And what if the Lord thought chiefly above the others with singular consolation to respect him, who is chiefly above the other, and singularly did suffer most exquisite torments for his sake? What great marvel herein? But, as I said, of the Lord's secret times I have not to reason. This only which hath out of the man's own mouth been received, so as I received it of the parties, I thought here to communicate to the reader, for him to judge thereof as God shall rule his mind. The matter is this.

The day before Symson was condemned, he being in the stocks, Cluney, his keeper, cometh in with the keys about nine o'clock at night (after his usual manner) to view his prison, and see whether all were present, who when he espied the said Cutbert to be there, departed again, locking the doors after him. Within two hours after, about eleven o'clock toward midnight, the said Cutbert (whether being in a slumber, or being awake I cannot say) heard one coming in, first opening the outward door, then the second, after the third door, and so looking in to the said Cutbert, having no candle or torch that he could see, but giving a brightness and light most comfortable and joyful to his heart, saying unto him, Ha, and departed again. Who it was he could not tell, neither dare I define. This that he saw he himself declared four or five times to the said Mr. Austen, and to others. At the sight whereof he received such joyful comfort, that he also expressed no little solace in telling and declaring the same.

A LETTER

From CUTBERT SYMSON to his Wife, written in the Coal-House.

DEARLY beloved in the Lord Jesus Christ, I cannot write as I do wish unto you.

I beseech you with my soul, commit yourself under the mighty hand of our God, trusting in his mercy, and he will surely help us, as shall be most unto his glory and our everlasting comfort, being sure of this, that he will suffer nothing to come unto us, but that which shall be profitable for us.

For it is either a correction for our sins, or a trial of our faith, or to set forth his glory, or for all together, and therefore must needs be well done. For there is nothing that cometh unto us by fortune or chance, but by our heavenly Father's providence. And therefore pray unto our heavenly Father, that he will ever give us his grace to consider it. Let us give him most hearty thanks for these his fatherly corrections; for as many as he loveth he correcteth. And I beseech you now be of good cheer, and count the cross of Christ greater riches, than all the vain pleasures of England. I do not doubt (I praise God for it), but that you have supped with Christ at his Maundy; I mean, believe in him: for that is the effect, and then must you drink of his cup, I mean his cross (for that doth the cross signify unto us). Take the cup with a good stomach, in the name of God, and then shall you be sure to have the good wine, Christ's blood, to thy poor thirsty soul. And when you have the the wine, you must drink it out of this cup. Learn this when you come to the Lord's supper. In all things give thanks.

In the name of Jesus shall every knee bow,
CUTBERT SYMSON.

The Martyrdom of HUGH FOXE and JOHN DEVENISH.

WITH Cutbert Symson likewise were apprehended and also suffered Hugh Foxe and John Devenish; who being brought unto their examinations with the said Cutbert, before Bonner, bishop of London, March 19, had articles and interrogatories ministered unto them by the said officer.

The general Answers of CUTBERT SYMSON, HUGH FOXE, and JOHN DEVENISH, to the Articles proposed to them by the Bishop.

TO the first article they all answered affirmatively: but John Devenish added; That that church is grounded upon the prophets and apostles, Christ being the head corner-stone, and how in that church there is the true faith and religion of Christ.

To the second article they all confessed and believed, That in Christ's catholic church, there are but two sacraments, namely, baptism, and the supper of the Lord; otherwise they do not believe the contents of this article to be true in any part thereof.

To the third, fourth, and fifth articles they all answered affirmatively.

To the sixth article they all answered, and denied to acknowledge the authority of the see of Rome to be lawful and good, or yet his religion.

To the seventh article they all answered affirmatively, that they have and will do still while they live; and John Devenish adding thereto, said that the sacrament of the altar, as it is now used, is no sacrament at all.

To the eighth article they all confessed, and believed all things above by them acknowledged and declared to be true, and that they are of the diocese of London, and jurisdiction of the same.

These three above-named persons, Symson, Foxe, and Devenish, as they were altogether apprehended at Islington, so they all three suffered together in Smithfield, about the 28th day of March, in whose perfect constancy the same Lord (in whose cause and quarrel they suffered) giver of all grace, and governor of all things, be exalted for ever. Amen.

An Account of the Martyrdom of WILLIAM NICHOL, of Haverford-West, in Wales.

WE find in all ages from the beginning, that Satan hath not ceased at all times to molest the church of Christ with one affliction or other, to the trial of their faith, but yet never so apparently at any time to all the world, as when the Lord hath permitted him power over the bodies of his saints to the shedding of their blood, and perverting of their religion; for then sleepeth he not, I warrant you, from the murdering of the same, unless they will fall down with Ahab and Jezabel to worship him, and so kill and poison their own souls eternally; as in these miserable latter days of queen Mary we have felt, heard, and seen practised upon God's people. Among whom we find recorded an honest poor man, named William Nichol, who was apprehended by the champions of the pope, for speaking certain words against the cruel kingdom of Antichrist, and on the 9th day of April, 1558, was burnt in Wales, ending his life in a most happy and blessed state, gloriously giving his soul into the hands of that God, whose goodness be praised for ever. Amen.

This William Nichol (as we are informed) was so simple a good soul, that many esteemed him half foolish. But what he was in that respect we know not, but this we are sure, that he died a good man, and, in a good cause, whatsoever they judge of him. And the more simplicity and feebleness of wit appeared in him, the more beastly and wretched doth it declare their cruel tyrannical act therein. The Lord give them repentance, if it be his blessed will. Amen, Amen.

An Account of the Martyrdom of WILLIAM SEAMAN, THOMAS CARMAN, and THOMAS HUDSON, at Norwich, in the County of Norfolk.

IMMEDIATELY after William Nichol, succeeded in that honourable and glorious vocation of martyrdom three constant godly men at Norwich, in Norfolk, who were cruelly put to death for the true testimony of Jesus Christ, the 19th of May, 1558, whose names are these: William Seaman, Thomas Carman, and Thomas Hudson.

William Seaman was an husbandman, of the age of 26 years, dwelling in Mendlesham, in the county of Suffolk, who was divers times sought after at the command of sir John Tyrrel, knight, and at last he himself searched his house and other places for him; notwithstanding he somewhat missed of his purpose, God be thanked. Then he gave charge to his servants, Robert Baulding and James Clarke, with others, to seek for him. They, having no officer, went in the evening to his house, he being at home, took him and carried him to their master, sir John Tyrrel. This Baulding being Seaman's near neighbour, and one whom Seaman trusted as an extraordinary friend, notwithstanding, to do his master a pleasure, now became an enemy to his chief friend, and was one of the busiest in the taking of him. And as they were going to carry him to their master, sir John Tyrrel, in the night, it is credibly reported that there fell a light between them out of the elements, and parted them, this Baulding being in company with the rest when the light fell; and although he was then in the prime of his age, yet after that time never enjoyed a good day, but pined away even unto death.

Well, for all that strange sight (as I said), they carried him to their master. Who, when he came, asked him why he would not go to mass, and receive the sacrament, and so worship it? To which William Seaman answered (denying it to be a sacrament) and said, It was an idol, and that he would not receive it. After which words sir John Tyrrel sent him to Norwich, to Hopton, then bishop, and there after conference and examination had with him, the bishop read his bloody sentence of condemnation against him; and afterwards delivered him to the secular power, who kept him till the day of martyrdom.

The said William Seaman left behind him, when he died, a wife and three children very young; and with the said young children his wife was persecuted out of the said town of Mendlesham, because she would not go to hear mass, and all her corn and goods seized and taken away, by Mr. Christopher Cole's officers, he being lord of the said town.

Thomas Carman, (who, as is said, pledged Richard Crashfield at his burning, and thereupon was apprehended), being prisoner in Norwich, was one time with the rest examined and brought before the said bishop, who answered no less in his Master's cause than the others; and therefore had the like reward that the others had, which was the bishop's bloody blessing of condemnation, and delivered to the secular power, who kept him with the others until the day of slaughter, which was not long after.

Thomas Hudson was of Ailesham, in Norfolk, by his occupation a glover, a very honest poor man, having a wife and three children, labouring always truly and diligently in his vocation, being thirty years of age, and bearing so good a will to the gospel, that he in the days of king Edward the Sixth, two years before queen Mary's reign learned to read English of Antony and Thomas Norgate, of the same town, wherein he greatly profited about the time of the alteration of religion:

for when queen Mary came to reign, and had changed the service of the church, putting in for wheat, chaff and darnel, and for good preaching, blasphemous crying out against truth and godliness; he then avoiding all their ceremonies of superstition, absented himself from his house, and went into Suffolk a long time, and there remained travelling from one place to another, as occasion offered. At last he returned back to his house at Ailesham, to comfort his wife and children, being heavy and troublesome with his absence.

Now when he came home, and perceived his continuance there would be dangerous, he and his wife devised to make him a place among his faggots to hide himself in, where he remained all the day reading and praying continually, for the space of half a year, and his wife, like an honest woman, being careful for him, used herself faithfully and diligently towards him.

In the mean time came the vicar of the town (who was one of the bishop's commissaries, a very wicked man) and inquired of Thomas Hudson's wife for her husband. Unto whom she answered, as not knowing where he was. Then the said Berry waxed angry, and threatened to burn her, because she would not tell where her husband was. After that when Hudson understood it, he grew every day more zealous than before, and continually read and sung psalms, the people openly resorting to him, to hear his exhortations and prayers.

At last he walked abroad for certain days openly in the town, crying out continually against the mass and all their trumpery, and in the end coming home to his house, he sat him down, having his book by him, reading and singing psalms continually without ceasing, for three days and three nights together, to the great wonder of many.

Then one John Crouch, his next neighbour, went to the constables, Robert Marsham and Robert Lawes, in the night, to certify them thereof: for Berry commanded openly to watch for him, and the constables understanding the same, went to catch him at break of day, the 22d of April, 1558.

And when Hudson saw them come in, he said, Now mine hour is come: welcome friends, welcome. You be they that shall lead me to life in Christ. I thank God for it, and the Lord enable me thereto for his mercy's sake. Then they took him and led him to Berry, the commissary, who was vicar of the town, and the said Berry asked him, first, Where he kept his church for four years before? To which the said Hudson answered thus, Wheresoever he was, there was the church.

Dost thou not believe, said Berry, in the sacrament of the altar? What is it?

Hudson. It is worms meat: my belief is in Christ crucified.

Berry. Dost thou not believe the mass to put away sins?

Hudson. No, God forbid; it is a patched monster, and a disguised puppet, more tedious a piecing than ever was Solomon's temple.

At which words Berry stamped, fumed, and shewed himself as a madman, and said, Well, thou villain, thou: I will write to the bishop, my good lord, and trust unto it, thou shalt be handled according to thy deserts. O, sir, said Hudson, there is no Lord but God, though there be many lords and many gods. With that Berry thrust him back with his hand. And one Richard Cliffar, standing by, said, I pray you, sir, be good to the poor man. At which words Berry was more mad than before, and would have had Cliffar bound in a recognizance of forty pounds for his good behaviour both in word and deed; but his desire took no effect. Then he asked Hudson whether he would recant, or not: to which Hudson answered, The Lord forbid! I had rather die many deaths than do so.

Then after long talk, the said Berry, seeing it to no purpose to persuade him, took his pen and ink, and wrote letters to the bishop thereof, and sent this Hudson to Norwich, bound like a thief, to him, which was eight miles from thence, who went thither singing with joy, as merry as ever he was in his life before. He was a month in prison, where he spent his time in reading and invoking the name of God.

These three christians and constant martyrs, William Seaman, Thomas Carman, and Thomas Hudson, after they were, (as you have heard) condemned the 19th day of May, 1558, were carried out of prison to the place where they should suffer, which was without Bishopsgate, at Norwich, called Lollard's Pit. And being all there, they made their humble petitions to the Lord. That being done, they arose and went to the stake, and standing all there with their chains about them, immediately Thomas Hudson came forth from them under the chain, to the great surprise of all the spectators; many doubted his constancy, fearing he should recant; others thought he wanted a reprieve for further conference; and some imagined he came forth to ask his parents blessing. In the midst of this confusion his two companions at the stake did all they could to comfort and encourage him, exhorting him in the bowels of Christ to be of good cheer, &c. But alas! he felt more in his conscience than they could conceive, for he was encompassed with intolerable grief of mind, not for fear of death, but for lack of an inward sensible feeling of the love of his Saviour: and therefore, being very careful, he humbly fell upon his knees, and vehemently prayed to God, who at last (according to his old mercies) sent him comfort; and then he arose in extacy of joy, as a new man changed even from death to life, and said, Now I thank God I am strong, and care not what man can do unto me. So going again to his companions at the stake, they all suffered death most joyfully, constantly, and manfully together, to the terror of the wicked, the comfort of good people, and the glory of God, whose name be praised for ever. Amen.

After this, the aforesaid commissary Berry made a great stir about others who were suspected in the town of Ailesham, and caused two hundred to creep to the crosses at Pentecost, besides other punishments which they sustained.

On a time this Berry gave a poor man of his parish of Marsham a blow with a flail, for a word's speaking, that presently thereon he died; and it is reported that the said Berry held up his hand at the bar for the same.

At another time one Alice Oxes, of the same parish, came to his house, and going into the hall he met her, and, being in an ill humour, struck her with his fist, whereupon she was fain to be carried home, and the next day was found dead in her chamber.

The number of whores and concubines he had is incredible to all, but those who lived near him. He was rich, and of great authority, and as great a reprobate, persecuting the gospel, and compelling men to idolatry; he burnt all the good books he could lay hands on, and divorced many men and women for religion.

When he heard that queen Mary was dead, and the glory of her triumph quelled, the Sunday after (being the 19th of November, 1558) he made a great feast, and had one of his concubines there, with whom he was in his chamber after dinner until even-song. Then went to church, where he had ministered baptism, and in his return from even-song, between the church-yard and his house, being but a little space (about the breadth of a church-yard) he fell down suddenly to the ground with a groan, and never stirred after, neither shewed any one token of repentance. And those that had his great riches since his death have so consumed them, that they be poorer now than they were before they had them.

Now let the reader observe the difference between the end of a martyr, and the end of a persecutor.

About this time Joan Seaman, mother to the aforesaid William Seaman, being of the age of 66 years, was persecuted by the said sir John Tyrrel also, because she would not go to mass and receive against her conscience: which good old woman being from her house, was glad sometime to lie in bushes, groves, and fields, and sometimes in her neighbour's house when she could. And her husband being at home, about 80 years old, fell sick; and she hearing thereof, with speed returned home to her house house again, not regarding her life, but considering her duty, and shewed her diligence to her husband most faithfully, till God took him away by death. Then by God's providence she fell sick also, and died in her own house soon after. When one Mr. Symonds, the commissary, heard of it, he (dwelling in a town hard by, called Thorndon) commanded that she should not have christian burial (as they termed it), and her friends were compelled to lay her in a pit under a moat's side. Her husband and she kept a good house, and had a good report amongst their neighbours, willing always to receive strangers, and to comfort the poor and sick, and lived together in the holy estate of matrimony very honestly above forty years; and she departed this life willingly and joyfully, with a stedfast faith and a good remembrance of God's promise in Jesus Christ.

A woman, called Mother Bennet, a widow, who lived in the town of Wetherset, near Mendlesham, was persecuted out of the town for not going to mass, but at last she returned home again secretly to her house, and there departed this life joyfully. But sir John Tyrrel, and Mr. Symonds, the commissary, would not let her be buried in the church-yard. So she was laid in a grave by the highway side.

This good old woman met one of mother Seaman's neighbours, and asked her how mother Seaman did; and the neighbour answered, that she did very well, God be thanked. O, said mother Bennet, mother Seaman hath stepped a great step before me; for she was never covetous, that I could perceive.

Her husband in his mirth would say unto her, O woman, if thou wert sparing, thou mightest have saved me an hundred marks more than thou hast. To which she would gently answer, O man, be content, and let us be thankful, for God hath given us enough, if we can see it. Alas, good husband, would she say, I tell you truth, I cannot firkin up my butter, and keep my cheese in the chamber, waiting for a great price, and let the poor want, and so displease God. But, husband, let us be rich in good works, and so shall we please the Lord, and have all good things given us, &c.

In the month of May likewise, William Harris, Richard Day, and Christian George, suffered at Colchester, and there joyfully and fervently made their prayers to God.

And being settled at the stake, and chained to the posts, with the fire flaming fiercely round about them, they, like constant christians, triumphantly praised God within the same, and offered up their bodies a lively sacrifice unto his holy Majesty, in whose habitation they have now their everlasting tabernacles: his name be therefore praised for evermore. Amen.

The said Christian George's husband had another wife burnt before this Christian, whose name was Agnes George, who suffered as you have heard, at Stratford the Bow. And after the death of the said Christian, he married an honest godly woman again, and so they both (I mean the said Richard George and his last wife) in the end were taken also, and laid in prison, where they remained till the death of queen Mary, and at last were delivered by our most gracious sovereign lady queen Elizabeth.

In the month of June came out a proclamation from the king and queen, against wholesome and godly books, which under the false title of heresy and sedition were wrongfully condemned in the said proclamation, which here follows.

By the King and Queen.

WHEREAS divers books, filled both with heresy, sedition, and treason, have of late, and be daily brought into this realm out of foreign countries and places beyond the seas, and some also covertly printed within this realm, and cast abroad in sundry parts thereof, whereby not only God is dishonoured, but also an encouragement given to disobey lawful princes and governors: the king and queen's majesties, for redress hereof, do by this their present proclamation declare and publish to all their loving subjects, that whosoever shall, after the proclaiming hereof, be found to have any of the said wicked and seditious books, or finding them do not forthwith burn the same, without shewing or reading the same to any other person, shall in that case be reputed and taken as a rebel, and shall without delay be executed for that offence, according to the order of martial law.

Given at our manor of St. James's, June the sixth.

JOHN CAWOOD, Printer.

The Apprehension of certain godly Men and Women, praying together in the Fields about Islington.

SECRETLY in a back close in a field by Islington, were gathered together a company of innocent persons, to the number of forty men and women. Who there sitting together at prayer, and virtuously occupied in the meditation of God's holy word, first cometh a certain man to them unknown, who looking over unto them, stayed and saluted them, saying, that they looked like men that meant no hurt. Then one of the said company asked the man if he could tell whose close that was, and whether they might be so bold to sit there. Yea, said he, because ye seem to be such persons as intend no harm; and so departed. Within a quarter of an hour after, came the constable of Islington, named King, with six or seven more, one with a bow, another with a bill, and the rest with weapons. Six or seven of this company were left behind in a private place, to be ready in case they were wanted, while the constable, and one with him went before to view them; they both went amongst them, looking and viewing what they were doing, and what books they had: and so going a little forward, and returning back again, ordered them to deliver their books. They understanding that he was a constable, refused not so to do. Then came up the rest of their fellows before-mentioned, who bade them stand and not depart. They answered again, they would be obedient and ready to go whithersoever they would have them, and they were first carried to a brewhouse at a small distance, while some of the company went to the nearest justice; but he being not at home, they were carried before sir Roger Cholmley. In the mean time some of the women escaped away from them, some in the close where they sat, and others before they came to the brewhouse. For so they were carried, ten with one man, eight with another, with some more, with others less, in such a manner as it was not hard for them to escape that would. In fine, they that were carried to sir Roger Cholmley, were twenty-seven, and sir Roger and the recorder taking their names in a bill, and calling them one by one, so many as answered to their names he sent to Newgate, which were twenty-two out of twenty-seven. They continued in prison seven weeks; and before they were examined, word was sent by Alexander, the keeper, that if they would hear a mass, they should all be delivered, but thirteen of them were burnt, seven in Smithfield, and six at Brentford; two died in prison, and the other seven, with much trouble (through God's providence) escaped death. Their names were these:

John Willes,	Hudleys,
Thomas Hinshaw,	T. Coast, haberdasher,
R. Baily, woolpacker,	Roger Sandy.
Robert Willes,

The names of the seven martyrs that were apprehended amongst others, in the close at Islington, and afterwards burnt in Smithfield, were as follows:

Henry Pond,	John Floyd,
Rainol Eastland,	John Holiday,
Robert Southam,	Roger Holland.
Matthew Ricarby,

These seven godly men had several articles administered to them by bishop Bonner, in the usual form; to which they returned their answers, and absolutely refusing to acknowledge the doctrine of the Romish church, church, were altogether condemned, the sentence being read against them, and so all seven by secular magistrates being sent to Newgate the 17th of June, not long after, about the 27th of the said month were brought to Smithfield, and there ended their lives in the glorious cause of Christ's gospel. Their particular examinations never came to our hands, except only those of Roger Holland, which here follow in the order and manner as we have received them by the information of some that were present at the same.

The Examination and Condemnation of ROGER HOLLAND.

THIS Roger Holland, a merchant-taylor of London, was first an apprentice with one Mr. Kempton, at the Black Boy in Watling-street, where he served his apprenticeship with much trouble to his master, in breaking him of the licentious liberty which he had before been trained and brought up in, giving himself to riot, as dancing, fencing, gaming, banquetting, and wanton company; and besides all this, being a stubborn and an obstinate papist, far unlike to come to any such end as God called him unto.

His master, notwithstanding his lewdness, trusted him with his accompts; and on a time he received the sum of thirty pounds for his master, and falling into ill company, lost every groat at dice, being past all hope which way to answer it, and therefore he purposed to convey himself beyond the seas, either into France or Flanders.

Having determined with himself thus to do, he called betimes in the morning on a servant in the house, an ancient and discreet maid, whose name was Elizabeth, who professed the gospel, with a life agreeing unto the same, and at all times much rebuking the wilful and obstinate papistry, as also the licentious living of this Roger Holland. To whom he said, Elizabeth, I would I had followed thy gentle persuasions and friendly rebukes; which if I had done, I had never come to this shame and misery which I am now fallen into; for this night I have lost thirty pounds of my master's money, which to pay him and to make up mine accounts I am not able. But this much, I pray you, desire my mistress, that she would entreat my master to take this note of my hand, that I am thus much indebted to him; and if I am ever able, I will see him paid, desiring him that the matter may pass with silence, and that none of my kindred and friends may ever understand this my lewd part: for if it should come to my father's ears, it would bring his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave; and so was he departing.

The maid considering that it might be his utter ruin, Stay, said she; and having a sum of money by her, which was left her by a kinsman at his death, who was thought to be Dr. Redman, she brought unto him thirty pounds, saying, Roger, here is thus much money, I will let thee have it, and I will keep this note. But since I do thus much for thee, to help thee, and to save thy honesty, thou shalt promise me to refuse all lewd and wild company, all swearing and ribaldry talk; and if ever I know thee to play one twelvepence at either dice or cards, then will I shew this thy note unto my master. And furthermore thou shalt promise me to resort every day to the lecture at All-hallows, and the sermon at St. Paul's every Sunday, and to cast away all thy books of popery and vain ballads, and get thee the Testament and book of service, and read the scriptures with reverence and fear, calling unto God still for his grace to direct thee in his truth. And pray fervently to God, desiring him to pardon thy former offences, and not to remember the sins of thy youth; and ever be afraid to break his laws, or offend his majesty. Then shall God keep thee, and send thee thy heart's desire.

After this time, within one half year God had wrought such a change in this man, that he was become an earnest professor of the truth, and detested all popery and ill company; so that he was in admiration to all them that had known him, and seen his former life and wickedness.

Then he repaired to his father in Lancashire, and brought divers good books with him, and bestowed them among his friends, so that his father and others began to taste the sweetness of the gospel, and to detest the mass, idolatry, and superstition; and in the end his father gave him fifty pounds to begin the world withal.

Then he came to London again, and went to the maid that lent him the money to pay his master withal, and said unto her, Elizabeth, here is thy money I borrowed of thee, and for the friendship, good will, and good council I have received at thy hands, to recompence thee I am not able, otherwise than by making thee my wife; and soon after they were married, which was in the first year of queen Mary. And having a child by her, he caused Mr. Rose to baptize it in his own house. Notwithstanding he was betrayed to the enemies, and he being gone into the country to convey the child away, that the papists should not have it in their anointing hands, Bonner caused his goods to be seized on, and most cruelly used his wife.

After this he remained closely in the city, and in the country, in the congregations of the faithful, until the last year of queen Mary. Then he with the six others before-named, were taken in, or not far from St. John's Wood, and so brought to Newgate upon May-day in the morning, 1558.

Then being called before the bishop, Dr. Chedsey, both the Harpsfields, and certain others, after many other fair and crafty persuasions of Dr. Chedsey, to allure him to their Babylonical church; thus the bishop began with him.

Holland, I for my part do wish well unto thee, and the more for thy friend's sake. And as Dr. Standish telleth me, you and he were both born in one parish, and he knoweth your father to be a very honest catholic gentleman: and Mr. Doctor told me that he talked with you a year ago; and found you very wilfully addicted to your own conceit. Divers of the city also have shewed me of you, that you have been a great procurer of men's servants to be of your religion, and to come to your congregations; but since you be now in the danger of the law, I would wish you to act a wise man's part: so shall you not want any favour I can do or procure for you, both for our own sake, and also for your friends, who are men of worship and credit, and wish you well, and by my troth, Roger, so do I.

Then said Mr. Eglestone, a gentleman of Lancashire, and near kinsman to Roger, being there present, I thank your good lordship; your honour meaneth good unto my cousin, I beseech God he have the grace to follow your counsel.

Holland. Sir, you crave of God you know not what. I beseech God to open your eyes to see the light of his word.

Eglestone. Roger, hold your peace, lest you fare the worse at my lord's hands.

Holland. No, I shall fare as it pleaseth God, for man can do no more than God doth permit him.

Then the bishop and the doctors, with Johnson, the register, casting their heads together, in the end said Johnson, Roger, how sayest thou? wilt thou submit thyself unto my lord, before thou be entered into the book of contempt?

Holland. I never meant but to submit myself unto the magistrates, as I learn of St. Paul to the Romans, chap. xiii. and so he recited the text.

Chedsey. Then I see you are no anabaptist.

Holland. I mean not yet to be a papist; for they and the anabaptists agree in this point, not to submit themselves to any other prince or magistrate, than those that must first be sworn to maintain them and their doings.

Chedsey. Roger, remember what I have said, and also what my lord hath promised he will perform with further friendship. Take heed, Roger, for your ripeness of wit hath brought you into these errors.

Holland. Mr. Doctor, I have yet your words in memory, though they are of no such force to prevail with me.

Then

Then they whispered together again, and at last Bonner said, Roger, I perceive thou wilt not be ruled by good counsel, for any thing that either I or your friends can say.

Holland. I may say to you, my lord, as St. Paul said to Felix and to the Jews, as doth appear in the 22d of the Acts, and in the 15th of the first epistle to the Corinthians. It is not unknown unto my master to whom I was apprentice withal, that I was of your blind religion that now is taught, and therein did obstinately and wilfully remain, until the latter end of king Edward, in manner, having that liberty under your auricular confession, that I made no conscience of sin, but trusted in the priest's absolution, he for money doing also some penance for me: which after I had given, I cared no further what offences I did, no more than he minded after he had my money, whether he tasted bread and water for me, or no: so that lechery, swearing, and all other vices, I accounted no offence of danger, so long as I could for money have them absolved. So straitly did I observe your rules of religion, that I would have ashes upon Ash Wednesday, though I had used ever so much wickedness at night. And albeit I could not of conscience eat flesh upon the Friday, yet in swearing, drinking, or dicing all the night long, I made no conscience at all. And thus I was brought up, and herein I have continued till now of late, that God hath opened the light of his word, and called me by his grace to repentance of my former idolatry and wicked life; for in Lancashire their blindness and whoredom is much more than may with chaste ears be heard. Yet these my friends, which are not clear in these notable crimes, think the priest with his mass can save them, though they blaspheme God, and keep concubines besides their wives, as long as they live. Yea, I know some priests very devout, my lord, yet such as have six or seven children by four or five sundry women.

Mr. Doctor, now to your antiquity, unity, and universality, (for these Dr. Chedsey alledged as notes and tokens of their religion) I am unlearned. I have no sophistry to shift my reasons withal; but the truth I trust I have, which needeth no painted colours to set her forth. The antiquity of our church is not from pope Nicholas, or pope Joan, but our church is from the beginning, even from the time that God said unto Adam, that the seed of the woman should break the serpent's head; and so to faithful Noah, to Abraham, to Isaac, and Jacob, to whom it was promised, that their seed should multiply as the stars in the sky; and so to Moses, David, and all the holy fathers that were from the beginning unto the birth of our Saviour Christ. All they that believed these promises were of the church, though their number were oftentimes but few and small, as in Elias's days, when he thought there was none but he that had not bowed their knees to Baal, when God had reserved seven thousand that never had bowed their knees to that idol: as I trust there be seven hundred thousand more than I know of, that have not bowed their knees to the idol your mass, and your god Maozim; the upholding whereof is your bloody cruelty, while you daily persecute Elias and the servants of God, forcing them (as Daniel was in his chamber) closely to serve the Lord their God; and even as we by this your cruelty are forced in the fields to pray unto God, that his holy word may be once again truly preached amongst us, and that he would mitigate and shorten these idolatrous and bloody days, wherein all cruelty reigneth. Moreover, of our church have been the apostles and evangelists, the martyrs and confessors of Christ, that have at all times and in all ages been persecuted for the testimony of the word of God. But for the upholding of your church and religion, what antiquity can you shew? Yea, the mass, that idol and chief pillar of your religion, is not yet four hundred years old, and some of your masses are younger, as that of St. Thomas Becket, the traitor, wherein you pray, That you may be saved by the blood of St. Thomas. And as for your Latin service, what are we of the laity the better for it? I think he that should hear your priests mumble up their service, although he did well understand Latin, yet should he understand few words thereof, the priests do so champ them and chew them, and post so fast, that they neither understand what they say, nor they that hear them; and in the mean time the people, when they should pray with the priest, are set to their beads to pray our lady's psalter. So crafty is Satan to devise these his dreams (which you defend with faggot and fire), to quench the light of the word of God; which, as David saith, should be a lanthorn to our feet. And again, wherein shall a young man direct his ways, but by the word of God? And yet you will hide it from us in a tongue unknown. St. Paul had rather have five words spoken with understanding, than ten thousand in an unknown tongue; and yet will you have your Latin service and praying in a strange tongue, whereof the people are utterly ignorant, to be of such antiquity?

The Greek church, and a good part of Christendom besides, never received your service in an unknown tongue, but in their own natural language, which all the people understand, neither yet your transubstantiation, your receiving in one kind, your purgatory, your images, &c.

As for the unity that is in your church, what is it else but treason, murder, poisoning one another, idolatry, superstition, and wickedness? What unity was in your church, when there were three popes at once? Where was your head of unity when you had a woman pope? Here he was interrupted, and could not be suffered to proceed.

The bishop then said, Roger, these thy words are downright blasphemy, and by the means of thy friends thou hast been suffered to speak, and art over malapert to teach any here. Therefore, keeper, take him away.

The second Examination of ROGER HOLLAND.

THE day that Henry Pond and the rest were brought forth to be again examined, Dr. Chedsey said, Roger, I trust you have now better considered of the church than you did before.

Holland. I consider thus much: that out of the church there is no salvation, as divers ancient doctors say.

Bonner. That is well said. Mr. Eglestone, I trust your kinsman will be a good catholic man. But, Roger, you mean, I trust, the church of Rome.

Holland. I mean that church which hath Christ for her head; which also hath his word and his sacraments according to his word and institution.

Then Chedsey interrupted him, and said, Is that a Testament you have in your hand?

Holland. Yea, Mr. Doctor, it is a New Testament. You will find no fault with the translation (I think). It is your own translation; it is according to the great Bible.

Bonner. How say you? How do you know that it is the Testament of Christ, but only by the church? For the church of Rome hath and doth preserve it, and out of the same hath made decrees, ordinances, and true expositions.

No (saith Roger), the church of Rome hath and doth suppress the reading of the Testament. And what a true exposition, I pray you, did the pope make thereof, when he set his foot on the emperor's neck, and said, "Thou shalt walk upon the lion and the asp; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou tread under thy foot," Psalm xci.

Then said the bishop, Such unlearned wild heads as thou and others, would be expositors of the scripture. Would you then the ancient learned (as there are some here as well as I) should be taught of you?

Holland. Youth delighteth in vanity. My wildness hath been somewhat the more by your doctrine, than ever I learned out of this book of God. But (my lord) I suppose some old doctors say, if a poor layman bring his reason and argument out of the word of God, he is to be credited before the learned, though they be ever such great doctors. For the gift of knowledge was taken from the learned doctors, and given to poor fishermen. Notwithstanding, I am ready to be instructed by the church.

Bonner. That is very well said, Roger. But you must understand that the church of Rome is the catholic lic church. Roger, for thy friend's sake (I promise thee) I wish thee well, and I mean to do thee good. Keeper, see he want nothing. Roger, if thou lackest any money to pleasure thee, I will see thou shalt not want. This he spake unto him alone, his companions being apart, with many other fair promises, and so he was sent to prison again.

The last Examination of ROGER HOLLAND.

THE last examination of Roger Holland was, when he with his fellow-prisoners were brought into the consistory, and there all excommunicated except Roger, and ready to have their sentence of judgment given, with many threatening words to affright them withal: the lord Strange, sir Thomas Jarret, M. Eglestone, &c.; and divers others of worship, both of Cheshire and Lancashire, that were Roger Holland's kinsmen and friends, being there present, who had been earnest suitors to the bishop in his favour, hoping for his safety of life. Now the bishop hoping yet to win him with his fair and flattering words, began after this manner.

Bonner. Roger, I have divers times called thee before me at my own house, and have conferred with thee, and being not learned in the Latin tongue, it doth appear unto me that thou hast a good memory, and very sensible in talk, but something over hasty, which is a natural impediment incident to some men. And surely they are not the worst natured men. For I myself am now and then too hasty, but mine anger is soon over. So, Roger, surely I have a good opinion of you, that you will not with these fellows cast yourself headlong from the church of your parents and your friends that are here, very good catholics (as it is reported unto me). And as I mean thee good, so, Roger, play the wise man's part, and come home with the lost son, and say, I have run into the church of schismatics and heretics, from the catholic church of Rome; and you shall, I warrant you, not only find favour at God's hands, but the church that hath authority shall absolve you, and put new garments upon you, and kill the satling to make thee good cheer withal, that is, in so doing, as meat doth refresh and cherish the mind, so shalt thou find as much quietness of conscience in coming home to the church, as did the hungry son that had been fed before with the hogs, as you have done with these heretics that sever themselves from the church. I give them a homely name, but they be worse (putting his hand to his cap out of reverence) than hogs: for they know the church, and will not follow it. If I should say thus much to a Turk, he would (I think) believe me. But, Roger, if I did not bear thee and thy friends good will, I would not have said so much as I have done, but I would have let mine ordinary alone with you.

At these words his friends there present thanked the bishop for his good will, and for the pains he had taken in his and their behalf.

Then the bishop proceeded, saying, Well, Roger, how say you? Do you not believe, that after the priest hath spoken the words of consecration, there remaineth the body of Christ really and corporally, under the forms of bread and wine? I mean the self-same body as was born of the Virgin Mary, that was crucified upon the cross, that rose again the third day.

Holland. Your lordship saith, the same body which was born of the Virgin Mary, which was crucified upon the cross, which rose again the third day: but you leave out, which ascended into heaven; and the scripture saith, he shall there remain until he come to judge the quick and the dead. Then he is not contained under the forms of bread and wine, by Hoc est corpus meum, &c.

Bonner. Roger, I perceive my pains and good will will not prevail, and if I should argue with thee, thou art so wilful (as all thy fellows be, standing in thine own singularity and foolish conceit), that thou wouldst still talk to no purpose this seven years, if thou mightest be suffered. Answer whether thou wilt confess the real and corporal presence of Christ's body in the sacrament, or wilt not?

Holland. My lord, although God by his sufferance hath here placed you, to set forth his truth and glory in us his faithful servants, notwithstanding your meaning is far from the zeal of Christ; and for all your words, you have the same zeal that Annas and Caiaphas had, trusting to their authority, traditions, and ceremonies, more than to the word of God.

Bonner. If I should suffer him, he would fall from reasoning to raving, as a frantic heretic.

Roger (said the lord Strange), I perceive my lord would have you tell him, whether you will submit yourself to him or no.

Yea, said Bonner, and confess this presence that I have spoken of.

With this Roger turned to the lord Strange and the rest of his kinsmen and friends, and very cheerfully kneeled down upon his knees and said, God, by the mouth of his servant St. Paul, hath said, "Let every soul submit himself unto the higher powers, and he that resisteth receiveth his own damnation;" and as you are a magistrate appointed by the will of God, so do I submit myself unto you, and to all such as are appointed for magistrates.

Bonner. That is well said, I see you are no anabaptist. How say you then to the presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar?

Holland. I say and beseech you all to mark and bear witness with me (for so you shall do before the judgment-seat of God) what I speak; for here is the conclusion: and ye, my dear friends (turning to his kinsmen), I pray you shew my father what I do say, that he may understand I am a christian man. I say and believe, and am therein fully persuaded by the scriptures, that the sacrament of the supper of our Lord, ministered in the holy communion according to Christ's institution, I being penitent and sorry for my sins, and minding to amend and lead a new life, and so coming worthily unto God's board in perfect love and charity, do there receive by faith the body and blood of Christ. And though Christ in his human nature sit at the right hand of his Father, yet (by faith I say) his death, his passion, his merits are mine, and by faith I dwell in him, and he in me. And as for the mass, transubstantiation, and the worshipping of the sacrament, they are mere impiety and horrible idolatry.

I thought so much, said Bonner, (suffering him to speak no more) how he would prove a very blasphemous heretic as ever I heard. How irreverently doth he speak of the blessed mass! And so read his sentence of condemnation, adjudging him to be burned.

All this while Roger was very patient and quiet, and when he should depart, he said, My lord, I beseech you suffer me to speak two words. The bishop would not hear him, but bade him away. Notwithstanding, being requested by one of his friends, he said, Speak, what hast thou to say?

Holland. Even now I told you that your authority was from God, and by his sufferance: and now I tell you God hath heard the prayer of his servants, which hath been poured forth with tears for his afflicted saints, whom you daily persecute, as now you do us. But this I dare be bold in God to say, (by whose Spirit I am moved) that God will shorten your hand of cruelty, that for a time you shall not molest his church. And this you shall in a short time well perceive, my dear brethren, to be most true. For after this day, in this place there shall not be any by him put to the trial of fire and faggot. And after that day there were none that suffered in Smithfield for the truth of the gospel.

Then said Bonner, Roger, thou art, I perceive, as mad in these thy heresies as ever was Joan Butcher. In anger and fume thou wouldst become a railing prophet. Though thou and all the rest of you would see me hanged, yet I shall live to burn, yea and I will burn all the sort of you that come into my hands, that will not worship the blessed sacrament of the altar, for all thy prattling: and so he went his way.

Then Roger Holland began to exhort his friends to repent, and to think well of them that suffered for the testimony testimony of the gospel, and with that the bishop came back, charging the keeper that no man should speak to them without his licence, and if they did, they would be committed to prison. In the mean time Henry Pond and Roger spake still unto the people, exhorting them to stand firm in the truth: adding moreover, that God would shorten these cruel and evil days for his elect's sake.

The day they suffered, a proclamation was made, that none should be so bold to speak or talk any word unto them, or receive any thing of them, or to touch them, upon pain of imprisonment, without either bail or mainprize; with other cruel threatening words contained in the same proclamation. Notwithstanding the people cried out, desiring God to strengthen them: and they likewise still prayed for the people, and the restoring of his word. At length Roger, embracing the stake and the reeds, said these words:

"Lord, I most humbly thank thy Majesty, that thou hast called me unto the state of death, unto the light of thy heavenly word, and now unto the fellowship of thy saints, that I may sing and say, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts. And, Lord, into thy hands I commit my spirit. Lord bless these thy people, and save them from idolatry." And so he ended his life, looking up unto heaven, praying to, and praising God, with the rest of his fellow-saints. For whose joyful constancy the Lord be praised.

An Account of the Martyrdom of Six Men, who suffered at Brentford, for the true Testimony of JESUS CHRIST.

THESE six martyrs were of the company of those who were apprehended in a close, near Islington (as is before-mentioned), and sent to prison. Whose names here follow:

Robert Mills,	John Slade,
Stephen Cotton,	William Pikes, alias
Robert Dynes,	Pikes the tanner.
Stephen Wight,

These six martyrs were burnt at Brentford, seven miles from London, on the 14th of July, 1558. They had their articles ministered to them by T. Darbyshire, Bonner's chancellor, at sundry times, to which they made their answers much after the same manner as others have done before.

When these good men came before Bonner's chancellor, Thomas Darbyshire, and had the articles ministered unto them, and they answered unto the same; in the end the chancellor commanded them to appear before him again the 11th day of July, at St. Paul's. Where when they came, he required of them, whether they would turn from their opinions to the holy mother church; and if not, that then, whether there were any cause to the contrary, but that he might proceed with the sentence of condemnation. Whereunto they all answered, That they would not go from the truth, nor relent from any part of the same while they lived. Then he charged them to appear before him again the next day in the afternoon, between one and two o'clock, to hear the definitive sentence read against them, according to the ecclesiastical laws then in force. At which time he sitting in judgment, talking with these godly and virtuous men, at last came into the said place, sir Edward Hastings, and sir Thomas Cornwallis, knights, two of queen Mary's officers of her house, and being there, they sat them down over against the chancellor, in whose presence the chancellor condemned those poor innocent lambs, and delivered them over to the secular power, who received and carried them to prison immediately, and there kept them in safety till the day of their death.

In the mean time this naughty chancellor slept not, I warrant you, but that day in which they were condemned, he made a certificate unto the lord chancellor's office, from whence the next day after a writ was sent to burn them at Brentford; which accordingly was accomplished. Whereunto being brought, they made their humble prayer to the Lord Jesus, undressed themselves, went joyfully to the stake, whereunto they were bound, and the fire flaming about them, they yielded their souls, bodies, and lives into the hands of the omnipotent God, for whose cause they did suffer, and to whose protection I commend the gentle reader. Amen.

Among these six was one William Pikes, a tanner (as you have heard), who some time dwelt in Ipswich, a very godly man, and of a virtuous disposition, a good keeper of hospitality, and beneficial to the persecuted in queen Mary's days. In the third year of queen Mary, a little after Midsummer, he (then being at liberty) went into his garden, and took with him a bible of Rogers's translation, where he, sitting with his face towards the South, reading in the said bible, suddenly there fell, between eleven and twelve o'clock, at mid-day, four drops of fresh blood upon the bible, and he knew not from whence it came. At which he was sore astonished, and could by no means learn (as I said) from whence it should fall: and wiping out one of the drops with his finger, he called his wife and said, In the virtue of God, wife, what meaneth this? Will the Lord have four sacrifices? I see well enough the Lord will have blood: his will be done, and give me grace to abide the trial. Wife, let us pray, for I fear the day draweth nigh. Afterwards he daily expected to be apprehended, and it came to pass accordingly, as you have heard. Thus much I thought good to write, in order to stir up our dull minds in considering the wonderful works of the Lord, and reverently to honour the same.

When he was so sick in Newgate that nobody expected him to live six hours, he expressed a great desire of martyrdom, saying, that he had been twice in persecution before, and that now he desired the Lord, if it were his will, that he might glorify his name at the stake; and so as he prayed it came to pass at Brentford.

Verses upon BONNER's Effigy.

MUSE not so much that nature's work
Is thus deformed now:
With belly blown, and head so swollen,
For I shall tell you how:
This cannibal in three years space
Two hundred martyrs slew:
They were his food, he so lov'd blood,
He spared none he knew.
It should appear that blood feeds fat,
If men lie well and soft:
For Bonner's belly waxt with blood,
Though he seemed to fast oft.
O bloody beast, bewail the death
Of those that thou hast slain:
In time repent, since thou canst not
Their lives restore again.

An Account of the scourging of THOMAS HINSHAW, by Bishop BONNER.

WHEN bishop Bonner found that his examinations, persuasions, threats, and imprisonments, were to no purpose with Thomas Hinshaw, he (the said bishop) took him with him to Fulham, where immediately after his coming, he was set in the stocks, remaining there all the first night with bread and water.

The next morning the bishop came and examined him himself, and perceiving no yielding in his mind, he sent Mr. Harpsfield to talk with him; who, after long talk, in the end fell to raging words, calling the said Thomas Hinshaw peevish boy, and asked him whether he thought he went about to damn his soul, or no, &c. Unto which the said Thomas answered, That he was persuaded that they laboured to maintain their dark and devilish devilish kingdom, and not for any love to truth. Then Harpsfield, being in a mighty rage, told the bishop thereof. Whereat the bishop fumed and fretted, that for anger being scarce able to speak, he said, Dost thou answer my archdeacon so, thou naughty boy? I shall handle thee well enough, be assured; so he sent for a couple of rods, and caused him to kneel against a long bench in an arbour in his garden, where the said Thomas, without any inforcement of his part, offered himself to the beating, and did abide the fury of the said Bonner, so long as the fat paunched bishop could endure with breath, and through weariness was obliged to cease, and give place to his shameful act. He had two willow rods, but he wasted but one, and so left off.

Now after this scourging, the said Thomas Hinshaw, notwithstanding, did sustain divers conflicts and examinations sundry times. At last being brought before the said bishop in his chapel at Fulham, there he had procured witnesses, and gathered articles against him, which the young man denied, and would not affirm, or consent to any interrogatory there and then ministered, do what they could.

About a fortnight after he fell sick of a burning ague, whereby he was delivered through much intreaty unto his master, Martin Pugson, in St. Paul's church-yard; for then the bishop thought verily he was more like to die than to live. Which sickness endured a twelve-month or more, so that in the mean time queen Mary died. Then he shortly after recovered health, and escaped death, being at the writing of this, both witness and reporter of the same; the Lord therefore be praised. Amen.

An Account of the scourging of JOHN WILLES, by Bishop BONNER.

BESIDES the above-named, was scourged also by the hands of the said bishop, one John Willes, a capper, a right faithful and true honest man in all his dealings and conditions, who was brother to the aforesaid Richard Willes, burned at Brentford, as is before said. Who also was apprehended in the same number at Islington, as also is mentioned before: and being brought before Bonner, and there examined, but was commanded to the Coal-house, with the aforesaid Thomas Hinshaw, where they remained one night in the stocks. From whence he was sent to Fulham, where he, with the said Hinshaw, remained eight or ten days in the stocks; during which time he sustained divers conflicts with the said Bonner, who had him often in examination, urging him, and with a stick which he had in his hand, often rapping him on the head, and flirting him under the chin, and on the ears, saying he looked down like a thief. Moreover, after he had assayed all manner of ways to make him recant, and could not, at length taking him to his orchard, there within a little arbour, with his own hands beat him first with a willow rod, and that being worn well nigh to the stumps, he called for a birch rod, which a lad brought out of his chamber. The cause why he so beat him was this; Bonner asked him when he had crept to the cross. He answered, Not since he came to the years of discretion, neither would, though he should be torn with wild horses. Then Bonner desired him to make a cross on his forehead, which he refused to do. Whereupon he had him immediately to his orchard, and there calling for rods, shewed his cruelty upon him, as he had done upon Thomas Hinshaw.

This done, he had him immediately to the parish church of Fulham, with the said Thomas Hinshaw, and Robert Willes, to whom there being severally called before him, he ministered certain articles, asking if he would subscribe to the same. To which he made his answer according to his conscience, denying them all except one article, which was concerning king Edward's service in English. Shortly after this beating, Bonner sent a certain old priest lately come from Rome, to him in prison, to conjure the evil spirit out from him, who laying his hand upon his head, began with certain words pronounced over him, to conjure as he had been wont before to do. Willes marvelling at what the old man was about, said, I trust no evil spirit is in me, and laughed him to scorn.

As this John Willes was divers times called before Bonner, so much communication passed between them as is too tedious to recite. It is enough to make the reader laugh to see the blind and unfavoury reasons with which that bishop endeavoured to delude the ignorant, some of which were in the following manner: Bonner going about to persuade Willes not to meddle with matters of scripture, but rather to believe other men's teaching, who had more skill in the same, asked him first, if he did believe the scripture? Yea, said he, that I do. Then (quoth the bishop) St. Paul saith, If the man sleep, the woman is at liberty to go to another man. If thou wert asleep, having a wife, wouldst thou be content that thy wife should take to another man? And yet this is the scripture.

Also, if thou wilt believe Luther, Zuinglius, and such, then thou canst not go right: but if thou wilt believe me, &c. thou canst not err: and if thou shouldst err, yet thou art in no danger, thy blood should be required at our hands. As if thou shouldst go to a far country, and meet with a fatherly man, as I am (these were his words) and ask the way to the city, and he should say, this way, and thou wilt not believe him, but follow Luther, and other heretics of late days, and go a contrary way; how wilt thou come to the place thou askest for? So if thou wilt not believe me, but follow the leading of other heretics, thou shalt be brought to destruction, and burn both body and soul.

As truly as thou seest the bodies of them in Smithfield burnt, so truly their souls do burn in hell, because they err from the true church.

Ofentimes speaking to the said John Willes, he would say, They call me bloody Bonner. A vengeance on you all: I would fain be rid of you, but you have a delight in burning. But if I might have my will, I would sew up your mouths and put you in sacks and drown you.

The same day that he was delivered, Bonner came to the stocks where he lay, and asked him how he liked his lodging, and his fare.

Well (said Willes), if it would please God, I might have a little straw to lie or sit upon.

Then (said Bonner) thou wilt shew no token of a christian man. And upon this his wife came in unknown to him, being very great with child, every hour expecting her labour, and intreated the bishop for her husband, saying, that she would not go from thence, but that she would there stay, and be delivered in the bishop's house, unless she had her husband with her. How sayest thou (quoth Bonner to Willes), if thy wife miscarry, or thy child, or children, if she be with one or two, should perish, the blood of them would he require at thy hands. Then to this agreement he came, that he should hire a bed in the town of Fulham, and her husband should go home with her the morrow after, upon this condition, that his kinsman there present (one Robert Rouse) should bring the said Willes to his house at St. Paul's the next day.

To which Willes would not agree, but insisted upon going then. At length, his wife being importunate for her husband, and Bonner seeing she would not stir without him, fearing belike the rumour that might come upon his house thereby, and also probably fearing to be troubled with a lying-in woman, bade Willes make a cross, and say, In nomine Patris, & Filii, & Spiritus Sancti, Amen.

Then Willes began to say, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen. No, no (saith Bonner), say it me in Latin; Willes understanding the matter of that Latin to be good, said the same, and so went home with his wife, his aforesaid kinsman being charged to bring him the next day to St. Paul's; else, said Bonner, if thou dost not bring him, thou art an heretic as well as he. Notwithstanding, the charge being no greater, his kinsman did not bring him, him, but he of his own accord came to the bishop within a few days after, where he put to him a certain writing in Latin to subscribe unto, containing, as it seemed to him, no great matter, that he needed greatly to stick at, although, what the bill was, he could not certainly tell: so he subscribed to the bill, and returned home. And thus much concerning the twenty-two taken at Ilington.

The History of RICHARD YEOMAN, Dr. TAYLOR's Curate, at Hadley.

RICHARD YEOMAN, a devout old man, was Dr. Taylor's curate, at Hadley, and well versed in the scriptures, and giving godly exhortations to the people: with him Dr. Taylor left his cure at his departure. But as soon as Mr. Newall had gotten the benefice, he put out Mr. Yeoman, and set in a popish curate to maintain and continue their Romish religion, which now they thought fully established. Then he wandered from place to place, exhorting all men to stand faithfully to God's word, earnestly to give themselves unto prayer, with patience to bear the cross now laid upon them for their trial; with boldness to confess the truth before their adversaries, and with an undoubted hope to wait for the crown and reward of eternal felicity. But when he perceived his adversaries to lie in wait for him, he went into Kent, and with a little packet of laces, pins and points, and such like things, he travelled from village to village, selling such things, and by that shift subsisted himself, his wife and children.

At last justice Moyle, of Kent, took Mr. Yeoman and set him in the stocks a day and a night, but having no evident matter to charge him with, he let him go again. So he came secretly again to Hadley, and tarried with his poor wife, who kept him secretly in a chamber of the town-house, commonly called the Guildhall, more than a year. All which time the good old father abode in a chamber locked up all the day, and spent his time in devout prayer, and reading the scriptures, and in carding of wool which his wife did spin. His wife did also go and beg bread and meat for herself and her children, and by such poor means they sustained themselves. Thus the saints of God sustained hunger and misery, while the prophets of Baal lived in jollity, and were costily pampered at Jezabel's table.

At last parson Newall (I know not by what means) perceived that Richard Yeoman was so kept by his poor wife, and taking with him the bailiff's deputies and servants, came in the night-time, and broke open five doors to get at Yeoman, whom he found in bed with his wife and children: whom when he had so found, he angrily cried, I thought I should find an harlot and a rogue together. And he would have plucked the cloaths off from them: but Yeoman held fast the cloaths, and said unto his wife, Wife, arise, and put on thy cloaths. And unto the parson he said, Nay, parson, no harlot, nor rogue, but a married man and his wife, according to God's ordinance, and blessed be God for lawful matrimony. I thank God for his great grace, and I defy the pope and all his popery. Then they led Richard Yeoman unto the cage, and set him in the stocks until it was day.

There was then also in the cage an old man named John Dale, who had sat there three or four days, because when the said parson Newall with his curate used the Romish service in the church, he spake openly unto him, and said, O miserable and blind guides, will ye ever be blind leaders of the blind? will ye never amend? will ye never see the truth of God's word? will neither God's threats nor promises enter into your hearts? will the blood of martyrs nothing mollify your stony stomachs? O obdurate, hard-hearted, perverse, and crooked generation! O damnable sort, whom nothing can do good unto.

These, or the like words, he spake in fervency of spirit against the superstitious religion of Rome. Wherefore parson Newall caused him forthwith to be attached, and set in the stocks in a cage, so was he kept there till sir Henry Doile, a justice, came to Hadley.

When poor Yeoman was taken, the parson called earnestly upon sir Henry Doile to send them both to prison. Sir Henry Doile earnestly intreated the parson to consider the age of the men and their mean condition; they were neither persons of note nor preachers; wherefore he would desire him to let them be punished a day or two, and so to let them go, at least John Dale, who was no priest: and therefore seeing he had so long sat in the cage, he thought it punishment enough for this time. When the parson heard this, he was exceeding mad, and in a great rage called them pestilent heretics, unfit to live in the commonwealth of christians. Wherefore I beseech you, sir, (quoth he) according to your office, defend holy church, and help to suppress these heretics, &c. which are false to God, and thus boldly set themselves, to the evil example of others, against the queen's gracious proceedings. Sir Henry Doile seeing he could do no good in the matter, and fearing also the danger of meddling too much in it, made out the writ, and caused the constables to carry them to Bury gaol. For now all the justices, though ever so many, were afraid of a shaven crown, and stood in as much awe of them, as Pilate did of Annas and Caiaphas, and the pharisaical brood, who cried, "Crucify him, crucify him; if thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend."

Wherefore whatsoever their consciences were, yet (if they would escape danger) they must needs be the popish slaves and vassals. So they took Richard Yeoman and John Dale pinioned, and bound them like thieves, set them on horseback, and bound their legs under the horses bellies, and so carried them to Bury goal, where they were laid in irons; and because they continually rebuked popery, they were thrown into the lowest dungeon, where John Dale, through sickness of the prison, and evil keeping, died in prison, whose body, when he was dead, was thrown out and buried in the fields. He was a man of forty-six years of age, a weaver by his occupation, well learned in the holy scriptures, faithful and honest in all his conversation, stedfast in confession of the true doctrine of Christ set forth in king Edward's time; for which he joyfully suffered prison and chains, and from this worldly dungeon he departed in Christ to eternal glory, and the blessed paradise of eternal felicity.

After that John Dale was dead, Richard Yeoman was removed to Norwich prison, where after strait and evil keeping, he was examined of his faith and religion. Then he boldly and constantly confessed himself to be of the faith and confession that was set forth by king Edward VI. and from that he would in no wise vary. Being required to submit himself to the holy father the pope; I defy him (quoth he) and all his detestable abominations: I will in no wise have to do with him, nor any thing that appertaineth to him. The chief articles objected to him, were his marriage and the mass sacrifice. Wherefore when he continued stedfast in confession of the truth, he was condemned, degraded, and not only burnt, but most cruelly tormented in the fire. So he ended his poor and miserable life, and entered into the blessed bosom of Abraham, enjoying with Lazarus the comfortable quietness that God hath prepared for his elect saints.

The Story of JOHN ALCOCK.

THIS young man was by occupation a sheerman, and came to Hadley to seek work; he being in church one Sunday, and parson Newall coming by with the procession, would not once move his cap, nor shew any sign of reverence, but stood behind the font. The parson perceiving this, when he was almost out of the church door, ran back again, and caught him, and called for the constable.

Then came Robert Rolfe, with whom this young man had wrought, and said, What hath he done, Mr. Parson, that you are in such a rage with him?

He

He is an heretic and traitor (quoth the parson), and despiseth the queen's proceedings. Wherefore I command you in the queen's name, have him to the stocks, and see he be forthcoming.

Well (quoth Rolfe) he shall be forthcoming, proceed in your business, and be quiet.

Have him to the stocks, quoth the parson.

I am constable, quoth Rolfe, and I may bail him, and will bail him; he shall not be put in the stocks, but he shall be forthcoming: so the good parson went forth with his holy procession, and so to mass.

In the afternoon Rolfe said to this young man, I am sorry for thee, for truly the parson will seek thy destruction, if thou take not good heed what thou answerest him.

The young man said, Sir, I am sorry that it is my hap to be a trouble to you. As for myself, I am not sorry, but I commit myself into God's hands, and I trust he will give me mouth and wisdom to answer according to right.

Well, quoth Rolfe, yet beware of him, for he is malicious and a blood-sucker, and beareth an old hatred against me, and he will handle you the more cruelly, because of displeasure against me.

I fear not, quoth the young man: he shall do no more to me, than God will give him leave; and happy shall I be if God will call me to die for his truth's sake.

Then they went to the parson, who at the first asked him, Fellow, what sayest thou to the sacrament of the altar?

I say, quoth he, as ye use the matter, ye make a shameful idol of it, and ye are false idolatrous priests, all the sort of you.

I told you (quoth the parson) he was a stout heretic.

So after long talk, the parson committed him to prison, and the next day he rode up to London, and carried the young man with him; and so the young man came no more to Hadley, but after a long imprisonment in Newgate, where after many examinations and troubles, for that he would not submit himself to ask forgiveness of the pope, and to be reconciled to the Romish religion, he was cast into the lower dungeon, where with ill keeping and sickness of the house, he died in prison. Thus died he a martyr of God's truth, which he heartily confessed, and received the garland of a well-fought battle at the hand of the Lord. His body was cast out, and buried in a dunghill; for the papists would in all things be like themselves; therefore they would not so much as suffer the dead bodies to have convenient burial.

The History of THOMAS BENBRIDGE, Gentleman and Martyr, wrongfully condemned and put to death for the Testimony of Christ.

THOMAS BENBRIDGE, a gentleman, (unmarried) in the diocese of Winchester, although he might have lived a gentleman's life, in the wealthy possessions of this world; yet to follow Christ had rather enter into the strait gate of persecution, to the heavenly possession of life in the Lord's kingdom, than here to enjoy present pleasures with unquietness of conscience. Wherefore manfully standing against the papists for the defence of the sincere doctrine of Christ's gospel, he spared not himself to confirm the truth of the same. For which cause he being apprehended for an adversary to the Romish religion, was forthwith had to examination before the bishop of Winchester, where he sustained certain conflicts for the truth against the said bishop and his colleague; for which he was condemned, and some time after brought to the place of martyrdom, by sir Richard Pecksal, sheriff.

When standing at the stake, he began to untie his points, and to prepare himself; then he gave his gown to the keeper, being belike his fee. His jerkin was laid on with gold lace, fair and brave, which he gave to sir Richard Pecksal, the high-sheriff. His cap of velvet he took off from his head and threw it away. Then lifting his mind to the Lord, he made his prayers.

That done, being now fastened to the stake, Dr. Seaton willed him to recant, and he should have his pardon; but when he saw it prevailed not to speak, the said dreaming doctor willed the people not to pray for him unless he would recant, no more than they would pray for a dog.

Mr. Benbridge, standing at the stake with his hands together in such manner as the priest holdeth his hands in his Memento, the said Dr. Seaton came to him again and exhorted him to recant: unto whom he said, Away, Babylonian, away.

Then said one that stood by, Sir, cut out his tongue, and another being a temporal man, railed on him worse than Dr. Seaton did, who (as is thought) was set on by some other.

Thus when they saw he would not yield, they bade the tormentors to set to fire, and yet he was nothing like covered with faggots. First, the fire took away a piece of his beard, whereat he did not shrink at all. Then it came on the other side and took his legs, and the nether stockings of his hose being leather, made the fire to pierce the sharper, so that the intolerable heat thereof made him to cry, I recant: and suddenly he thrust the fire from him. And having two or three of his friends by that wished his life, they stepped to the fire, and helped to take it from him also, who for their labour were sent to prison. The sheriff also of his own authority took him from the stake and sent him to prison again, for which he was sent unto the Fleet, and lay there some time. But before he was taken from the stake, the said Dr. Seaton wrote articles to have him subscribe unto them, as touching the pope, the sacrament, and such other trash. But the said Mr. Benbridge made much ado before he would subscribe them, insomuch that Dr. Seaton ordered them to set to fire again. Then with much pain and grief of heart he subscribed to them upon a man's back.

That being done, he had his gown given him again, and so was led to prison. Being in prison, he wrote a letter to Dr. Seaton, and recanted those words he spake at the stake, unto which he had subscribed: for he was grieved that ever he subscribed unto them. Whereupon expressing his conscience, he was the same day seven-night after burnt indeed, where the vile tormentors did rather broil than burn him. The Lord give his enemies repentance.

An Account of the Martyrdom of JOHN COOKE, a Sawyer, ROBERT MILES, alias PLUMMER, Sheerman, ALEXANDER LANE, a Wheelwright, JAMES ASHLEY, Bachelor.

THE examination of these above-mentioned persons, being severally called before the bishop of Norwich, and sir Edward Walgrave, with others, was partly upon these articles following.

First, sir Edward Walgrave called John Cooke to him, and said, How doth it happen that you go not to your church?

Cooke. I have been there.

Sir Edw. What is the cause that you go not thither now in these days?

Cooke. Because the sacrament of the altar is an abominable idol, and the vengeance of God will come upon all them that do maintain it.

Sir Edw. O thou rank traitor, if I had as good commission to cut out thy tongue, as I have to sit here this day, thou shouldst be fure to have it done.

Then he commanded the constable to take him away, saying, he was both a traitor and a rebel.

Then he called Robert Miles, and said, How happeneth it, that you will not go to church?

Miles. Because I will follow no false gods.

Then said the bishop, Who told thee that it is a god?

Even you, quoth Miles, and such as you are.

Then the bishop commanded him aside, and to appear before him the next day.

Then he called Alexander Lane before him, and asked him how it chanced, that he would not go to the church.

He said, that his conscience would not serve him so to do.

Sir Edward said, How dost thou believe?

Lane answered, Even as it is written in God's books.

Then sir Edward commanded him to say his belief.

Then Lane, being somewhat abashed, said his belief to these words, which he missed unawares, "Born of the Virgin Mary."

Then said sir Edward, What, was he not born of the Virgin Mary?

Yes, said Lane, I would have said so.

Nay, said sir Edward, you are one of Cooke's scholars, and so commanded him away, and to come before him the next day.

After the like manner they passed also with James Ashley, whom they warned the next day likewise to appear before them again. So in fine they appearing again, had their condemnation. And thus these four blessed martyrs innocently suffered together at St. Edmund's-Bury, as is afore said, about the beginning of August, not long before the sickness of queen Mary.

An Account of the Martyrdom of two godly Persons at Ipswich, for the everlasting Testimony of Christ, namely, ALEXANDER GOUCH, and ALICE DRIVER.

MR. NOONE, a justice in Suffolk, dwelling in Martlesham, hunting after good men to apprehend them, (as he was a bloody tyrant in the time of trial) at length had intelligence of one Alexander Gouch, of Woodbridge, and Driver's wife, of Grosborough, to be at Grosborough together, a little from his house, and immediately took his men with him, and went thither, and made diligent search for them, where the poor man and woman were compelled to get into an hay-loft to hide themselves from their cruelty. At length they came to search the hay for them, and by gaging thereof with pitchforks, at last found them: so they took them and led them to Melton gaol, where they remaining a good while, at last were carried to Bury, against the assize at St. James's-tide, and being there examined of matters of faith, did boldly stand to confess Christ crucified, defying the pope and his papistical trash. And among other things, Driver's wife likened queen Mary in her persecution, to Jezebel; and so in that sense called her Jezebel: for that sir Clement Higham, being chief judge there, ordered her ears immediately to be cut off, which was accomplished accordingly, and she joyfully yielded herself to the punishment, and thought herself happy that she was counted worthy to suffer any thing for the name of Christ.

After the assize at Bury, they were carried to Melton gaol again, where they remained a time. This Alexander Gouch was a man of the age of 36 years, or thereabouts, and by his occupation a weaver of sheding coverlets, dwelling at Woodbridge, in Suffolk, and born at Uxford, in the same county. Driver's wife was a woman about the age of 30 years, and dwelt at Grosborough, (where they were taken) in Suffolk: her husband did use husbandry. These two were carried from Melton gaol to Ipswich, where they remained, and were examined. Which examination, as it came to hands, hereafter followeth.

The First Examination of ALICE DRIVER, before Dr. SPENSER, the Chancellor of Norwich.

FIRST, she coming into the place where she should be examined, with a smiling countenance, Dr. Spenser said, Why, woman, dost thou laugh us to scorn?

No. 55.

Driver's Wife. Whether I do or no, I might well enough, to see what fools ye be.

Then the chancellor asked her wherefore she was brought before him, and why she was laid in prison.

Dri. Wherefore? I think I need not tell you; for you know it better than I.

Spenser. No, by my troth, woman, I know not why.

Dri. Then have you done me much wrong thus to imprison me, and know no cause why; for I know no evil that I have done, I thank God, and I hope there is no man that can accuse me of any notorious fact that I have done, justly.

Spensf. Woman, woman, what sayest thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Dost thou not believe that it is very flesh and blood, after the words be spoken of consecration?

Driver's wife at those words held her peace, and made no answer. Then a great chuff-headed priest that stood by, spake, and asked her why she made not the chancellor answer. With that the said Driver's wife looked upon him austere, and said, Why, priest, I come not to talk with thee, but I come to talk with thy master: but if thou wilt I shall talk with thee, command thy master to hold his peace. And with that the priest put his nose in his cap, and spake never a word more. Then the chancellor bid her make answer to that he demanded of her.

Dri. Sir, pardon me though I make no answer, for I cannot tell what you mean thereby; for in all my life I never heard nor read of any such sacrament in all the scripture.

Spensf. Why, what scriptures have you read, I pray you?

Dri. I have (I thank God) read God's book.

Spensf. Why, what manner of book is that you call God's book?

Dri. It is the Old and New Testament. What call you it?

Spensf. That is God's book indeed; I cannot deny.

Dri. That same book have I read throughout, but yet never could find any such sacrament there; and for that cause I cannot make you answer to that thing I know not. Notwithstanding, for all that, I will grant you a sacrament, called the Lord's supper: and therefore seeing I have granted you a sacrament, I pray you shew me what a sacrament is.

Spensf. It is a sign. And one Dr. Gascoine being by, confirmed the same, that it was the sign of a holy thing.

Dri. You have said the truth, sir. It is a sign indeed, I must needs grant it: and therefore seeing it is a sign, it cannot be the thing signified also. Thus far we do agree; for I have granted your own saying.

Then stood up the said Gascoine, and made an oration with many fair words, but little to the purpose, being both offensive and odious to the minds of the godly. In the end of which long tale, he asked her if she did not believe the omnipotency of God, and that he was almighty, and able to perform that he spake. She answered, Yes; and said, I do believe that God is almighty, and able to perform that he spake and promised.

Gascoine. Very well. Then he said to his disciples, "Take, eat, this is my body:" Ergo, it was his body. For he was able to perform that he spake, and God useth not to lie.

Dri. I pray you did he ever make any such promise to his disciples, that he would make the bread his body?

Gascoine. Those be the words. Can you deny it?

Dri. No; they be the very words indeed, I cannot deny it; but I pray you, was it not bread that he gave unto them?

Gascoine. No, it was his body.

Dri. Then was it his body that they did eat over night?

Gascoine. It was his body.

Dri. What body was it then that was crucified the next day?

7 T

Gascoine.

Gasc. It was Christ's body.

Dri. How could that be, when the disciples had eaten him over night? except he had two bodies, as by your argument he had; one they did eat over night, and he was crucified the next day. Such a doctor, such a doctrine! Be you not ashamed to teach the people, that Christ had two bodies? In the 22d of Luke, "He took bread and brake it to his disciples," saying, "Take, &c. and do this in remembrance of me." St. Paul saith, 1. Cor. xi. "Do this in remembrance of me: for as often as ye shall eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye shall shew the Lord's death till he come:" and therefore I marvel you blush not before all this people, to lie so manifestly as you do.

With that Gascoin held his peace, and made her no answer; for, as it seemed, he was ashamed of his doings. Then the chancellor lift up his head off from his cushion, and commanded the gaoler to take her away.

Dri. Now ye be not able to resist the truth, ye command me to prison again. Well, the Lord in the end shall judge our cause, and to him I leave it. So away she went with the gaoler.

The Second Examination of ALICE DRIVER.

THE next day she came before them again, and the chancellor then asked her, what she said to the blessed sacrament of the altar?

Dri. I will say nothing to it: for you will neither believe me nor yourselves: for yesterday I asked you what a sacrament was, and you said, it was a sign; and I agreed thereto, and said it was the truth, confirming it by the scriptures, so that I went not from your own words; and now you come and ask me again of such a sacrament as I told you I never read of in the scriptures.

Spens. Thou liest, naughty woman, we did not say that it was a sign.

Dri. Why, masters, be ye not the men that you were yesterday? Will ye eat your own words? Are ye not ashamed to lie before all this multitude here present, who heard you speak the same?

Then stood up Dr. Gascoin, and said, she was deceived; for there are three churches, the malignant church, the church militant, and the church triumphant. So he would fain have made matter, but he could not tell which way.

Dri. Sir, is there mention made of so many churches in the scripture?

Gasc. Yea.

Dri. I pray you where find you this word [church] written in the scripture?

Gasc. It is written in the New Testament.

Dri. I pray you, sir, shew the place where it is written.

Gasc. I cannot tell the place, but there it is. With that she desired him to look in his Testament: then he fumbled and sought about him for one; but at that time he had none, and that he knew well enough, though he seemed to search for it. At last she said, Have you none here, sir?

Gasc. No.

Dri. I thought so much indeed, that you were little acquainted withal. Surely you are a good doctor. You say you sit here to judge according to the law, and how can you give judgment, and have not the book of the law with you? At which words Dr. Gascoin was out of countenance, and asked her if she had one.

No, said she.

Then, said he, I am as good a doctor as you.

Dri. Well, sir, I had one, but you took it from me (as you would take me from Christ, if you could), and since you would not suffer me to have any book at all; so burning is your charity. But you may well know (I thank God), that I have exercised the same; else I could not have answered you (to God's glory be it spoken) as I have. Thus she put them all to silence, so that one looked on another, and had not a word to speak.

Dri. Have you no more to say? God be honoured. You be not able to resist the Spirit of God in me, poor woman. I was an honest poor man's daughter, never brought up in the university as you have been, but I have driven the plough before my father many a time: yet notwithstanding, in the defence of God's truth, and in the cause of my master Christ, by his grace I will set my foot against the foot of any of you all, in the maintenance and defence of the same; and if I had a thousand lives, they should go for payment thereof.—So the chancellor rose up, and read the sentence of condemnation in Latin, and committed her to the secular power; and so she went to prison again as joyful as the bird of day, praising and glorifying the name of God.

Martyrdom of ALEXANDER GOUCH and ALICE DRIVER.

THIS Alexander Gouch was examined chiefly of the sacrament and other ceremonies of the popish church. And for that his belief was, that Christ was ascended into heaven, and there remaineth, and that the sacrament was the remembrance of his death and passion, and for refusing the mass, and the pope to be supreme head of Christ's church, for these causes was he condemned, and died with Alice Driver, at Ipswich, the 4th of November, which was the Monday after All-Saints, 1558.

These two persons being come to the place where the stake was set, by seven o'clock in the morning, notwithstanding they came the same morning from Melton gaol, which is six miles from Ipswich, being at their prayers, and singing of psalms both of them together, sir Henry Dowel, being then sheriff, was very much offended with them, and desired the bailiffs of Ipswich to bid them make an end of prayers: they kneeling upon a broom faggot, one of the bailiffs, whose name was Richard Smart, commanded them to make an end, saying, On, on, have done; make an end, nail them to the stake; yet they continued in prayer.

Then sir Henry sent one of his men, whose name was Richard Cove, that they should make an end.

Then Gouch stood up and said unto the sheriff, I pray you, Mr. Sheriff, let us pray a little while, for we have but a little time to live here.

Then said the bailiff, Come off, have them to the fire.

Then the said Gouch, and Alice Driver, said, Why, Master Sheriff, and Master Bailiff, will you not suffer us to pray?

Away, said sir Henry, to the stake with them.

Gouch answered, Take heed, Mr. Sheriff, if you forbid prayer, the vengeance of God hangeth over your heads. Then they being tied to the stake, and the iron chain being put about Alice Driver's neck, O (said she) here is a goodly handkerchief, blessed be God for it.

Then divers came and took them by the hands as they were bound standing at the stake. The sheriff cried, Lay hands on them, lay hands on them. With that a great number ran to the stake. The sheriff seeing that, let them all alone, so that there was not one taken.

There was one Bate, a barber, a busy doer about them, who having then a frize gown upon him, sold it immediately, saying, It stunk of heretics; with other foul words. Within three or four weeks after this, God's hand was upon him, and he died very miserably in Ipswich.

Although our history hasteth apace (the Lord be praised) to the happy death of queen Mary, yet she died not so soon but that some were burned before her death, and more would have been burned soon after, if God's provision had not prevented her with death. In the number of them which suffered in the same month when queen Mary died, were three that were burned at Bury, whose names were these, Philip Humfrey, John David, and Henry David, his brother.

Con-

Concerning the burning of these three, here is to be noted, that sir Clement Higham, about a fortnight before the queen died, issued out a writ for the burning of them, notwithstanding that the queen was then known to be past remedy of her sickness.

An Account of Mrs. PREST, Martyr.

ALTHOUGH in such a great number of persons, who in sundry parts of this realm were put to death in queen Mary's time, it be hard exactly to recite every particular person that suffered, but that some escape us either unknown, or omitted; yet I cannot pass over a certain poor woman, I mean Mrs. Prest, burned under the said queen's reign, in the city of Exeter, who dwelling sometime about Cornwall, having a husband and children there, much addicted to the superstitious sect of popery, was many times rebuked by them, and driven to go to the church, to their idols and ceremonies, to confession, to follow the cross in procession, to give thanks to God for restoring Antichrist again in this realm, &c. which when her spirit could not abide to do, she made her prayer to God, calling for help and mercy, and so at length lying in her bed, about midnight, she thought there came to her a certain motion and feeling of singular comfort. Whereupon in short space, she began to grow in contempt of her husband and children, and so taking nothing from them, but what she had on, departed from them; seeking her living by labour and spinning as well as she could; here and there for a time. In which time she never ceased to utter her mind as well as she could against their popery; however, she at that time was brought home to her husband again. Where at last she was accused by her neighbours, and so brought up to Exeter, to be presented to the bishop and his clergy. The name of the bishop who had her in examination, was Dr. Troubleville. His chancellor (as I gather) was Blackstone. The chiefest matter whereupon she was charged and condemned, was for the sacrament (which they call) of the altar, and for speaking against idols, as by the declaration of those which were present, I understand, who report the talk between her and the bishop on this wise:

Bishop. Thou foolish woman, I hear say, that thou hast spoken certain words against the most blessed sacrament of the altar, the body of Christ. Fie for shame. Thou art an unlearned person, and a woman: wilt thou meddle with such high matters, which all the doctors of the world cannot define? Wilt thou talk of such high mysteries? Keep thy work, and meddle with that thou hast to do. It is no woman's matter, at cards and tow to be spoken of. And if it be as I am informed, thou art worthy to be burned.

Woman. My lord, I trust your lordship will hear me speak.

Bishop. Yea, marry, for that cause I sent for you.

Woman. I am a poor woman, and do live by my hands, getting a penny truly, and of what I get, I give part to the poor.

Bishop. That is well done. Art thou not a man's wife?

And here the bishop entered into conversation about her husband.

To whom she answered again, declaring that she had a husband and children; and had them not. So long as she was at liberty, she refused neither husband nor children: but now standing here as I do, said she, in the cause of Christ and his truth, where I must either forsake Christ, or my husband, I am contented to stick only to Christ, my heavenly spouse, and renounce the other.

And here she making mention of the words of Christ, "He that leaveth not father or mother, sister or brother, husband," &c. the bishop inferred, that Christ spake that of the holy martyrs, who died because they would not sacrifice to the false gods.

Woman. Surely, sir, and I will rather die than I will do any worship to that idol, which with your mass you make a god.

Bishop. What, heretic, will you say that the sacrament of the altar is a foul idol?

Woman. Yes, truly, there was never such an idol as your sacrament is made by your priests, and commanded to be worshipped of all men, with many fond phantasies, where Christ did command it to be eaten and drank in remembrance of his most blessed passion for our redemption.

Bishop. See this prattling woman. Dost thou not hear, that Christ did say over the bread, "This is my body," and over the cup, "This is my blood."

Woman. Yes, forsooth, he said so, but he meant that it is body and blood, not carnally, but sacramentally.

Bishop. Lo, she hath heard prating among these new preachers, or heard some peevish book. Alas, poor woman, thou art deceived.

Woman. No, my lord, what I have learned was of godly preachers, and of godly books which I have heard read. And if you will give me leave, I will declare a reason why I will not worship the sacrament.

Bishop. Marry, say on, I am sure it will be goodly gear.

Woman. Truly such gear as I will lose this poor life of mine for.

Bishop. Then you will be a martyr, good wife.

Woman. Indeed, if the denying to worship that bready god be my martyrdom, I will suffer it with all my heart.

Bishop. Say thy mind.

Woman. You must bear with me, a poor woman.

Bishop. So I will.

Woman. I will demand of you, whether you can deny your creed, which doth say, That Christ doth perpetually sit at the right hand of his Father, both body and soul, until he come again; or whether he be in heaven our Advocate, and to make prayer for us unto God his Father? If it be so he is not here on earth in a piece of bread. If he be not here, and if he do not dwell in temples made with hands, but in heaven, what, shall we seek him here? If he did offer his body once for all, why make a new offering? If with once offering he made all perfect, why do you with a false offering make all imperfect? If he be to be worshipped in Spirit and in truth, why do you worship a piece of bread? If he be eaten and drank in faith and truth, if his flesh be not profitable to be among us, why do you say you make his flesh and blood, and say it is profitable for body and soul? Alas, I am a poor woman, but rather than I will do as you, I would live no longer. I have said, sir.

Bishop. I promise you, you are a jolly protestant. I pray you in what schools have you been brought up?

Woman. I have upon the Sundays visited the sermons, and there have I learned such things as are so fixed in my breast, that death shall not separate them.

Bishop. O foolish woman, who will waste his breath upon thee, or such as thou art? But how chanceth it that thou wentest away from thy husband? if thou wert an honest woman, thou wouldst not have left thy husband and children, and run about the country like a fugitive.

Woman. Sir, I laboured for my living; and as my master Christ counselleth me, when I was persecuted in one city, I fled into another.

Bishop. Who persecuted thee?

Woman. My husband and my children. For when I would have them to leave idolatry, and to worship God in heaven, he would not hear me, but he with his children rebuked me, and troubled me. I fled not for whoredom, nor for theft, but because I would be no partaker with him and his, of that foul idol the mass; and wheresoever I was, as oft as I could, upon Sundays and holidays, I made excuses not to go to the popish church.

Bishop. Belike then you are a good housewife, to fly from your husband, and the church.

Woman. My housewifery is but small; but God give me grace to go to the true church.

Bishop. The true church, what dost thou mean?

Woman. Not your popish church, full of idols and abominaabominations, but where two or three are gathered together in the name of God, to that church will I go, as long as I live.

Bishop. Belike then you have a church of your own. Well, let this mad woman be put down to prison till we fend for her husband.

Woman. No, I have but one husband, who is here already in this city and in prison with me (from whom I will never depart). And so their communication, for that time, brake off. Blackstone and others persuaded the bishop that she was not in her right senses (which is no new thing for the wisdom of God to appear foolishness to the carnal men of this world), and therefore they consulted together, that she should have liberty to go at large. So the keeper of the bishop's prison had her home to his house, where she fell to spinning and carding, and did work as a servant in the said keeper's house, and she went about the city when and where she pleased, and many people took great delight in talking with her: and all her discourse was about the sacrament of the altar, which of all things they could least abide.

Then her husband was sent for, but she refused to go home with him, with the blemish of the cause and religion, in defence whereof she there stood before the bishop and the priests.

Then divers of the priests endeavoured to persuade her to leave her wicked opinion about the sacrament of the altar, the natural body and blood of our Saviour Christ. But she made them answer, that it was nothing but very bread and wine, and that they might be ashamed to say, that a piece of bread should be turned by a man into the natural body of Christ, which bread doth corrupt, and mice oftentimes do eat it, and it doth mould, and is burned: God's body will not be so handled, nor kept in prison, or boxes or aumbries. Let it be your god, it shall not be mine; for my Saviour sitteth on the right hand of God, and doth pray for me. And to make that sacramental or significative bread instituted for a remembrance, the very body of Christ, and to worship it, is very foolishness and devilish deceit.

Now truly, said they, the devil hath deceived thee.

No, said she, I trust the living God hath opened mine eyes, and caused me to understand the right use of the blessed sacrament, which the true church doth use, but the false church doth abuse.

Then stepped forth an old friar, and asked her what she said of the holy pope?

I (said she) say, that he is Antichrist and the devil.

Then they all laughed.

Nay, said she, you have more need to weep than to laugh, and to be sorry that ever you were born, to be the chaplains of that whore of Babylon. I defy him and all his falsehood; and get you away from me, you do but trouble my conscience. You would have me follow your doings; I will first lose my life. I pray you depart.

Why, thou foolish woman, said they, we come to thee for thy profit and soul's health.

O Lord God, said she, what profit ariseth by you, that teach nothing but lies for truth? how save you souls, when you preach nothing but damnable lies, and destroy souls.

How provest thou that? said they.

Do you not damn your souls, said she, when you teach the people to worship idols, stocks, and stones, the works of men's hands? and to worship a false god of your own making of a piece of bread, and teach that the pope is God's vicar, and hath power to forgive sins? and that there is a purgatory, when God's Son hath by his passion purged all? and say, you make God, and sacrifice him, when Christ's body was a sacrifice once for all? Do you not teach the people to number their sins in your ears, and say they be damned, if they confess not all: when God's word saith, Who can number his sins? Do you not promise them trentals and dirges, and masses for souls, and sell your prayers for money, and make them buy pardons, and trust to such foolish inventions of your own imaginations? Do you not altogether against God? Do you not teach us to pray upon beads, and to pray unto saints, and say they can pray for us? Do you not make holy water and holy bread to fray devils? Do you not make a thousand more abominations? And yet you say, you come for my profit, and to save my soul. No, no, one hath saved me. Farewel, you with your salvation. Much other talk there was between her and them, which here were too tedious to express.

In the month's liberty, which was granted by the bishop, as is before-mentioned, she went into St. Peter's church, and there found a cunning Dutchman that had made new noses to certain fine images which were disfigured in king Edward's time; to whom she said, What a mad man art thou to make them new noses, which within a few days shall all lose their heads? The Dutchman accused her, and laid it hard to her charge. And she said unto him, Thou art accursed, and so are thy images. He called her whore. Nay, said she, thy images are whores, and thou art a whore-hunter; for doth not God say, You go a whoring after strange gods, figures of your own making? and thou art one of them. Then she was sent for and clapped fast, and from that time she had no more liberty.

During the time of her imprisonment, divers resorted to visit her, some sent by the bishop, some of their own voluntary will; amongst whom was one Daniel, a great preacher sometime of the gospel, in the days of king Edward, in those parts of Cornwall and Devonshire: whom after that she perceived by his own confession to have revolted from that which he preached before, through the grievous imprisonments, as he said, and fear of persecution which he had partly sustained by the cruel justices in those parts, earnestly she exhorted him to repent with Peter, and to be more constant in his profession.

Moreover, there resorted to her a certain worthy gentlewoman, the wife of one Walter Raully, a woman of noble wit, and of a good and godly opinion; who coming to the prison and talking with her, she said her creed to the gentlewoman; and when she came to the article, He ascended, there she staid, and bid the gentlewoman to seek his blessed body in heaven, not on earth, and told her plainly that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, and the sacrament to be nothing else but a remembrance of his blessed passion; and yet, said she, as they now use it, it is but an idol, and far wide from any remembrance of Christ's body; which, said she, will not continue, and so take it, good mistress. So that as soon as she came home to her husband, she declared to him, that in her life she never heard a woman (of such simplicity to look on) talk so godly, so perfectly, so sincerely, and so earnestly; in so much, that if God were not with her, she could not speak such things, to which I am not able to answer, though I can read, and she cannot.

Also there came to her one William Kede, and John his brother, not only brethren in the flesh, but also in the truth, and men in that country of great credit, whose father, R. Kede, all his life suffered nothing but trouble for the gospel. These two good and faithful brethren were present with her, both in the hall, and also at the prison, and (as they reported) they never heard the like woman, of so godly talk, so faithful or so constant; and as godly exhortations she gave them.

Thus this good matron was by many ways tried, both by hard imprisonment, threatenings, taunts and scorns, called an anabaptist, a mad woman, a drunkard, a runagate. She was proved by liberty to go whither she would; she was tried by flattery, with many fair promises; she was tried with her husband, her goods and children; but nothing could prevail, her heart was fixed, she had cast her anchor, utterly contemning this wicked world; a rare example of constancy to all professors of Christ's gospel.

In the bill of my information, it is so reported to me, that albeit she was of such simplicity, and without learning, yet you could declare no place of scripture, but she would tell you the chapter; yea, she would recite you the names of all the books of the bible. For which cause one Gregory Bassett, a rank papist, said she was out of her wits, and talked of the scripture as a dog straggleth rangeth far off from his master when he walketh in the fields, or as a stolen sheep out of his master's hands, she knew not whereat, as all heretics do; with many other taunts, which she utterly defied. Whereby as Almighty God is highly to be praised, working so mightily in such a weak vessel, so men of stronger and stouter nature have also to take example how to stand in like case; whereas we see this poor woman, how manfully she went through with such constancy and patience.

At last when they perceived her to be past remedy, and had consumed all their threatenings, that neither by imprisonment nor liberty, by menaces nor flattery, they could bring her to sing any other song, nor win her to their vanities and superstitious doings, then they cried out, An anabaptist, an anabaptist. Then in one day they brought her from the bishop's prison to the Guild-hall, and after that delivered her to the temporal power, according to their custom, where she was by the gentlemen of the country exhorted yet to call for grace, and to leave her opinions: and go home to thy husband, said they, thou art an unlearned woman, thou art not able to answer to such high matters.

I am not, said she; yet with my death I am content to be a witness of Christ's death; and I pray you make no longer delay with me: my heart is fixed, I will never say otherwise, nor turn to your superstitious doings.

Then the bishop said, the devil did lead her.

No, my lord, said she, it is the Spirit of God which leadeth me, and which called me in my bed, and at midnight opened his truth to me.

Then there was a great shout and laugh amongst the priests and others.

During the time that this good woman was thus under these priests' hands, amongst many other baitings and sore conflicts which she sustained by them, here is moreover not to be forgotten, how that Mr. Blaxton aforesaid, being treasurer of the church, had a concubine, who sundry times resorted to him, with other of his gossips: so that always when they came, this said good woman was called forth to his house, there to make his minion, with the rest of his company; some mirth, he examining her with such mocking and grinning, deriding the truth, that it would have vexed any christian heart to have seen it. Then when he had long used his foolishness in this sort, and had sported himself enough in deriding this christian martyr; in the end he sent her to prison again, and there kept her very miserably, except that sometimes he would send for her, when his aforesaid guests came to him, to use with her his accustomed folly. But in fine, these vile wretches, (after many combats and scoffing persuasions) when they had played the part of the cat with the mouse, at length condemned her, and delivered her over to the secular power.

Then the sentence being given, That she should go to the place from whence she came, and from thence to the place of execution, there to be burned with flames, till she be consumed; she lifted up her voice and thanked God, saying, I thank thee, my Lord my God; this day have I found that which I have long sought. But such out-cries as were again, and such mockings were never seen upon a poor innocent woman: all which she most patiently took. And yet this favour they pretended after her judgment, that her life should be spared, if she would turn and recant. Nay, that will I not, said she: God forbid that I should lose the life eternal for this carnal and short life. I will never turn from my heavenly husband, to my earthly husband; from the fellowship of angels to mortal children; and if my husband and children be faithful, then am I their's; God is my father, God is my mother, God is my sister, my brother, my kinsman; God is my friend most faithful.

Then was she delivered to the sheriff, innumerable people beholding her, and led by the officers to the place of execution, without the walls of Exeter, called Sothenhey, where again these superstitious priests assaulted her; and she prayed them to have no more talk with her, but cried still, God be merciful to me a sinner. And so while they were tying her to the stake, thus still she cried, and would give no answer to them, but with much patience took her cruel death, and was with flames of fire consumed; and so ended this mortal life, as 'constant a woman in the faith of Christ; as ever was upon the earth. She was as simple a woman to appearance, as a man might behold; of a very little and short stature, somewhat thick, about 54 years of age. She had a chearful countenance, so lively, as though she had been prepared for the day of her marriage to meet the Lamb; most patient in her words and answers; sober in apparel, meat and drink, and would never be idle, but a great comfort to as many as would talk with her; good to the poor; and in her trouble she would take no money, because (said she) I am going to a city where money beareth no mastery; whilst I am here, God hath promised to feed me. Thus was her mortal life ended. For whose constancy God be everlastingly praised, Amen.

The Persecution and Martyrdom of RICHARD SHARPE, THOMAS BANION, and THOMAS HALE.

RICHARD SHARPE, weaver of Bristol, was brought the ninth day of March, 1556, before Mr. Dalby, chancellor of the city of Bristol, and after examination concerning the sacrament of the altar, was persuaded by the said Dalby and others to recant; and the 29th of the said month was enjoined to make his recantation before the parishioners in his parish church. Which when he had done, he felt in his conscience such a tormenting hell, that he was not able quietly to work in his occupation, but decayed and changed both in colour and liking of his body; who shortly after upon Sunday came into his parish church, called Temple, and after high mass came to the choir door, and said with a loud voice, Neighbours, bear me record that yonder idol (and pointed to the altar) is the greatest and most abominable that ever was: and I am sorry that ever I denied my Lord God. Then the constables were ordered to apprehend him, but none stepped forth, but suffered him to go out of the church. After, at night, he was apprehended and carried to Newgate, and shortly after he was brought before the lord chancellor, denying the sacrament of the altar to be the body and blood of Christ, and said, it was an idol; and therefore was condemned to be burned by the said Dalby. He was burnt the 7th of May, 1557, and died godly, patiently, and constantly, confessing the articles of our faith.

An Account of THOMAS HALE, Martyr.

THE Thursday night before Easter, in the year 1557, came one Mr. David Harris, alderman, and John Stone, to the house of one Thomas Hale, shoemaker, of Bristol, and caused him to rise out of his bed, and brought him forth from his door. To whom the said Thomas Hale said, You have sought my blood these two years, and now much good may it do you. He being committed to the watchmen, was carried to Newgate the 24th of April in the year aforesaid, was brought before Mr. Dalby the chancellor, committed by him to prison, and after by him condemned to be burned for saying, The sacrament of the altar was an idol. He was burnt the 7th day of May with the aforesaid Richard Sharpe, patiently embracing the fire with his arms. They were both bound back to back.

An Account of THOMAS BANION.

THOMAS BANION, a weaver, at the commandment of the commissioners, was brought by a constable, the 13th day of August, 1557, before Mr. Dalby, chancellor of Bristol, who committed him to prison for saying there was nothing but bread in the sacrament, as they used it. Wherefore, the twentieth day of August, he was condemned by the said Dalby to be burnt for denying five of their sacraments, and affirming two, that that is, the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and the sacrament of baptism. He was burnt the 27th of the said month, in the same year, and died godly, constantly, and patiently, with confessing the articles of our christian faith.

The Martyrdom of JOHN CORNEFORD, of Wortham, CHRISTOPHER BROWNE, of MAIDSTONE, JOHN HERST, of Ashford, ALICE SNOTH, and CATHERINE KNIGHT, alias TINLEY, an aged Woman.

THESE five were the last that suffered in queen Mary's reign, for the testimony of that word for which so many had died before, and gave up their lives meekly and patiently, suffering the violent malice of the papists: who although they then might have either well spared them, or else deferred their death, knowing of the sickness of queen Mary; yet such was the implacable spite of that generation, that there be some that say, the archdeacon of Canterbury the same time being at London, and understanding the danger of the queen, immediately made post haste home to dispatch these whom he had before then in his cruel custody.

The matter why they were judged to the fire, was for believing the body not to be in the sacrament of the altar, unless it be received; saying moreover, that we receive another thing also, besides Christ's body, which we see, and is a temporal thing, according to St. Paul, "The things that be seen, be temporal," &c.

Item, For confessing that an evil man doth not receive Christ's body. "Because no man hath the Son, except it be given him of the Father."

Item, That it is idolatry to creep to the cross, and St. John forbidding it, faith, Beware of images.

Item, For confessing that we should not pray to our lady, and other saints, because they be not omnipotent.

For these and other such like articles of christian doctrine, were these committed to the fire. Against whom, when the sentence should be read, and they excommunicated, after the manner of the papists, one of them, John Corneford by name, stirred with a vehement spirit of the zeal of God, proceeding in a more true excommunication against the papists, in the name of them all, pronounced sentence against them, in these words as follow:

"In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the most mighty God, and by the power of his holy Spirit, and the authority of his holy catholic and apostolic church, we do here give into the hands of Satan to be destroyed, the bodies of all those blasphemers and heretics, that do maintain any error against his most holy word, or do condemn his most holy truth for heresy, to the maintenance of any false church or feigned religion, so that by this thy just judgment, O most mighty God, against thy adversaries, thy true religion may be known to thy great glory and our comfort, and to the edifying of all our nation. Good Lord, so be it, Amen."

This sentence of excommunication being the same time openly pronounced and registered, proceeding so, as it seemeth, from an inward faith and hearty zeal to God's truth and religion, took such effect against the enemy, that within six days after queen Mary died, and the tyranny of all English papists with her. Albeit, notwithstanding the sickness and death of that queen, whereof they were not ignorant, yet the archdeacon and others of Canterbury, thought to dispatch the martyrdom of these men before.

In which fact, the tyranny of this archdeacon seemeth to exceed the cruelty of Bonner, who notwithstanding he had some at the same time under his custody, yet was not so importunate in haling them to the fire, as appeareth by father Lining and his wife, and divers others, who being the same time under the custody of Bishop Bonner, were delivered by the death of queen Mary.

These godly martyrs, in their prayer which they made before their martyrdom, desired God that their blood might be the last that should be shed, and so it was.

This Catherine Tinley was the mother of one Robert Tinley, dwelling in Maidstone, which Robert was in trouble all queen Mary's time. To whom his mother coming to visit him, asked him how he took this place of scripture which she had seen, not by reading of the scripture (for she had yet in manner no taste of religion), but had found it by chance in a book of prayers, "I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy; your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions. And also upon the servants, and upon the maids in those days will I pour my Spirit," &c. Which place after that he had expounded to her, she began to take hold on the gospel, growing more and more in zeal and love thereof, and so continued unto her martyrdom.

Among such women as were burned at Canterbury, it is recorded of a certain maid, and supposed to be this Alice Snotth mentioned in this story, or else to be Agnes Snotth above-mentioned, that when she was brought to be executed, she being at the stake, called for her godfather and godmothers. The justice hearing her, sent for them, but they durst not come. Notwithstanding the justices willed the messenger to go again, and to shew them that they should incur no danger thereof.

Then they hearing that, came to know the matter of their sending for. When the maid saw them, she asked them what they had promised for her, and so she immediately rehearsed her faith, and the commandments of God, and required of them, if there were any more that they had promised in her behalf; and they said, No.

Then, said she, I die a christian woman, bear witness of me; and she was consumed in fire, and gave up her life joyfully for the testimony of Christ's gospel, to the terror of the wicked, and comfort of the godly, and also to the stopping of the slanderous mouths of such as falsely do quarrel against the faithful martyrs, for going from that religion wherein by their godfathers and godmothers they were at first baptized.

The History and Condemnation of JOHN HUNT, and RICHARD WHITE, who escaped the Fire by the Death of Queen MARY.

BESIDES these three martyrs above-named, there were several others imprisoned in divers parts of the realm, whereof some were but newly taken and not yet examined, some examined but not condemned, certain were both examined and condemned, but for lack of the writ, escaped.

Others there were also, both condemned, and the writ also was brought down for their burning, and yet by the death of the chancellor, the bishop, and of queen Mary, happening together about one time, they most happily and marvellously were preserved, and lived many years after. In the number of whom was one John Hunt, and Richard White, imprisoned at Salisbury. Touching which history, something is here to be shewed:

These two good men, and faithful servants of the Lord, had remained a long time in prison at Salisbury, and other places thereabouts, the space of two years and more. During which time, they were often called to examination, and manifold ways were impugned by the bishops and priests. All whose examinations, as I thought not much needful here to prosecute or to search out, for the length of the volume; so neither again did I think it good to leave no memory at all of the same, but some part to express, namely, of the examination of Richard White, before the bishop of Salisbury, the bishop of Gloucester, with the chancellor and other priests, not unworthy here to be rehearsed.

The bishop of Salisbury at that time was Dr. Capon, the bishop of Gloucester was Dr. Brookes. These, with Dr. Geffery, the chancellor of Salisbury, and a great number of priests sitting in judgment, Richard White was brought before them. With whom first the bishop of Gloucester, who had the examination of him, began thus.

Brookes.

Brookes. Is this the prisoner?

Chancellor. Yea, my lord.

Brookes. Friend, wherefore camest thou hither?

White. My lord, I trust to know the cause: for the law saith, In the mouth of two or three witnesses things must stand.

Capon. Did not I examine thee of thy faith when thou camest hither?

White. No, my lord, you did not examine me, but commanded me to the Lollards'-Tower, and that no man should speak with me. And now I do require mine accuser.

Then the Register said, The mayor of Marlborough apprehended you for words that you spake there; and for that I commanded you to be conveyed hither to prison.

White. You had the examination of me at Marlborough. Say what I have said, and I will answer you.

Chancellor. Thou shalt confess thy faith before thou depart; and therefore say thy mind freely, and be not ashamed so to do.

White. I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, because it is the power of God to salvation unto all that believe: and St. Peter saith, "If any man do ask thee a reason of the hope that is in thee, make him a direct answer, and that with meekness." Who shall have the examination of me?

Chancellor. My lord of Gloucester shall have the examination of thee.

White. My lord, will you take the pains to wet your coat in my blood? Be not guilty thereof; I warn you before hand.

Brookes. I will do nothing contrary to our law.

White. My lord, what is it that you do request at my hands?

Brookes. I will pose thee upon certain articles, and principally upon the sacrament of the altar: how dost thou believe of the blessed sacrament of the altar? Believest thou not the real, carnal, and corporal presence of Christ in the same, even the very same Christ that was born of the virgin Mary, that was hanged on the cross, that suffered for our sins? And at these words they all put off their caps, and bowed their bodies.

White. My lord, what is a sacrament?

Brookes. It is the thing itself which it representeth.

White. That cannot be; for he that representeth a prince cannot be the prince himself.

Brookes. How many sacraments findest thou in the scriptures called by the name of sacraments?

White. I find two sacraments in the scriptures, but not called by the names of sacraments. But I think St. Augustine gave them the first name of sacraments.

Brookes. Then thou findest not that word sacrament in the scriptures.

White. No, my lord.

Brookes. Did not Christ say, This is my body, and are not his words true?

White. I am sure the words are true; but you play by me as the devil did by Christ: for he said, If thou be, &c. Matt. iv. For it is, &c. Psal. xci. But the words that followed after be clean left out, which are these: Thou shalt walk on the lion and the asp, &c. These words the devil left out, because they were spoke against himself; and even so do you recite the scriptures.

Brookes. Declare thy faith upon the sacrament.

White. Christ and his sacraments are alike, because of their natures; for in Christ are two natures, a divine and an human nature; so likewise in the sacraments of Christ's body and blood there be two natures, which I divide into two parts, that is, external and internal. The external part is the element of bread and wine, according to the saying of St. Augustine. The internal part is the invisible grace, which by the same is represented. So there is an external receiving of the same sacrament, and an internal. The external is with the hand, the eye, the mouth, and the ear. The internal is by the Holy Ghost in the heart, which worketh in me faith; whereby I apprehend all the merits of Christ, applying the same wholly unto my salvation. If this be truth, believe it; and if it be not, reprove it.

Dr. Hoskins. This is Oecolampadius's doctrine, and Hooper taught it the people.

Brookes. Dost thou not believe, that after the words of consecration there is the natural presence of Christ's body.

White. My lord, I will answer you, if you will answer me to one question. Is not this article of our belief true? "He sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty:" if he be come from thence to judgment, say so.

Brookes. No. But if thou wilt believe the scriptures, I will prove to thee that Christ was both in heaven and in earth at one time.

White. As he is God, he is in all places; but as for his manhood, he is but in one place.

Brookes. St. Paul saith, 1 Cor. xv. "Last of all he was seen of me," &c. Here St. Paul saith he saw Christ, and St. Paul was not in heaven.

White. St. Paul's chief purpose was by this place to prove the resurrection. But how do you prove that Christ, when he appeared to St. Paul, was not still in heaven; like as he was seen of Stephen, sitting at the right hand of God? St. Augustine saith, the head that was in heaven, did cry for the body and members which were on the earth, and said, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" And was not Paul taken up into the third heaven, where he might see Christ? as he witnesseth, 1 Cor. xv. For there he went but only say he saw Christ, but concerning the place he speaketh nothing. Wherefore this place of scripture proveth not that Christ was both in heaven and earth at one time.

Brookes. I told you before he would not believe. Here be three opinions, the Lutherans, the Oecolampadians, and we the Catholics. If you the Oecolampadians have the truth, then the Lutherans, and we the Catholics be out of the way. If the Lutherans have the truth, then you the Oecolampadians and we the Catholics be out of the way. But if we the Catholics have the truth, as we have indeed, then the Lutherans and you the Oecolampadians are out of the way, as you are indeed, for the Lutherans do call you heretics.

White. My lord, you have troubled me greatly with the scriptures.

Brookes. Did I not tell you it was not possible to remove him from his error? Away with him to the Lollards' Tower, and dispatch him as soon as you can.

This was the effect of my first examination. More examinations I had after this, which I have no time now to write out.

Amongst many other examinations of the aforesaid Richard White, it happened one time, that Dr. Blackstone, chancellor of Exeter, sat upon him, with divers others, who alledging certain doctors, as Chrysostom, Cyprian, Tertullian, against the said Richard White, and being reprov'd by him for his false patching of the doctors, fell into such a trembling and shaking, (his conscience belike accusing him) that he was fain, stooping down, to lay both his hands upon his knees to stay his body from trembling.

Then the said John Hunt, and Richard White, after many examinations and long captivity, at length were called for, and brought before Dr. Geffery, the bishop's chancellor, there to be condemned, and so they were. The high sheriff at that present was sir Anthony Hungerford, who being then at the sessions, was there charged with these two condemned persons, with other malefactors there condemned likewise the same time, to see them put to death.

In the mean time Mr. Clifford, of Bosco, in Wiltshire, son-in-law to the said sir Anthony Hungerford, the sheriff, came to his father, exhorting and counselling him in no case to meddle with the death of these two innocent persons; and if the chancellor and priests would needs be instant upon him, yet he should first require require the writ to be sent down, De comburendo, for his discharge.

Sir Anthony Hungerford hearing this, and understanding justice Brown to be in the town the same time, went to him to ask his advice and counsel in the matter, who told him that without the writ sent down from the superior powers, he could not be discharged; and if the writ were sent, then he must by the law do his charge.

The sheriff understanding by justice Brown, how far he might go by the law, and having at that time no writ for his warrant, let them alone, and the next day after taking his horse, departed.

The chancellor all this while marvelling what the sheriff meant, and yet disdaining to go unto him, but looking rather the other should have come first to him, at last hearing that he was rid away, took his horse and rid after him; who at length overtaking the sheriff, declared unto him how he had committed certain condemned prisoners to his hand, whose duty had been to have seen execution done; the matter, he said, was great, and therefore willed him to look well unto it how he would answer the matter. And thus began he fiercely to lay to his charge.

Wherein note, good reader, by the way, the close and covert hypocrisy of the papists in their dealings; who in the form and stile of their own sentence condemnatory, pretend a petition unto the secular power, in the wounds of Jesus Christ, that the rigour of the law may be mitigated, and that their life may be spared. And how standeth this now with their doings and dealings, when this chancellor (as you see) is not only contented to give sentence against them, but also hunteth after the officer, not suffering him to spare them, although he would? What dissimulation is this of men, going and doing contrary to their own words and profession? But let us return to our matter again.

The sheriff hearing the chancellor's words, and seeing him so urgent upon him, told him again that he was no babe, which now was to be taught of him. If he had any writ to warrant and discharge him in burning those men, then he knew what he had to do. Why, saith the chancellor, did not I give you a writ, with my hand and eight more of the close set unto the same? Well, quoth the sheriff, that is no sufficient discharge for me; and therefore as I told you, if you have a sufficient writ and warrant from the superior powers, I know then what I have to do in my office; otherwise, if you have no other writ but that, I tell you, I will neither burn them for you, nor any of you all, &c.

Where note again (good reader) how by this it may be thought and supposed, that the other poor saints and martyrs of God, such as had been burned at Salisbury before, were burned belike without any authorized or sufficient writ from the superiors, but only from the information of the chancellor and of the close, through the uncircumspect negligence of the sheriffs, who should have looked more substantially into the matter. But this I leave and refer unto the magistrates. Let us return to the story again.

Doctor Geffery, the chancellor, thus sent away from the sheriff, went home, and there fell sick upon the same, (for anger belike) as they signified unto me, who were the parties themselves, both godly and grave persons, who were then condemned, the one of them, which is Richard White, being yet alive.

The under sheriff to this sir Anthony Hungerford, above-named, was one Mr. Michell, a godly man. So that not long after this came down the writ to burn the above-named Richard White, and John Hunt; but the under sheriff receiving the said writ, said, I will not be guilty of these men's blood, and immediately burnt the writing, and departed his way. Within four days after the chancellor died; concerning whose death this cometh by the way to be noted, that these two aforesaid, John Hunt, and Richard White, being the same time in a low and dark dungeon, being Saturday, toward evening (according to their accustomed manner) fell to evening prayer. Who kneeling there together, as they should begin their prayer, suddenly fell both to such a strange weeping and tenderness of heart (but how they could not tell), that they could not pray one word, but so continued a great space, bursting out in tears. After that night was past, and the morning come, the first word they heard, was, that the chancellor, their great enemy, was dead. The time of whose death they found to be the same hour, when they fell into such a sudden weeping. The Lord in all his works be praised, Amen. Thus much concerning the death of that wicked chancellor.

Richard White and John Hunt, after the death of the chancellor, the bishop also being dead a little before, continued still in prison till the happy coming in of queen Elizabeth; and so were set at liberty.

An Account of the Martyrdom of a young Lad of Eight Years old, scourged to Death in Bishop BONNER'S House in London.

IF bloody torments and cruel death of a poor innocent, suffering for no cause of his own, but in the truth of Christ and his religion, do make a martyr, no less deserveth the child of John Fetty, to be reputed in the catalogue of holy martyrs, who in the house of bishop Bonner, was unmercifully scourged to death, as by the sequel of this story here following may appear.

Amongst those that were persecuted and miserably imprisoned for the profession of Christ's gospel, and yet mercifully delivered by the providence of God, there was one John Fetty, a godly poor man, dwelling in the parish of Clerkenwell, and was by vocation a taylor, of the age of twenty-four years or thereabouts, who was accused and complained of unto one Brokenbury, a parson of the same parish, by his own wife, because he would not come unto the church, and be partaker of their idolatry and superstition; and therefore, through the said priest's procurement, he was apprehended by Richard Tanner, and his fellow constables there, and one Martin the headborough. However, immediately upon his apprehension, his wife (by the just judgment of God) was stricken mad, and divested of her wits, which declared a marvellous example of the justice of God against such unfaithful and most unnatural treachery. And although this example (perhaps for lack of knowledge and instruction in such cases) little moved the consciences of these simple poor men to cease their persecution; yet natural pity towards that ungrateful woman wrought so in their hearts, that for the preservation and support of her and her two children (like otherwise to perish) they for that present let her husband alone, and would not carry him to prison, but yet suffered him to remain quietly in his house. During which time, he as it were forgetting the wicked and unkind fact of his wife, did yet so cherish and provide for her, that within the space of three weeks (through God's merciful providence) she was well amended, and had recovered again some stay of her wits and senses.

But such was the power of Satan in the malicious heart of that wicked woman, that notwithstanding his gentle dealing with her, yet so soon as she had recovered some health, she did again accuse her husband; whereupon he was the second time apprehended, and carried unto sir John Mordaunt, knight, one of the queen's commissioners, and he upon examination sent him by Cluny, the bishop's sumner, unto the Lollards' Tower: where he was put into the painful stocks, and had a dish of water set by him, with a stone put into it. To what purpose God knoweth, except it were to shew that he should look for little other sustenance. Which is credible enough, if we consider their like practices upon divers before-mentioned in this history, as amongst others, upon Richard Smith, who died through their cruel imprisonment; touching whom, when a godly woman came to Dr. Story, to have leave that she might bury him, he asked her if he had any straw or blood in his mouth; but what he meant thereby, I leave to the judgment of the wise.

After

After the aforesaid John Fetty had thus lain in prison for the space of fifteen days, hanging in the stocks, sometimes by one leg and one arm, sometimes by the other, and sometimes by both, it happened that one of his children (a boy of the age of eight or nine years) came unto the bishop's house to see if he could get leave to speak with his father. At his coming thither, one of the bishop's chaplains met with him, and asked him what he lacked, and whom he would have. The child answered, that he came to see his father. The chaplain asked again who was his father. The boy then told him, and pointing towards Lollards' Tower, shewed him that his father was there in prison. Why, said the priest, thy father is an heretic: the child being of a bold and quick spirit, and also godly brought up, and instructed by his father in the knowledge of God, answered and said, My father is no heretic; for you have Balaam's mark.

With that the priest took the child by the hand, and carried him into the bishop's house, and there amongst them did they most shamefully, and without all pity, so whip and scourge, being naked, this tender child, that he was all in a gore of blood, and then in jolly brag of their catholic tyranny, they caused Cluny, having his coat upon his arm, to carry the child in his shirt unto his father being in prison, the blood running down his heels.

At his coming unto his father the child fell down upon his knees, and asked his blessing. The poor man then beholding his child, and seeing him so cruelly arrayed, cried out for sorrow, and said, Alas, Will, who hath done this to thee? The boy answered, that as he was seeking to come to see his father, a priest with Balaam's mark took him into the bishop's house, and there he was so handled. Cluny therewith violently plucked the child away out of his father's hands, and carried him back again into the bishop's house, where they kept him three days after.

And at three days end, Bonner (minding to make the matter whole, and somewhat to appease the poor man, for this their horrible fact) determined to release him; and therefore caused him early in the morning to be brought out of Lollards' Tower into his bedchamber, where he found the bishop bathing of himself against a great fire; and at his first entering into the chamber, Fetty said, God be here, and peace. God be here, and peace! said Bonner; that is neither God speed, nor good morrow. If you kick against this peace (said Fetty), then this is not the place that I seek for.

A chaplain of the bishop's standing by, turned the poor man about, and thinking to deface him, said in a mocking manner, What have we here, a player? Whilst Fetty was thus standing in the bishop's chamber, he espied hanging about the bishop's bed, a great pair of black beads; whereupon he said, My lord, I think the hangman is not far off: for the halter, pointing to the beads, is here already. At which words the bishop was in a marvellous rage.

Then he immediately after espied also standing in the said bishop's chamber in the window a little crucifix. Then he asked the bishop what it was; and he answered that it was Christ. Was he handled so cruelly as he is here pictured? said Fetty.

Yea, that he was, said the bishop.

And even so cruelly will you handle such as come before you: for you are unto God's people as Caiaphas was unto Christ.

The bishop being in a great fury, said, Thou art a vile heretic, and I will burn thee, or else I will spend all that I have unto my gown.

Nay, my lord, said Fetty, you had better give it to some poor body, that he may pray for you. But yet Bonner bethinking himself of the danger that the child was in by their whipping, and what peril might ensue thereupon, thought better to discharge him; which thing was accomplished.

Whereupon, after this and such like talk, the bishop at last discharged him, willing him to go home, and carry his child with him; which he did, and that with a heavy heart, to see his poor boy in such extreme pain and grief. But within fourteen days after the child died, whether through his cruel scourging or any other infirmity, I know not; and therefore I refer the truth thereof unto the Lord, who knoweth all secrets, and also to the discreet judgment of the reader. But however it was, the Lord yet used their cruel and detestable fact as a means of his providence for the delivery of this good poor man and faithful christian; his name therefore be ever praised. Amen.

An Account of the cruel Handling and Burning of NICHOLAS BURTON, an English Merchant, in Spain.

I THINK it not amiss in this place to mention the story of Nicholas Burton, being such as is not unworthy to be known, as well for the example of his singular constancy, as also for the noting of the extreme dealing and cruel revenge of those catholic inquisitors of Spain, who under the pretended visor of religion, do nothing but seek their own private gain and advantage, with crafty rifling and spoiling of other men's goods, as by the noting of this story may appear.

The fifth day of November, about the year of our Lord 1560, this Nicholas Burton, citizen sometime of London, and merchant, dwelling in the parish of Little St. Bartholomew, peaceably and quietly following his traffic in the trade of merchandize, and being in the city of Cadiz, in the party of Andalusia, in Spain, there came into his lodging a Judas, or, as they term them, a familiar of the fathers of the inquisition. Who asking for the said Nicholas Burton, feigned that he had a letter to deliver into his own hands; by which means he spake with him immediately. And having no letter to deliver to him, then the said promoter, or familiar, at the motion of the devil his master, whose messenger he was, invented another lie, and said, that he would take lading for London in such ships as the said Nicholas Burton had freighted to lade, if he would let any; which was partly to know where he loaded his goods, that they might attach them, and chiefly to detract the time until the serjeant of the inquisition might come and apprehend the body of the said Nicholas Burton; which they did incontinently.

He then well perceiving that they were not able to burden or charge him that he had written, spoke, or done any thing there in that country against the ecclesiastical or temporal laws of the same realm, boldly asked them what they had to lay to his charge that they did so arrest him, and bade them to declare the cause, and he would answer them. Notwithstanding they answered nothing, but commanded him with cruel threatening words to hold his peace, and not to speak one word to them.

And so they carried him to the filthy common prison of the town of Cadiz, where he remained in irons fourteen days amongst thieves.

All which time he so instructed the poor prisoners in the word of God, according to the good talent which God had given him in that behalf, and also in the Spanish tongue to utter the same, that in short space he had well reclaimed several of those superstitious and ignorant Spaniards to embrace the word of God, and to reject their popish traditions.

Which being known unto the officers of the inquisition, they conveyed him laden with irons from thence to a city called Seville, into a more cruel and straiter prison called Triana, where the said fathers of the inquisition proceeded against him secretly according to their accustomed cruel tyranny, that never after he could be suffered to write or speak to any of his nation: so that to this day it is unknown who was his accuser.

Afterward, the 20th of December, they brought the said Nicholas Burton, with a great number of other prisoners, for professing the true christian religion, into the city of Seville, to a place where the said inquisitors sat in judgment, which they call Auto, with a canvas coat, whereupon in divers parts was painted the figure of a huge huge devil, tormenting a soul in a flame of fire, and on his head a copping tank of the same work.

His tongue was forced out of his mouth with a cloven stick fastened upon it, that he should not utter his conscience and faith to the people, and so he was set with another Englishman of Southampton, and divers other condemned men for religion, as well Frenchmen, as Spaniards, upon a scaffold over against the said inquisition, where their sentences and judgment were read and pronounced against them.

And immediately after the said sentences given, they were carried from thence to the place of execution without the city, where they most cruelly burned them, for whose constant faith God be praised.

This Nicholas Burton by the way, and in the flames of fire, had so cheerful a countenance, embracing death with all patience and gladness, that the tormentors and enemies which stood by, said, that the devil had his soul before he came to the fire; and therefore they said his senses of feeling were past him.

It happened that after the arrest of Nicholas Burton aforesaid, immediately all the goods and merchandize which he brought with him into Spain by the way of traffic, were (according to their common usage) seized, and taken into the sequester; among which they also rolled up much that appertained to another English merchant, wherewith he was credited as factor. Whereof so soon as news was brought to the merchant as well of the imprisonment of his factor, as of the arrest made upon his goods, he sent his attorney into Spain, with authority from him to make claim to his goods, and to demand them; whose name was John Fronton, citizen of Bristol.

When his attorney was landed at Seville, and had shewed all his letters and writings to the holy house, requiring them that such goods might be delivered into his possession, answer was made him that he must sue by bill, and retain an advocate (but all was doubtless to delay him), and they forsooth of courtesy assigned him one to frame his supplication for him, and other such bills of petition, as he had to exhibit in their holy court, demanding for each bill eight rials, albeit they stood him in no more stead than if he had put up none at all. And for the space of three or four months this fellow missed not twice a day attending every morning and afternoon at the inquisitor's palace, suing unto them upon his knees for his dispatch, but especially to the bishop of Tarracon, who was at that very time chief in the inquisition at Seville, that he of his absolute authority would command restitution to be made thereof; but the booty was so good and great, that it was very hard to come by it again.

At length, after he had spent four whole months in suits and requests, and also to no purpose, he received this answer from them, That he must shew better evidence, and bring more sufficient certificates out of England for proof of this matter, than those which he had already presented to the court. Whereupon the party forthwith posted to London, and with all speed returned to Seville again with more ample and large letters testimonial, and certificates, according to their requests, and exhibited them to the court.

Notwithstanding the inquisitors still shifted him off, excusing themselves by lack of leisure, and for that they were occupied in more weighty affairs, and with such answers put him off for four months after.

At last, when the party had well nigh spent all his money, and therefore sued the more earnestly for his dispatch, they referred the matter wholly to the bishop. Of whom, when he repaired unto him, he got this answer, That for himself, he knew what he had to do; howbeit he was but one man, and the determination appertained to the other commissioners as well as unto him: and thus by posting and passing it from one to another, the party could obtain no end of his suit. Yet for his importunity's sake, they being resolved to dispatch him, it was on this sort: one of the inquisitors, called Gasco, a man very well experienced in these practices, willed the party to resort unto him after dinner.

The fellow being glad to hear this news, and supposing that his goods should be restored unto him, and that he was called in for that purpose to talk with the other that was in prison, to confer with him about their accounts, rather through a little misunderstanding, hearing the inquisitors cast out a word, that it should be needful for him to talk with the prisoner, and being thereupon more than half persuaded, that at length they meant good faith, did so, and repaired thither about the evening. Immediately upon his coming, the gaoler was forthwith charged with him, to shut him up close in such a prison where they appointed him.

The party hoping at the first that he had been called for about some other matter, and seeing himself, contrary to his expectation, cast into a dark dungeon, perceived at length that the world went with him far otherwise than he supposed it would have done.

But within two or three days after he was brought into the court, where he began to demand his goods; and because it was a device that well served their turn, without any more circumstance, they bid him say his Ave Maria; "Ave Maria gratia plena, Dominus tecum, benedicta tu in mulieribus, & benedictus fructus ventris tui Jesus, Amen."

The same was written word by word as he spake it, and without any more talk of claiming his goods, because it was needless, they commanded him to prison again, and entered an action against him as an heretic, forasmuch as he did not say his Ave Maria after the Romish fashion, but ended it very suspiciously, for he should have added moreover; "Sancta Maria mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus:" by abbreviating whereof, it was evident enough (said they) that he did not allow the mediation of saints.

Thus they picked a quarrel to detain him in prison a longer season, and afterwards brought him forth upon their stage disguised after their manner; where sentence was given, that he should lose all the goods which he sued for, though they were not his own, and besides this, suffer a year's imprisonment.

In the year 1560 several other Englishmen suffered in Spain, among whom John Baker and William Burgate were apprehended, and burnt the second day of November in the city of Seville.

Mark Bruges, an Englishman, master of an English ship called the Minion, was burnt in a city in Portugal.

William Hoker, a young man about the age of sixteen years, being an Englishman, was stoned to death by certain young men in the city of Seville, for the same righteous cause.

But of these and such other matters which happened in Spain, because they fell not within the reign of queen Mary, but since her time, we shall treat more hereafter, when we come to the reign of queen Elizabeth, where we shall give an account, not only of the martyrs abroad, but also the whole inquisition of Spain and Flanders, with the tragical tumults and troubles happening within the last memory of these our latter unhappy days.

A Treatise concerning those that were scourged by the Papists, for the Cause of the Gospel.

AFTER this bloody slaughter of God's saints and servants thus ended and discussed, let us now proceed (by God's assistance) to treat of such as for the same cause of religion have been, though not put to death, yet whipped and scourged by the enemies of God's word, first beginning with Richard Wilmot and Thomas Fairfax, who about the time of Anne Askew, were miserably rent and tormented with scourges and stripes, for their faithful standing to Christ and his truth, as by the story and examination of them both may appear.

The Scourging of RICHARD WILMOT and THOMAS FAIRFAX.

AFTER the first recantation of Dr. Crome, for his sermon which he made the first Sunday in Lent, at St. Thomas Acres, being the Mercers' chapel, his sermon sermon was on the Epistle of the same day, written in the tenth chapter to the Hebrews; wherein he very learnedly proved by the same place of scripture and others, that Christ was the only and sufficient sacrifice unto God the Father for the sins of the whole world, and that there was no more sacrifice to be offered for sin by the priests, forasmuch as Christ had offered his body on the cross, and shed his blood for the sins of the people, and that once for all. For which sermon he was apprehended by Bonner, and brought before Stephen Gardiner and others of the council, where he promised to recant his doctrine at St. Paul's Cross, the second Sunday after Easter. And accordingly he was there and preached, Bonner with all his doctors sitting before him: but he so preached and handled his matter, that he rather verified his former saying, than denied any part of that which he before had preached. For which the protestants praised God, and heartily rejoiced.

Bishop Bonner and his champions were not at all pleased therewith, but yet notwithstanding they took him home with them, and he was so handled among the wolfish generation, that they made him come to the Cross again the next Sunday.

And because the magistrates should now hear him, and be witnesses of this recantation which was most blasphemous, to deny Christ's sacrifice to be sufficient for penitent sinners, and to say that the sacrifice of the mass was good, godly, and an holy sacrifice, propitiatory and available both for the quick and the dead: because (I say) that they would have the nobles to hear this blasphemous doctrine, the viperous generation procured all the chief of the council to be there present.

Now to come to our matter: at this time, the same week, between his first sermon and the last, and while Dr. Crome was in durance, one Richard Wilmot being apprentice in Bow-lane, of the age of 18 years, and sitting at work in his master's shop, in the month of July, one Lewis, a Welchman, being one of the guard, came into the shop, having things to do for himself.

One asked him what news at the court, and he answered, that the old heretic, Dr. Crome, had recanted now indeed before the council, and that he should on Sunday next be at St. Paul's Cross again, and there declare it.

Then Wilmot sitting at his master's work, and hearing him speak these words, and rejoicing in the same, began to speak unto him, saying, that he was sorry to hear this news: for (said he) if Crome should say otherwise than he hath said, then is it contrary to the truth of God's word, and contrary to his own conscience, which before God shall accuse him.

Lewis answered and said, that he had preached and taught heresy; and therefore it was meet that he should in such a place revoke it.

Wilmot told him that he would not so say, neither did he hear him preach any doctrine contrary to God's written word, but that he proved his doctrine, and that sufficiently, by the scriptures.

Lewis then asked him how he knew that?

Wilmot answered, By the scriptures of God, wherein he shall find God's will and pleasure, what he willeth all men to do, and what not to do; and also by them he should prove and try all doctrines, and the false doctrine from the true.

Lewis said, it was never well since the bible was translated into English; and that he was both an heretic and a traitor that caused it to be translated into English (meaning Cromwel), and therefore was rewarded according to his deserts.

Wilmot answered again, What his deserts and offences were to his prince a great many do not know, neither is it of any force whether they do or no, since, he was sure that he lost his life for offending his prince, and the law did put it in execution: adding moreover, concerning that man, that he thought it pleased God to raise him from a low estate, and to place him in high authority, partly unto this, that he should do that which all the bishops in the realm yet never did, in restoring again God's holy word, which being hid long before from the people in a strange tongue, and now coming abroad amongst us, will bring our bishops and priests, said he, in less estimation among the people.

Lewis asked, Why so?

Wilmot said, Because their doctrine and living is not agreeable to his word.

Then said Lewis, I never heard but that all men should learn of the bishops and priests, because they are learned men, and have been brought up in learning all the days of their lives. Wherefore they must needs know the truth, and our fathers did believe their doctrine and learning, and I think they did well, for the world was far better then than it is now.

Wilmot answered, I will not say so: for we must not believe them because they are bishops, neither because they are learned, neither because our forefathers did follow their doctrine. For I have read in God's book, how that bishops and learned men have taught the people false doctrine, and likewise the priests from time to time, and indeed those people our forefathers believed as they taught, and as they thought, so thought the people. But for all this Christ calleth them false prophets, thieves, and murderers, blind leaders of the blind, willing the people to take heed of them, lest they should both fall into the ditch.

Moreover we read, that the bishops, priests, and learned men have been commonly resisters of the truth from time to time, and have always persecuted the prophets in the old law, as their successors did persecute our Saviour Christ and his disciples in the new law. We must take heed therefore that we credit them no further than God will have us, neither follow them nor our forefathers otherwise than he commandeth us. For Almighty God hath given to all people, as well to kings and princes, as bishops, priests, learned and unlearned men, a commandment and law, unto which he willeth all men to be obedient. Therefore if any bishop or priest preach or teach, or prince or magistrate command any thing contrary to his commandment, we must take heed how we obey them. For it is better for us to obey God than man.

Marry, sir, quoth Lewis, you are an holy doctor indeed. By God's blood, if you were my man, I would set you about your business a little better, and not suffer you to look upon books, and so would your master if he were wise. And with that in came his master, and a young man with him, who was a servant to Mr. Daubney, in Watling-street.

His master asked him what was the matter.

Lewis said, that he had a knavish boy here to his servant, and how that if he were his, he would rather hang him than keep him in his house.

Then his master being somewhat moved, asked his fellows what the matter was.

They said, they began to talk about Dr. Crome.

Then his master asked what he had said, swearing a great oath, that he would make him tell him.

He said, That he trusted he had said nothing, where-with either he or Mr. Lewis might justly be offended, I pray (quoth Wilmot), ask him what I said.

Marry (said Lewis), this he said, that Dr. Crome did preach and teach nothing but the truth, and how that if he recanted on Sunday next he would be sorry to hear it, and that if he do, he is made to do it against his conscience. And more he saith, that we must not follow our bishops' doctrine and preaching: for, saith he, they be hinderers of God's word, and persecutors of that; and how Cromwel (that traitor) did more good in setting forth the bible, than all our bishops have done these hundred years: thus reporting the matter worse than it really was.

His master hearing this, was in a great fury, and rated him, saying, that either he would be hanged or burned, swearing that he would take away all his books and burn them.

The young man (Mr. Daubney's servant) standing by hearing this, began to speak on his part unto Lewis, and his talk confirmed all the sayings of the other to be true.

This

This young man was learned, his name was Thomas Fairfax. Lewis hearing this man's talk as well as the other's, went his way in a rage to the court.

On the next day they heard, that the said Wilmot and Fairfax were sent for to come to the lord mayor. The messenger was Mr. Smart, the sword-bearer of London. They came before dinner to the mayor's house, and were commanded to sit down to dinner in the hall; and when dinner was done, they were both called into a parlour, where the mayor and sir Roger Cholmley was, who examined them severally, the one not hearing the other.

The effect of their discourse was this; sir Roger Cholmley said to Wilmot, that my lord mayor and he had received a commandment from the council, to send for him and his company, and to examine them of certain things which were laid to their charge.

Then said Mr. Cholmley to him, Sirrah, what countryman art thou? He answered, That he was born in Cambridgeshire, and in such a town. Then he asked him, how long he had been in the city. He told him.

Then he asked what learning he had. He said, little learning and small knowledge. Then (deridingly) he asked how long he had known Dr. Crome. He said, about two years. Then he called him a lying boy, and said that he (the said Wilmot) was his son.

The other said unto him, that was unlike, for that he never saw his mother, nor she him. Cholmley said he lied. Wilmot said he could prove it to be true. Then he asked him how he liked his sermon that he made at St. Thomas Acres chapel in Lent. He said that indeed he heard him not. He said yes, and the other nay. Then said he, What say you to his sermon made at the Cross the last day, heard you not that?

Wilmot. Yes, and in that sermon he deceived a great number of people:

Cholmley. How so?

Wilmot. For that they looked that he should have recanted his doctrine that he taught before, and did not, but rather confirmed it.

Cholmley. Yea, sir, but how say you now to him? For he hath recanted before the council; and hath promised on Sunday next to be at the Cross again; how think you of that?

Wilmot. If he so did, I am the more sorry to hear it; and said, he thought he did it for fear and safeguard of his life.

Cholmley. But what say you? Was his first sermon heresy or not?

Wilmot. No, I suppose it was no heresy. For if it were, St. Paul's epistle to the Hebrews was heresy, and Paul an heretic that preached such doctrine; but God forbid that any christian man should so think of the holy apostle; neither do I so think.

Cholmley. Why, how knowest thou that St. Paul wrote those things that are in English now, to be true, whereas Paul never wrote English or Latin?

Wilmot. I am certified that learned men of God, that did seek to advance his word, did translate the same out of the Greek and Hebrew into Latin and English, and that they durst not presume to alter the sense of the scripture of God, and last will and testament of Christ Jesus.

Then the lord mayor, being in a great fury, asked him what he had to do to read such books, and said, that it was a pity that his master did suffer him so to do, and that he was not set better to work; and in fine said unto him, that he had spoken evil of my lord of Winchester, and bishop Bonner, those reverend and learned fathers and counsellors of this realm, for which his fact he saw no other but he must suffer, as was due to the same. And Mr. Cholmley said, Yea, my lord, there is such a sort of heretics and traitorous knaves taken now in Essex by my lord Rich, that is too wonderful to hear. They shall be sent to the bishop shortly, and shall be hanged and burned all.

Wilmot. I am sorry to hear that of my lord Rich, for that he was my godfather, and gave me my name at my baptism.

Cholmley asked him when he spake with him. He said, not these twelve years.

Cholmley. If he knew that you were such a one, he would do the like by you, and in so doing he should do God great service.

Wilmot. I have read the same saying in the gospel that Christ said to his disciples, "The time shall come, faith he, that whosoever killeth you, shall think that he shall do God good service."

Well, sir, said Cholmley, because you are so full of your scripture, and so well learned, we consider you lack a quiet place to study in. Therefore you shall go to a place where you shall be most quiet, and I would wish you to study how you will answer to the council of those things which they have to charge you with, for else it is like to cost you your best joint. I know my lord of Winchester will handle you well enough, when he hearth thus much. Then was the officer called in to have him to the Compter, in the Poultry, and the other to the other Compter, not one of them to see another; and thus they remained eight days. In which time their masters made great suit to the lord mayor, and to sir Roger Cholmley, to know their offences, and that they might be delivered.

At length they procured the wardens of the company of drapers to labour with them in their suit to the mayor. The mayor went with them to the council: but at that time they could find no grace at Winchester's hand, and sir Anthony Browne's, but that they had deserved death, and that they should have the law.

At length, through much intreaty, he granted them this favour, that they should not die as they had deserved, but should be tied to a cart's tail, and be whipped three market-days through the city. Thus they came home that day, and went another day, and the master and wardens of the company petitioned on their knees to have this open punishment released, forsomuch as they were servants of so worshipful a company, and that they might be punished in their own hall before the wardens and certain of the company, which at length was granted.

The next day they appeared before the masters in the hall, their own masters being present, where they were charged with heresy and treason, for which, they were told, they deserved death, and this was declared with a long process by Mr. Brookes, the master of the company, declaring what labour and suit the mayor and wardens had made for them, to save them from death, which they (as he said) had deserved, and from open shame, which they should have had, being judged by the council to have been whipped three days through the city at a cart's tail, and from these two dangers they had laboured to deliver them, but not without great trouble and charge. For (said he) the company hath promised to the council for this their mercy towards them, an hundred pounds, notwithstanding we must see them punished in our hall within ourselves for those their offences. After these and many other words, he commanded them to prepare themselves to receive their punishment.

Then they were put asunder, and stripped from the waist upward one after another, and had into the midst of the hall, where they were wont to make their fire; there was a great ring of iron, to which there was a rope tied fast, and one of their feet tied fast to that.

Then came down two men disguised in mummers apparel, with visors on their faces, and they beat them with great rods till the blood flowed out of their bodies. As for Wilmot, he could not lie in his bed for six nights after, for Brookes played the tyrant with them; so that with the pain and fear, they were never in health afterwards, as the said Wilmot with his mouth hath credibly informed us, and we can do no less than testify the same.

Thus have we briefly declared this little tragedy, wherein we may note the malice of the enemies at all times to those who profess Christ, and take his part, of what estate or degree soever they be, according to the apostle's saying, "It is given unto you not only to believe, but also to suffer with him." To whom be honour and glory. Amen.

The Scourging of THOMAS GREEN, Printer, written by his own Hand.

IN the reign of queen Mary, I Thomas Green, being brought before Dr. Story by my master, whose name is John Wayland, a printer, for a book called Antichrist, which had been distributed to certain honest men; he asked me where I had the book, and said I was a traitor. I told him I had the book of a Frenchman. Then he asked me more questions, but I told him I could tell him no more. Then he said, it was no heresy, but treason, and that I should be hanged, drawn, and quartered; and so he called for Cluny, the keeper of the Lollards' Tower, and bid him set me fast in the stocks; and he took me out, and carried me to the Coal-house, and there I found a Frenchman lying in the stocks, and he took him out, and put a bolt and a fetter on my right leg, and another on my right hand, and so he set me cross fettered in the stocks, and took the Frenchman away with him, and there I lay a day and a night. On the morrow after, he came and said, Let me shift your hand and your leg, because you shall not be lame; and he made as though he pitied me, and said, tell me the truth, and I will be your friend.

And I said, I had told the truth, and could tell no otherwise. Then he put only my leg in the stocks, and so went his way, and there I remained six days, and would come to no answer.

Then Dr. Story sent for me, and asked whether I would tell him the truth, where I had the book. I said I had told him, of a Frenchman. He asked me where I came acquainted with the Frenchman, where he dwelt, and where he delivered me the book. I said, I came acquainted with him in Newgate, I coming to my friends, who were put in for God's word and truth's sake, and the Frenchman coming to his friends also, there we talked together, and became acquainted one with another, and did eat and drink together there with our friends, in the fear of God.

Then Story scoffed at me, and said, Then there was brother in Christ, and brother in Christ; and reviled me, and called me an heretic, and asked me if I had the book of him in Newgate. I said no; and I told him, as I went on my business in the street I met him, and he asked me how I did, and I him also; so falling into discourse, he shewed me that book, and I desired him that he would let me have it.

In this examination Story said, it was a great book, and asked me whether I bought it, or had it given me. I told him I bought it. Then he said, I was a thief, and had stolen my master's money. And I said, a little money served, for I gave him but four-pence, but I promised him, that at our next meeting I would give him twelve-pence more. And he said, that was boldly done, for such a book as spake both treason and heresy.

Then Story required me to bring him two fureties, and watch for him that I had the book of, and I should have no harm. I made him answer, I would bring no fureties, nor could I tell where to find them. Then, said he, this is but a lie; and so called for Cluny, and bid him lay me fast in the Coal-house, saying, he would make me tell another tale at my next coming: and so I lay in the stocks day and night, but only when I eat my meat, and there I remained ten days before I was called for again.

Then Dr. Story sent for me again, and asked if I would yet tell him the truth; I said, I neither could nor would tell him any other truth than I had done already. And while I was there standing, there were two brought, which I took to be prisoners.

Then Mrs. Story fell in a rage, and swore a great oath, that it were a good deed to put a hundred or two of these heretic knaves in a house, and I myself (said she) would set it on fire. So I was committed to prison again, where I remained fourteen days, and came to no answer.

Then Story sent for me again, and called me into the garden, where I found with him my lord of Windfor's chaplain, and two gentlemen more, and he told them all what they had said and done. They said, the book was a wondrous evil book, and had both treason and heresy in it. They then asked me what I said of the book. And I said, I knew no evil of it.

At which words Story chafed, and said he would hang me up by the hand with a rope; and said also, he would cut out my tongue, and mine ears also from my head. After this they alledged two or three things unto me out of the book. And I answered, I had not read the book throughout, and therefore I could give no judgment of it.

Then my lord of Windfor's chaplain and the other two gentlemen took me aside, and intreated me very gently, saying, Tell us where you had the book, and of whom, and I will save you harmless. I made them answer, that I had told all I could to Dr. Story, and began to tell it them again: but they said, they knew that already; so they left that talk, and went again with me to Story.

Then Story burdened me with my faith, and said I was an heretic. Whereupon the chaplain asked me how I did believe. Then I began to rehearse the articles of my belief, but he bid me let that alone. Then he asked me how I believed in Christ. I made him answer, that I believed in Christ who died and rose again the third day, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father.

Whereupon Story asked me mockingly, What is the right hand of God? I made him answer, I thought it was his glory. Then said he, So they say all. And he asked me when he would be weary of sitting there. Then inferred my lord of Windfor's chaplain, asking me what I said of the mass. I said I never knew what it was, nor what it meant, for I understood it not, because I never learned any Latin, and since the time I had any knowledge, I had been brought up in nothing but in reading of English, and with such men as have taught the same; with many more questions, which I cannot rehearse.

Moreover, he asked me if there were not the very body of Christ, flesh, blood, and bone, in the mass, after the priest had consecrated it. And I made him answer, As for the mass I cannot understand it; but in the New Testament I read, that as the apostles stood looking after the Lord when he ascended up into heaven, an angel said to them, "Even as ye see him ascend up, so shall he come again." And I told them another sentence, where Christ saith, "The poor shall you have always with you, but me ye shall not have always."

Then Mr. Chaplain put many more questions to me, to which I made no answer. Among others, he brought Chrysostom and St. Hierome, for his purpose. To whom I answered, that I neither minded nor was able to answer their doctors, neither knew whether they alledged them right, or no; but to that which is written in the New Testament I would answer. Here they laughed me to scorn, and called me fool, and said, they would reason no more with me.

Then Dr. Story called for Cluny, and bid him take me away, and set me fast, and let no man speak with me. So I was sent to the Coal-house; where I had not been a week, but there came in fourteen prisoners: but I was still kept alone without company, in a prison called Salt-house, having upon my leg a bolt and a fetter, and my hands manacled together with irons, and there continued ten days having nothing to lie on, but bare stones or a board.

On a time whilst I lay there in prison, the bishop of London coming down a pair of stairs on the back-side undrest, in his hose and doublet, looked through the grate, and asked wherefore I was put in, and who put me in.

I made him answer, that I was put in for a book called Antichrist, by Dr. Story. And he said, You are not ashamed to declare wherefore you were put in, and said it was a very wicked book, and bid me confess the truth to Story. I said, I had told the truth to him already, and desired him to be good unto me, and help me out of prison, for they had kept me there a long time.

time. And he said, he could not meddle with it; Story hath begun, and must end it.

Then I was removed out of the Salt-house to give place to two women, and carried to the Lollards' Tower, and put in the stocks; and there I found two prisoners, one called Lion, a Frenchman, and another with him: and so I was kept in the stocks more than a month both day and night, and no man suffered to come to me, or to speak with me, but only my keeper, who brought me meat.

Thus we three being together, Lion, the Frenchman, sung a psalm in the French tongue, and we sang with him, so that we were heard down in the street, and the keeper coming up in a great rage, swore that he would put us all in the stocks; and so took the Frenchman, and commanded him to kneel down upon his knees, and put both his hands in the stocks, where he remained all that night till the next day.

After this, I being in Lollards' Tower seven days, since my last being with Story, he swore a great oath, that he would rack me, and make me tell the truth. Then Story sending for me, commanded me to be brought to Walbrook, where he and the commissioners dined; and by the way my keeper told me that I should go to the Tower to be racked. So when they had dined, Story called for me in, and there I stood before them, and some said I was worthy to be hanged for having such heretical books. After I had staid a little while before them, Story called for the keeper, and commanded him to carry me to the Lollards' Tower again, and said, he had other matters of the queen's to do with the commissioners, but he would find another time for me. Whilst I lay yet in the Lollards' Tower, the woman which brought the books over, being taken, and her books, was put in the Clink, in Southwark, by Hufsey, one of the arches; and I Thomas Green do testify before God, now, that I neither discovered the man nor the woman, of whom I had the books.

Then I lying in the Lollards' Tower, being sent for before Mr. Hufsey, he required of me, wherefore I was put into the Lollards' Tower, and by whom. To whom I made answer, that I was put there by Dr. Story for a book called Antichrist. Then he made as though he would be my friend, and said he knew my friends, and my father and mother, and bid me tell him of whom I had the book, and said, Come on, tell me the truth. I told him as I had told Dr. Story before.

Then he was angry, and said, I love thee well, and therefore I send for thee, and looked for a further truth: but I could tell him no other; wherefore he sent me again to the Lollards' Tower. At my going away he called me back again, and said, that Dixon gave me the books, being an old man, dwelling in Birchin-lane; and I said he knew the matter better than I. So he sent me away to the Lollards' Tower, where I remained seven days more.

Then Mr. Hufsey sent for me again, and required of me to tell him the truth. I told him I could tell him no other truth than I had told Dr. Story before.

Then he began to tell me of Dixon, of whom, he said, I had the books, who had made the matter manifest before; and he told me of all things touching Dixon and the books, more than I could myself, inasmuch that he told me how many I had, and that he had a sack full of them in his house, and knew where the woman lay better than myself. Then I saw the matter so open and manifest before my face, that it signified nothing for me to stand in it. He asked me what I had done with the books, and I told him I had but one, and that Dr. Story had. He said I lied, for I had three at one time, and he required me to tell him of one.

Then I told him of one that John Beane had of me, being apprentice with Mr. Turtle. So he promised me before and after, and as he should be saved before God, that he should have no harm. And I kneeling down upon my knees, desired him to take my blood, and not to hurt the young man. Then he said, Because you have been so stubborn, the matter being made manifest by others and not by you, being so long in prison, tell me if you will stand to my judgment. I said, Yea, take my blood, and hurt not the young man.

Then he told me, I should be whipped like a thief and a vagabond: and so I thanked him, and went my way with my keeper to the Lollards' Tower, where I remained two or three days, and so was brought by the keeper Cluny, by the commandment of the commissioners, to Christ's-Hospital, sometime the Grey-Friars, and accordingly had there for that time the correction of thieves and vagabonds; and so was delivered to Tri-nian, the porter, and put into a stinking dungeon.

And after a few days, I finding friendship, was let out of the dungeon, and lay in a bed in the night, and walked in a yard by the dungeon in the day-time, and so remained prisoner a month and more.

At length Dr. Story came and two gentlemen with him, and called for me, and I was brought before them. Then he said to the gentlemen, Here cometh this heretic, of whom I had the book called Antichrist; and began to tell them how many times I had been before him, and said, I have intreated him very gently, and he would never tell me the truth, till it was found out by others. Then said he, it were a good deed to cut out thy tongue, and thine ears off thy head, to make thee an example to all other heretic knaves. And the gentlemen said, Nay, that were pity. Then he asked if I would not become an honest man: and I said, Yes, for I have offended God many ways. Whereupon he burdened me with my faith; I told him that I had made him answer of my faith before my lord Windsor's chaplain, as much as I could.

So in the end he commanded me to be stripped, he standing by me, and called for two of the beadles and the whips to whip me; and the two beadles came with a cord, and bound my hands together, and the one end of the cord to a stone pillar. Then one of my friends, called Nicholas Priestman, hearing them call for whips, hurled in a bundle of rods, which seemed something to pacify the mind of his cruelty; and they scourged me with rods. But as they were whipping of me, Story asked me if I would go unto my master again, and I said nay. And he said, I perceive now he will be worse than ever he was before: but let me alone (quoth he), I will find him out if he be in England. And so with many other things, which I cannot rehearse, when they had done whipping of me, they bid me pay my fees, and go my ways.

Dr. Story commanded that he should have an hundred stripes, but the gentlemen so intreated, that he had not so many, Story saying, If I might have my will, I would surely cut out his tongue.

A LETTER

From STEPHEN COTTEN to his Brother, declaring how he was beaten twice by Bishop BONNER, before he was burnt at Brentford.

BROTHER, in the name of the Lord Jesus, I commend me unto you, and I do heartily thank you, for your godly exhortation and counsel in your last letter declared to me. And albeit I do perceive by your letter, you are informed, that as we are divers persons in number, so we are of contrary sects, conditions, and opinions, contrary to the good opinion you had of us at your last being with us in Newgate; be you most assured, good brother, in the Lord Jesus, we are all of one mind, one faith, one assured hope in the Lord Jesus, whom I trust we altogether with one spirit, one brotherly love, do daily call upon for mercy and forgiveness of our sins, with earnest repentance of our former lives, and by whose precious blood-shedding we trust to be saved only, and by no other means. Wherefore, good brother, in the name of the Lord, seeing these impudent people, whose minds are altogether bent to wickedness, envy, uncharitableness, evil speaking, do go about to slander us with untruth, believe them not, neither let their wicked sayings once enter into your mind. And I trust one day to see you again, although now I am in God's prison, which is a joyful school for them that love love their Lord God, and to me, being a simple scholar, most joyful of all.

Good brother, once again I do, in the name of our Lord Jesus, exhort you to pray for me, that I may fight strongly in the Lord's battle, to be a good soldier to my captain Jesus Christ our Lord, and desire my sister also to do the same, and do ye not mourn or lament for me, but be ye glad and joyful of this my trouble: for I trust to be loosed out of this dungeon shortly, and to go to everlasting joy, which never shall have end. I heard how ye were with the commissioners. I pray you, sue no more for me, good brother. But one thing I shall desire you, to be at my departing out of this life, that you may bear witness with me that I shall die, I trust in God, a true christian, and, I hope, all my companions in the Lord our God: and therefore believe not these evil-disposed people, who are the authors of all untruths.

I pray you provide me a long shirt against the day of our deliverance; for the shirt you gave me last, I have given to one of my companions, who had more need than I; as for the money and meat you sent us, the bishop's servants delivered none to us, neither he whom you had so great trust in. Brother, there is none of them to trust to, for the master and servant are both alike. I have been twice beaten, and threatened to be beaten again by the bishop himself. I suppose we shall go into the country to Fulham, to the bishop's house, and there be arraigned. I would have you to hearken as much as you can. For when we shall go, it will be suddenly done. Thus fare you well. From the Coal-house, this present Friday.

Your brother,
STEPHEN COTTEN.

The Scourging of JAMES HARRIS.

IN this society of the scourged professors of Christ, was also one James Harris, of Billerica, in Essex, a stripping of the age of seventeen years; who being apprehended and sent up to Bonner in the company of Margaret Ellis, by sir John Mordaunt, knight, and Edmund Tyrrel, justice of peace (as appeareth by their own letters before mentioned), was by Bonner divers times strictly examined. In which examinations he was charged not to have come to his parish church for the space of one year or more. Whereunto he granted, confessing there withal, that once, for fear, he had been at the church, and there had received the popish sacrament of the altar, for which he was heartily sorry, detesting the same with all his heart.

After this, and such like answers, Bonner (the better to try him) persuaded him to go to confession. The lad, somewhat to fulfil his request, consented to go, and did. But when he came to the priest, he stood still, and said nothing. Why, quoth the priest, sayest thou nothing? What shall I say? said Harris. Thou must confess thy sins, said the priest. My sins, said he, be so many, that they cannot be numbered. With that the priest told Bonner what he had said; and he, of his accustomed devotion, took the poor lad into his garden, and there, with a rod, taken from off a cherry-tree, did most cruelly whip him.

The Scourging of ROBERT WILLIAMS, a Smith.

ROBERT WILLIAMS, who being apprehended in the same company, was so tormented after the same manner with rods in his harbour, who there subscribing and yielding himself by promise to obey the laws, after being let go, refused so to do: whereupon he was earnestly sought for, but could not be found, for that he kept himself close, and went not abroad but by stealth: and now in the mean time of this persecution, this Robert Williams departed this life, and so escaped the hands of his enemies. The Lord therefore be honoured for ever. Amen.

And forasmuch as I have begun to write of Bonner's scourging, by the occasion thereof cometh to mind to infer by the way, his beating of other boys and children, and drawing them naked through the nettles, in his journey, rowing towards Fulham. The story, though it touch no matter of religion, yet because it sheweth something of the nature and disposition of that man, and may refresh the reader, wearied perhaps with other doleful stories, I thought not to omit.

Bonner, passing from London to Fulham by water, having John Willis and Thomas Hinshaw above-mentioned with him, both prisoners for religion, by the way as he went, was saying even-song with Harpsfield, his chaplain, in the barge, and being about the middle of their orisons, they espied some young men swimming and washing themselves in the Thames, over against Lambeth, or a little above: unto whom he went and gave very gentle language, and fair speech, until he had set his men on land.

That done, his men ran after the boys to get them, as the bishop commanded them before, beating some with nettles, drawing some through bushes of nettles naked, and some they made to leap into the Thames to save themselves, that it was marvelled they were not drowned.

Now as the children for fear did cry, and as this skirmishing was between them, immediately came a greater lad thither, to know what the matter meant that the boys made such a noise. Whom when the bishop espied, he asked him whether he would maintain them in their doings or no. Unto whom the young fellow made answer stoutly, Yea. Then the bishop commanded him to be taken also: but he ran away with speed, and thus avoided the bishop's blessing. Now when the bishop saw him run away, and another man sitting upon a rail in the way where he ran, he desired him likewise to stop the boy: and because he would not, he commanded his man to fetch that man to him also; but he hearing that, ran away as fast as he could, and by leaping over the ditch, escaped the bishop in like manner.

Then the bishop, seeing the success of his battle to prove no better, cried to a couple of Ferry-boys to run and hold him that last ran away. And because they said they could not (as indeed it was true), therefore he caused his men to take and beat them. The boys hearing that, leapt into the water to save themselves; notwithstanding they were caught, and in the water by the bishop's men held and beat.

Now, after the end of this skirmish, the bishop's men returned to their master again into the barge, and he and Harpsfield his chaplain, went to their even-song afresh where they left, and so forsooth the rest of their service, as clean without malice, as an egg without meat. The Lord give him repentance (if it be his will), and grace to become a new man. Amen.

The Whipping of a Beggar at Salisbury.

UNTO these above specified, is also to be added the miserable whipping of a poor starved beggar, who, because he would not receive the sacrament at Easter in the town of Colingborow, was brought to Salisbury with bills and glieves to the chancellor Dr. Geffery, who cast him into the dungeon, and after caused him miserably to be whipped by two catch-poles. The sight whereof made all godly hearts to rue it, to see such tyranny to be shewed upon such a simple and silly wretch: for they that saw him have reported, that they never saw a more simple creature. But what pity can move the hearts of merciless papists.

Besides these above-named, divers others also suffered the like scourgings and whippings in their bodies for their faithful standing in the truth. Of whom it may be said, as it is written of the apostles in the Acts, "Which departed from the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer for the name of Jesus."

Another Treatise of such as being pursued in Queen MARY's Time, were in great Danger, and yet through the good Providence of God, mercifully were preserved.

ALTHOUGH the secret purpose of Almighty God, which disposeth all things, suffered a great number of his faithful servants both men and women, and that of all ages and degrees, to fall into the enemy's hands, to abide the brunt of this persecution, to be tried with rods, with whips, with racks, with fetters, with famine, with burning of hands, with plucking off beards, with burning also both hand, beard, and body, &c.

Yet notwithstanding some there were again, and that a great number, who miraculously by the merciful providence of God, against all men's expectation, in safety, were delivered out of the fiery rage of this persecution, either by quitting the realm, or shifting of place, or the Lord so blinding the eyes of the persecutors, or disposing the opportunity of time, or working some such means or other for his servants, as not only ought to stir them up to perpetual thanks, but also may move all men both to behold and magnify the wondrous works of the Almighty.

About the time it began to be known that queen Mary was sick, divers good men were in hold in divers quarters of the realm, some at Bury, some at Salisbury, as John Hunt, and Richard White, of whom we have treated before, and some at London, amongst whom was William Living, and his wife, and John Lithal, of whom something remaineth now compendiously to be touched.

An Account of the Persecution and Deliverance of WILLIAM LIVING, with his Wife, and of JOHN LITHAL, Ministers.

ABOUT the latter end of queen Mary's reign, she then being sick, came one Cox, a promoter, to the house of William Living, about six o'clock, accompanied with one John Launce, of the Greyhound. They being not ready, they demanded some buttons, saying, they should be as well paid for them as any; and he would come about three hours after for them again.

In the mean time he procured one Mr. Dean, the constable, and George Hancock, the beadle of that ward, and searching his books, found a book of astronomy, called the work of Joannas de Sacro Bosco de Sphæra, with figures, some round, some triangle, some quadrangle, which book, because it was gilt, seemed to him the chief book there, and that he carried open in the street, saying, I have found him at length. It is no wonder the queen be sick, seeing there be such conjurers in privy corners; but now I trust he shall conjure no more; and so brought him and his wife from Shoe-lane through Fleet-street, into St. Paul's church-yard, with the constable, the beadle, and two others following them, till they entered into Darbshire's house, who was bishop Bonner's chancellor: and after the constable and they had talked with Darbshire, he came forth, and walked in his yard, and said to him,

What is your name?

Liv. William Living.

Darb. What are you? a priest?

Liv. Yea.

Darb. Is this your wife that is come with you?

Liv. That she is.

Darb. Where were you made priest?

Liv. At Obourne.

Darb. In what bishop's days?

Liv. By the bishop of Lincoln, that was king Henry's spiritual father in Cardinal Wolsey's time.

Darb. You are a schismatic and a traitor.

Liv. I would be sorry that were true. I am certain I never was a traitor, but always have taught obedience according to the tenor of God's word; and when tumults and schisms have been stirred, I have preached God's word, and assuaged them as in the time of king Edward.

Darb. What, you are a schismatic. You be not in the unity of the catholic church: for you pray not as the church of Rome doth: you pray in English.

Liv. We are certain we be in the true church.

Darb. There be that doubt thereof, forasmuch as there is but one true church. Well, you will learn against I talk with you again, to know the church of Rome, and to be a member thereof.

Liv. If the church of Rome be of that church whereof Christ is the head, then I am a member thereof, for I know no other church but that.

Darb. Well, Cluny, take him with thee to the Coal-house.

Then he called Cluny again, and spake secretly to him, but what he said I know not.

Then said Cluny, Wilt thou not come? And so plucked me away violently, and brought me to his own house in Paternoster-row, where he robbed me of my purse, my girdle, and my psalter, and a New Testament of Geneva, and then brought me to the Coal-house to put me in the stocks, saying, Put in both your legs and your hands; and except you fine with me, I will put a collar about your neck. What is the fine? quoth I; forty shillings, quoth he; I am never able to pay it, said I.

Then said he, You have friends that be able. I denied it; and so he put both my legs into the stocks till supper-time, which was six o'clock; and then a cousin of my wife's brought me meat, who seeing me sit there, said, I will give you forty pence, and let him go at liberty: and he took her money, and presently let me forth in her sight, to eat my supper. And at seven o'clock, he put me in the stocks again, and I remained till two o'clock the next day, and so he let me forth till night. This woman above-mentioned was Griffin's first wife, a brother dwelling then in Aldermanbury, and afterwards in Cheapside.

The Thursday following, in the afternoon, was I called to the Lollards' Tower, and there put into the stocks, having the honour to put my leg into that hole which Mr. John Philpot's leg was in, and so lay all that night, nobody coming to me either with meat or drink.

At eleven o'clock on the Friday, Cluny came to me with meat, and let me forth, and about one o'clock he brought me to Darbshire's house, who drew forth a scroll of names, and asked me if I knew none of them: I said, I knew none of them but Foster. And so I kneeled down upon my knees, and prayed him that he would not inquire thereof any farther. And with that came forth two godly women, who said, Mr. Darbshire, it is enough; and so became sureties for me, and paid to Cluny fifteen shillings for my fees, and bade me go with them.

And thus much concerning William Living. After this came his wife to examination, whose answers to Darbshire, the chancellor, here likewise follow.

The Examination of JULIAN LIVING, Wife to WILLIAM LIVING.

Darbshire. AH, firrah; I see by your going you be one of the sisters.

Julian. I wear not my gown for sisterhood, neither for nunnery, but to keep me warm.

Darb. Nun? No, I dare say you be none: is that man your husband?

Julian. Yea.

Darb. Is he a priest?

Julian. No, he saith no mass.

Darb. What then? he is a priest. How darest thou marry him?

Then he shewed me a roll of certain names of citizens.

To whom I answered, I knew none of them.

Then said he, You shall be made to know them.

Then

Then said I, Do no other but justice and right, for the day will come, that thou shalt answer for it.

Darb. Why, woman, thinkest thou not that I have a soul?

Julian. Yes, I know you have a soul; but whether it be to salvation or damnation, I cannot tell.

Darb. Ho, Cluny, have her to the Lollards'-Tower. And so he took me, and carried me to his house, where was one Dale, a promoter, who said to me, Alas, good woman, wherefore be you here?

What is that to you? said I.

You be not ashamed, quoth Dale, to tell wherefore you come hither.

No, quoth I, that I am not; for it is for Christ's Testament.

Christ's Testament? quoth he. It is the devil's Testament.

O Lord, quoth I, God forbid that any man should speak any such word.

Well, well, said he, you shall be ordered well enough. You care not for burning, quoth he. God's blood, there must be some other means found for you.

What, quoth I, will you find any worse than you have found?

Well, quoth he, you hope, and you hope: but your hope shall be cut off. For though the queen fail, she that you hope for shall never come at it; for there is my lord cardinal's grace, and many more between her and it.

Then, quoth I, my hope is in none but God.

Then said Cluny, Come with me; and so I went to the Lollards'-Tower. On the next day Darbshire sent for me again, and inquired of those citizens that he inquired of before.

I answered, I knew them not.

Where were you, quoth he, at the communion on Sunday was fortnight?

And I said, In no place.

Then the constable of St. Bride's being there, made suit for me.

And Darbshire demanded of him, if he would be bound for me.

He answered, Yea. And so he was bound for my appearance betwixt that and Christmas.

Then Darbshire said, You be constable, and should give her good counsel.

So I do, quoth he. For I bid her go to mass, and to say as you say. For, by the mass, if you say the crow is white, I will say so too.

And thus much concerning the examination of William Living and his wife, whom although thou seest here delivered through the request of women, his sureties, yet it was no doubt, but that the deadly sickness of queen Mary abated and bridled, rather than the cruelty of those papists, which otherwise would never have let them go.

An Account of the Trouble and Deliverance of JOHN LITHAL.

AT the taking of William Living, it happened that some of his books were in the custody of one John Lithal; which known, the constable of the ward of Southwark, with other of the queen's servants, were sent to his house, who breaking open his doors and chests, took away not only the books of the said William Living, but also all his own books, writings, and bills of debts, which he never had again. All this while Lithal was not at home.

The next Saturday after, as he was returned, and known to be at home, John Auales and some of the queen's servants beset his house all the night, with such careful watch; that as he in the morning issued out of doors, thinking to escape their hands, John Auales bursting out upon him, cried, Stop the traitor, stop the traitor. Whereat Lithal being amazed, looked back.

And so John Auales came running to him, with others that were with him, saying, Ah, firrah, you are a traitorous fellow indeed, we have had somewhat to do to get you. To whom he answered, that he was a truer man to the queen's majesty than he. For you, said he, are commanded by God to keep holy the sabbath-day, and you seek to shed your neighbour's blood on the sabbath-day. Remember that you must answer it to God. But he said, Come on, you villain, you must go before the council. So Lithal was brought into St. Paul's church-yard to the bishop's chancellor, by John Auales, saying, that they had there caught the captain of these fellows, and so caused him to be called to examination before Dr. Darbshire, who began with him in this wise:

No. 56.

Chan. What countryman are you?

Lith. I am an Englishman, born in Staffordshire.

Chan. Where were you brought up?

Lith. In this our country of England.

Chan. In what university?

Lith. In no university, but in a free-school.

Chan. We had certain books from your house, and writing, wherein is both treason and heresy.

Lith. Sir, there is neither treason nor heresy in them.

Then the chancellor asked for certain other men that I knew.

Lith. If you have aught to lay to my charge, I will answer it; but I will have no other man's blood upon my head.

Chan. Why come you not to the church? Of what church be you, that you come not to your own parish church?

Lith. I am of the church of Christ, the fountain of all goodness.

Chan. Have you no ministers of your church, but Christ?

Lith. We have others.

Chan. Where be they?

Lith. In the whole world, dispersed, preaching and professing the gospel and faith only in our Saviour Jesus, as he commanded them.

Chan. You boast much every one of you of your faith and belief: let me hear therefore the effect how you believe.

Lith. I believe to be justified really by Christ Jesus, according to the saying of St. Paul to the Ephesians, without either deeds or works, or any thing that may be invented by man.

Chan. Faith cannot save without works.

Lith. That is contrary to the doctrine of the apostles.

Chan. John Auales, you and the keeper have this fellow to prison.

Then John Auales, and Cluny the keeper, had me unto St. Paul's, and would have had me seen the apostles' mass.

Lith. I know none the apostles had, and therefore I will see none.

Cluny and John Auales. Come and kneel down before the rood, and say a Paternoster, and an Ave in the worship of the five wounds.

Lith. I am forbidden by God's own mouth to kneel to any idol or image; therefore I will not.

Then they pulled me with great extremity, one having me by one arm, and the other by the other; but God gave me at that present time more strength than both these, his name be praised for it.

Then when they could not make me to kneel before the rood, neither to see the mass, there gathered a great company about us, and all against me. Some spit on me, and said, Fie on thee, heretic; and others said, it was a pity I was not burned already.

Then they carried me to Lollards'-Tower, and hanged me in a great pair of stocks, in which I lay three days and three nights, till I was so lame that I could neither stir nor move.

Then I offered the keeper some money and gold that I had about me, to release me out of the stocks: and he said, I would not be ruled by him, either to see mass, or to kneel before the rood, and therefore I should lie there still. But I said, I would never do the thing that should be against my conscience; and though you have lamed my body, yet my conscience is whole, I praise God for it. So shortly after he let me out of the stocks, more for the love of my money (as it may be thought), than for any other affection; and within four or five days my wife got leave of Mr. Chancellor to come to me, to bring me such things as were needful for me, and there I lay five weeks and odd days. In which time divers of my neighbours and friends made suit to the chancellor for my deliverance; the bishop, as they said, at that time being sick at Fulham. So my neighbours being there, about twenty of them, the chancellor sent for me out of Lollards' Tower to his own house, and said as follows—

Lith. here are some of thy neighbours who have been with me to intreat for thee, and they have informed me, that thou hast been a very honest and quiet neighbour among them, and I think it be God's will that I should deliver thee before my lord come home. For if he come, and thou go home again, I shall be burned for thee; for I know his mind already in that matter.

Lith. I give you hearty thanks for your gentleness, and my neighbours for their good report.

Chan. Lith. if thy neighbours will be bound for thy forthcoming, whensoever thou shalt be called for; and also, if thou wilt be an obedient subject, I shall be content to deliver thee.

Neigh. If it please your worship, we will be bound for him in body and goods.

Chan. I will require no such bonds of you, but that two of you will be bound in twenty pounds a piece, that he shall come to answer when he shall be called.

Lith. Where find you, Mr. Chancellor, in all the scriptures, that the church of Christ did bind any man for the profession of his faith? Which profession you have heard of me, that all our justification, righteousness, and salvation, cometh only and freely by the merits of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and all the inventions and works of men, be they ever so glorious, be altogether vain, as the wise man saith.

Chan. Lo, where he is now. I put no such matter to you; for in that I believe as you do: but yet St. James saith, "That a man is justified by works."

Lith. St. James spake to them that boasted themselves of faith, and shewed no works of faith: but O, Mr. Chancellor, remember, I pray you, how all the promises and prophecies of the holy scripture, even from the first promise that God made to Adam, and so even to the latter end of the Revelation of St. John, do testify that in the name of Jesus, and only by his merits, all that believe shall be saved from all their sins and offences. Isaiah saith, chap. lxxv. "I am found of them that sought me not, and am manifest to them that ask not after me:" but against Israel he saith, "All day long have I stretched out my hand to a people that believe not." And when the jailor asked St. Paul, what he should do to be saved, the apostle said, Acts xvi. "Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved, and all thy household."

Again, St. John saith in the Revelation, that there was none, neither in heaven nor on earth, neither under the earth, that was able to open the book nor the seals thereof, but only the Lamb Jesus, our only Saviour. And St. Paul saith, Heb. ix. "With one offering hath he made perfect for ever them that are sanctified."

Chan. With vain glory you rehearse much scripture, as all the rest of you do: but you have no more understanding than my sheep. But to the purpose. Will you that your neighbours shall enter into bonds for you, or not?

Lith. By my mind they shall not. Wherefore I desire you that you would not bind me, but let me serve God with my conscience freely, for it is written, Rev. xiii. "They that lead into captivity, shall go into captivity, and they that strike with the sword, shall perish with the sword."

Also it is written in the gospel of our Saviour Jesus Christ, Matt. xviii. "That whoso doth offend one of these little ones, which believe in me, it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were cast into the depth of the sea." Of which I am assured by his holy Spirit that I am one. Wherefore be you well assured that such mercy as you shew, unto you shall be shewed the like.

Chan. You are a madman. I would not bind you, but that I must needs have something to shew for your deliverance. Then he called two of his neighbours, Thomas Daniel and Saunders Maybe, who offered themselves to be bound, and called me before them, and said, I have a letter of his own hand-writing, with his name and seal at it, with a book also against the regiment of women, for which I could make him to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; but on my faith I will him no more hurt than I mean to my own soul.

Lith. I desire you that be my neighbours and friends, that you will not enter into bonds for me: for you know not the danger thereof, neither I myself; it goeth against my conscience that ye should so do.

Chan. Why, I will not bind you to do any thing against your conscience.

Then they made the bond, and sealed to it, and willed me that I should seal to it also, and I said that I would not, neither could I observe the bond, and therefore I would not set to my hand.

Chan. It is a pity that thou hast so much favour shewed thee: yet for these honest men's sakes, I will discharge thee.

Notwithstanding all these dissembling words of Dr. Darbishire, pretending for favour of his sureties to set me at liberty, it was no such thing, nor any zeal of charity that moved him so to do; but only fear of the time, understanding the dangerous and irrecoverable sickness of queen Mary, which then began somewhat to assuage the cruel proceeding of these persecutors, whereby they durst not do what they would: for else Lith. was not likely to have escaped so easily.

Moreover, there was one Edward Grew, priest, and Appline, his wife, compelled to fly from their dwelling at a town called Broke; and the man being very aged, travelled abroad to keep a good conscience.

At last he was taken and cast into Colchester-castle, where he remained till queen Elizabeth came to her regal seat, and by the alteration of religion he was delivered. His wife, good woman, was in great care for him, and to her power did what she could to succour him.

William Brown, parson of Little Stanham, in the county of Suffolk, made a sermon in the said town, soon after the burial of our good king Edward, and in his sermon he said, There goeth a report that our good king is buried with a mass by the bishop of Winchester, he having a mitre upon his head. But if it were so, said he, they are all traitors that do so, because it is both against the truth, and against the laws of this realm, and it is great idolatry and blasphemy, and against the glory of God; and they are no friends either to God, the king, or unto the realm, that so do. For this his preaching, one Robert Blomefield, an adversary to the truth, being then constable of the town, and bailiff unto sir John Jerningham, knight, (the chief lord of the town) immediately rode forth, and brought home with him one Edward Golding, who was then under-sheriff, sir Thomas Cornwallis being then high-sheriff.

So the said Golding and Blomefield sent for certain men of the same town, and examined them for the sermon: whereupon they made but a small answer. Then the sheriff made a bill, and so terrified the men, that two or three of them set to their hands, and one of them never enjoyed himself after, but it was a grief to him till he died.

Then they took men with them to the parson's house, and in the night they took him, and with watchmen kept him till it was day. Then should he have been carried the next day to the council; but the said Robert Blomefield was taken so sick, that he was like to die: so that he could not carry him for his life.

Then the said sheriff sent him to Ipswich again, and there he was for a time. Then he was sent to Bury prison, and from thence to the council, and then into the Fleet; and so he lay in prison from the beginning of of harvest till near Christmas, and said, God gave him such answers to make when he was examined, that he was delivered with quietness of conscience. And having his liberty, he came again to the aforesaid town; and because he would not go to mass, his living was taken away, and he and his wife were constrained to fly here and there for his life and conscience. In the last year of queen Mary's reign God took him out of this life in peace.

Where moreover is to be noted, that this Robert Blomefield above-named, immediately after he had apprehended the said Brown, fell very sick; and although at that time he was a wealthy man and of great substance (beside his land which was better than twenty pounds a year), after this time God plagued his household, that his eldest son died, and his wife had a pining sickness till she departed this life also.

Then he married another, a rich widow: but all would not help, and nothing would prosper; for he had a sore pining sickness, being full of blotches and sores, whereby he wasted away both body and goods, till he died.

So when he died, he was above nine score pounds in debt, and it was never heard of any repentance he had; but a little before his death, he threatened a good man, one Simon Harlston, to put him forth to the officers, because he did wear no surplice when he said service.

Wherefore it is pity such baits of popery are left to the enemies to take christians in. God take them away, or ease us from them: for God knoweth they be the cause of much blindness and strife amongst men.

Furthermore, out of the said town were constrained to fly Robert Boela and John Trapne, because they would not go to mass and receive their sacrament of the altar.

The Persecution of ELIZABETH YOUNG.

YOU heard before of the scourging of Thomas Greene, how he was troubled and beaten by Dr. Story, for a certain book called Antichrist, which he received of a woman, because in no case he would detect her.

This woman was one Elizabeth Young, who coming from Emden to England, brought with her divers books, and dispersed them abroad in London; for which she being at length apprehended and laid fast, was brought to examination thirteen times before the catholic inquisitors of heretical pravity. Some of which examinations have come to our hands, and are as follow:

The First Examination of ELIZABETH YOUNG, before Mr. HUSSY.

Hussy. WHERE was you born, and who were your father and mother?

Eliz. Young. Sir, all this is but vain talk, and very superfluous. It is to fill my head with fantasies, that I should not be able to answer unto such things as I came for. You have not, I think, put me in prison to know who is my father and mother. But, I pray you, go to the matter I came hither for.

Hussy. Wherefore wentest thou out of the realm?

Young. To keep my conscience clean.

Hussy. When wast thou at mass?

Young. Not these three years.

Hussy. Then wast thou not there three years before that?

Young. No, sir, nor yet three years before that: for if I were I had evil luck.

Hussy. How old art thou?

Young. Forty and upwards.

Hussy. Twenty of those years you went to mass.

Young. Yea, and twenty more I may, and yet come home as wise as I went thither first, for I understand it not.

Hussy. Why wilt thou not go to the mass?

Young. Sir, my conscience will not suffer me: for I had rather all the world should accuse me, than mine own conscience.

Hussy. What if a louse or a flea stick upon thy skin, and bite thy flesh? thou must make a conscience in taking her off, is there not a conscience in it?

Young. That is but a sorry argument to displace the scriptures, and especially in such a part as my salvation dependeth upon: for it is but an easy conscience that a man can make.

Hussy. But why wilt thou not swear upon the evangelists before a judge?

Young. Because I know not what a book oath is.

Then he began to teach her the book oath.

Young. Sir, I do not understand it, and therefore I will not learn it.

Hussy. Thou wilt not understand it; and with that rose up and went his way.

The Second Examination of ELIZABETH YOUNG, by Dr. MARTIN.

Martin. THOU art come from beyond the sea, and hast brought with thee books of heresy and treason, and thou must confess to us who translated them, printed them, and who sent them over, (for I know thee to be but a messenger) and in so doing the queen's highness will be good to thee (for she hath forgiven greater things than this), and thou shalt find as much favour as is possible. But if thou be stubborn, and wilt not confess, thou wilt be very ill-handled: for we know the truth already; but this we do, only to see whether thou wilt be true to thy word or no.

Young. Sir, you have my confession, and more than that I cannot say.

Martin. Thou must say more, and shalt say more. Dost thou think that we will be fully answered by this confession that thou hast made? Thou rebellious whore, and traitorous heretic, thou dost refuse to swear upon the evangelists before a judge, I hear say. Thou shalt be racked by inch meal, thou traitorous whore and heretic, but thou shalt swear before a judge before thou go: yea, and thou shalt be made to confess how many books thou hast sold, and to whom.

Young. Sir, I understand not what an oath is, and therefore I will take no such thing upon me. And no man hath bought any books of me as yet, for those books which I had, your commissioners have got them all.

Martin. Thou traitorous whore, we know that thou hast sold a number of books, yea, and to whom: and how many times thou hast been here, and where thou layest, and every place that thou hast been in: dost thou think that thou hast fools in hand?

Young. No, sir, you be too wise for me: for I cannot tell how many places I have been in myself, but if it were in Turkey, I should have meat, and drink, and lodging for my money.

Martin. Thou rebellious whore, thou hast spoken evil words of the queen, and thou dwellest amongst a set of traitors and rebels that cannot give the queen a good name.

Young. I am not able to accuse any man thereof, neither is there any man that can prove any such things of me as you lay to my charge. For God's word hath taught me my duty to my queen, and therefore I am sure you accuse me wrongfully.

Martin. Thou rebel and traitorous whore, thou shalt be so racked and tormented, that thou shalt be an example to all such traitorous whores and heretics; and thou shalt be made to swear by the holy evangelists, and confess to whom thou hast sold all and every of these heretical books that thou hast sold: for we know what number thou hast sold, and to whom; but thou shalt be made to confess it in spite of thy blood.

Young. Here is my carcase; do with it what you will, and more than that you cannot have. Mr. Martin, you can have no more than my blood.

Then he raved as though he were stark mad, and said, Martin! Why callest thou me Martin?

Young. Sir, I know you well enough, for I have been before you ere now. You delivered me once at Westminster.

Martin. Where didst thou dwell then?

Young. I dwelt in the Minories.

Martin.

Martin. I delivered thee and thy husband both; and I thought then that thou wouldst have done otherwise than thou dost now. For if thou hadst been before any other bishop in England, and said the words that thou didst before me, thou hadst tried a faggot: and though thou didst not burn then, thou art like to burn or hang now.

Young. Sir, I promised you then, that I would never be fed with an unknown tongue, and no more will I yet.

Martin. I shall feed thee well enough. Thou shalt be fed with that (I warrant thee) which will be little to thine ease.

Young. Do what God shall suffer you to do: for more you shall not. And then he arose, and so departed, and went to the keeper's house, and asked his wife, whom she had suffered to come to this traitorous whore (as he called her). Then said the keeper's wife, As God receive my soul, there came neither man, woman, nor child to ask for her.

Martin. If any man, woman, or child, come to ask for her, I charge thee on pain of death, that they be laid fast; and give her one day bread, and another day water.

Young. If you take away my meat, I trust that God will take away my hunger: and so he departed, saying, that was too good for her; and then she was shut up under two locks in the Clink, where she was before.

The Third Examination of Mrs. E. YOUNG, before Dr. MARTIN.

Martin. ELIZABETH, wilt thou confess these things that thou hast been examined upon; for thou knowest that I have been thy friend, and in so doing I will be thy friend again; giving her many fair words, and then demanding of her how many gentlemen were beyond the seas.

Young. It is too much for me to tell you how many are on the other side.

Martin. No, I mean but in Frankfort and Emden, where thou hast been.

Young. Sir, I did never take account of them; it is a thing that I looked not for.

Martin. When shall I have a true word come out of your mouth?

Young. I have told you the truth, but because that it soundeth not to your mind, therefore you will not credit it.

Martin. Wilt thou yet confess? And if thou wilt, that which I have promised I will do; and if thou wilt not, I promise thee thou must go even hence to the rack, and therefore confess.

Young. I can say no more than I have said.

Martin. Well, forasmuch as she will confess no more, have her away to the rack, and then she will be marred.

Then answered a priest that sat there, and said, Woman, take an oath, and confess: wilt thou be hurt for other men?

Young. I can confess no more than I have. Do with my carcase what you will.

Martin. Did ye ever hear the like of this heretic? What a stout heretic is this? We have the truth, and we know the truth, and yet look whether she will confess. There is no remedy, but she must needs to the rack, and therefore away with her, and so commanded her out of the door, and called her keeper unto him, and said to him, There is no remedy, but this heretic must be racked; and talked with him more, but what it was she did not hear.

Then he called her in again, and said, Wilt thou not confess, and keep thee from the rack? I advise thee so to do; for if thou wilt not, thou knowest not the pain yet, but thou shalt do.

Young. I can confess no more; do with my carcase what you will.

Martin. Keeper, away with her. Thou knowest what I said. Let her know the pain of the rack. And so she departed, thinking no less, but that she should have gone to the rack, till she saw the keeper turn toward the Clink again. And thus did God alienate their hearts, and diminish their tyrannous power, unto the time of further examinations: for she was brought before the bishop, the dean, and the chancellor, and other commissioners, first and last, thirteen times.

The Fourth Examination of Mrs. E. YOUNG, before the Bishop of London, Sir ROGER CHOLMLEY, Dr. COOK, the Recorder of London, Dr. ROPER, and Dr. MARTIN.

FIRST, she being presented by Dr. Martin before the bishop of London, Dr. Martin began to declare against her, saying, The lord chancellor hath sent you here a woman, who hath brought books over from Emden, where all these books of heresy and treason are printed, and hath therewith filled all the land with treason and heresy; neither yet will she confess who translated them, nor who printed them, nor yet who sent them over. Wherefore my lord chancellor committeth her unto my lord of London, to do with her as he shall think good. For she will confess nothing but that she bought these said books in Amsterdam, and so brought them over to sell for gain.

Dr. Cook. Let her head be trussed in a small line, and make her confess.

Martin. The book is called Antichrist, and so may well be called, for it speaketh against Jesus Christ, and the queen. Besides that, she hath a certain spark of the anabaptists, for she refuseth to swear upon the four evangelists before a judge: for myself and Mr. Hussy have had her before us four times, but we cannot bring her to swear. Wherefore my lord chancellor would that she should abstain and fast, for she hath not fasted a great while: for she hath lain in the Clink a good while, where she had too much liberty.

Then said the bishop, Why wilt thou not swear before a judge; that is the right trade of the anabaptists.

Young. My lord, I will not swear that this hand is mine.

No, said the bishop; and why?

Young. My lord, Christ saith, That whatsoever is more than yea, yea, or nay, nay, it cometh of evil. And moreover, I know not what an oath is: and therefore I will take no such thing upon me.

Then said Cholmley, Twenty pounds it is a man in woman's clothes, twenty pounds it is a man.

Bonner. Think you so, my lord.

Cholmley. Yea, my lord.

Young. My lord, I am a woman.

Bishop. Swear her upon a book, seeing it is but a question asked.

Then said Cholmley, I will lay twenty pounds it is a man.

Then Dr. Cook brought her a book, commanding her to lay her hand thereon.

Young. No, my lord, I will not swear, for I know not what an oath is. But I say that I am a woman, and have children.

Bishop. That we know not; wherefore swear.

Cholmley. Thou ill-favoured whore, lay thy hand upon the book; I will lay on mine: and so he laid his hand on the book.

Young. So will not I.

Then the bishop spake a word in Latin out of St. Paul, as concerning swearing.

Young. My lord, if you speak to me of St. Paul, then speak English, for I understand you not.

Bishop. I dare swear that thou dost not.

Young. My lord, St. Paul saith, that five words spoken in a language that may be understood, are better than many in a strange tongue.

Cook. Swear before us, whether thou be a man or a woman.

Young. If you will not believe me, then send for women into a secret place, and I will be searched.

Cholmley. Thou art an ill-favoured whore.

Bishop. How believest thou in the sacrament of the altar?

Young. If it will please you that I shall declare my faith, faith, I will, and if it be not good, teach me a better, and I will believe it.

Cook. That is well said, declare thy faith.

Young. I believe in God the Father Almighty, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three Persons and one God: I believe all the articles of my creed: I believe all things written in the scripture, and all things agreeable to the scripture, given by the Holy Ghost to the church of Christ, set forth and taught by the church of Christ. I believe that Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, that immaculate Lamb, came into the world to save sinners; and that in him, by him, and through him, I am made clean from my sins, and without him I could not. I believe that in the holy sacrament of Christ's body and blood, which he did institute and ordain, and left among his disciples the night before he was betrayed; when I do receive this sacrament in faith and spirit, I do receive Christ.

Bishop. No more, I warrant you, but the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, received but in spirit and faith, with those heretics.

Cholmley. Ah, whore, spirit and faith, whore!

Young. This sacrament man never could, nor did make, but only he, that did what no man could do.

Martin. Then thou must allow that grafts is a sacrament; for who could make grafts but he only?

Young. Sir, he hath suffered, and made a sufficient sacrifice once for all, and so hath he made his sacrament sufficient once for all: for there was never man that could say, "Take, eat, this is my body, that is broken for you," but only Jesus Christ, who had his body broken for the sins of the world; which sacrament he hath left here amongst us for a testimonial of his death, even to the world's end.

Martin. Who taught thee this doctrine? did Scory?

Young. Yea, bishop Scory, and others that I have heard.

Bishop. Why, is Scory bishop now?

Young. If that offend you, call him Dr. Scory if you will.

Roper. I knew him when he was but a poor doctor.

Martin. What do you call Scory?

Young. Our superintendant.

Bishop. Lo! their superintendant.

Martin. And what are ye called?

Young. Christ's congregation.

Bishop. Lo! Christ's congregation, I warrant you.

Dr. Cook. What living hath Scory?

Young. As far as I do know, he liveth by his own, for I know no man that giveth him ought.

Recorder. Yes, I warrant you, he hath enough sent him out of England.

Young. Sir, I know no such thing.

Cholmley. Hark, whore, hark; hark, how I do believe.

Young. My lord, I have told you my belief.

Cholmley. Hark, thou ill-favoured whore, how I do believe. When the priest hath spoken the words of consecration, I do believe that there remaineth the very body that was born of the Virgin Mary, was hanged on the cross, was dead and buried, and descended into hell, and rose again on the third day, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God. The same body when the priest hath spoken the words, cometh down, and when the priest lifteth up his body on this wise (he lifting up his hands said), there it is.

Young. I have told you also how I do believe.

Martin. Away with her.

Cholmley. Ah, ill-favoured whore! Nothing but spirit and faith, whore!

Martin. Away with her, we have more to talk withal.

Then she was carried into the Coal-house, and searched for books, and then put into the stock-house, and her knife, girdle, and apron taken from her.

The Fifth Examination of ELIZABETH YOUNG, before the Bishop of London's Chancellor.

Chan. WHAT age are you of?

Young. Forty years and upwards.

Chan. Why, thou art a woman of fair years; why shouldst thou meddle with the scriptures? It is necessary for thee to believe, and that is enough. It is more fit for thee to meddle with thy distaff, than to meddle with the scriptures. What is thy belief? I would hear it; for it cannot be good, in that thou art brought to prison.

Young. Sir, if it will please you to hear, I will declare it unto you. But I pray you that you will take your pen and write it, and then examine it; and if you find any thing therein that is not fit for a christian woman, then teach me better, and I will learn it.

Chan. Well said. But who shall judge between thee and me?

Young. The scripture.

Chan. Wilt thou stand by that?

Young. Yea, sir.

Chan. Well, go thy way out of the door a little while, for I am busy, and will call for thee anon again.

Then he called me again and said, Now, woman, the time is too long to write. Say thy mind, and I will bear it in my head.

Then Elizabeth began, and declared her faith to him as she had done before to the bishop.

Chan. Woman, spirit and faith I do allow, but dost not thou believe that thou dost receive the body of Christ, really, corporally, and substantially.

Young. These words, really and corporally, I understand not; as for substantially, I take it, you mean I should believe that I should receive his human body (which is upon the right hand of God, and can occupy no more places at once), and that I believe not.

Chan. Thou must believe this, or else thou art damned.

Young. Sir, can you give me belief?

Chan. No, God must give it thee.

Young. God hath given me no such faith or belief.

The chancellor then declared a text of St. Paul in Latin, and then in English, saying, I could make thee believe, but that thou hast a cankered heart, and wilt not believe. Who then can make thee to believe?

Young. You said even now, that faith or belief cometh of God, and so I believe, and then may not I believe an untruth to be true.

Chan. Dost thou not believe that Christ's flesh is flesh in thy flesh?

Young. No, sir, I believe not that; for my flesh will putrefy and rot.

Chan. Christ said, My flesh is flesh in flesh.

Young. Whoso receiveth him fleshly, shall have a fleshly resurrection.

Chan. Christ saith in St. John, chap. vi. "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed."

Young. Christ preached to the Capernaïtes, saying, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye shall not have life in you: and the Capernaïtes murmured at it. And his disciples also murmured, saying among themselves, 'This is an hard saying, and who can abide it?'" Christ understood their meaning, and said, "Are ye also offended? Will ye also go away? What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up to heaven, from whence he came? Will that offend you? It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing." I pray you, sir, what meaneth Christ by that?

Chan. O God forbid. Would you have me to interpret the scriptures? We must leave that for our old ancient fathers, which have studied the scriptures a long time, and have the Holy Ghost given unto them.

Young. Why, sir, have you not the Holy Ghost given and revealed unto you?

Chan. No, God forbid that I should so believe; but I hope, I hope: but you say you are of the Spirit. Will you say that you have no profit in Christ's flesh?

Young. Sir, we have our profit in Christ's flesh, but not as the Capernaïtes did understand it; for they understood that they must eat his flesh as they did eat ox flesh and others, and drink his blood, as we drink wine or beer out of a bowl. But so we must not receive it: but our profit that we have by Christ, is to believe that that his body was broken upon the cross, and his blood shed for our sins; that is the very meaning of Christ, that so we should eat his flesh, and drink his blood, when he said, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed."

Chan. How doth thy body live, if Christ's flesh is not flesh in thy flesh?

Young. Sir, I was a body before I had a soul; which body God had created, and yet it could not live, till God had breathed life into me, and by that life doth my body live. And when it shall please God to dissolve my life, my flesh will offer itself unto the place from whence it came, and through the merits of Christ my soul will offer itself to the place from whence it came.

Chan. Yea, but if thou do not believe that Christ's flesh is flesh in thy flesh, thou canst not be saved.

Young. Sir, I do not believe that.

Chan. Why, doth not Christ say, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed?" Canst thou deny that?

Young. I deny not that; for Christ's flesh and blood is meat and drink for my soul, the food of my soul. For whosoever believeth that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, hath died and shed his blood for his sins, his soul feedeth thereon for ever.

Chan. When thou receivest the sacrament of the altar, dost thou not believe that thou dost receive Christ's body?

Young. Sir, as often as I receive the sacrament, I believe, that spiritually and by faith I receive Christ. And of this sacrament, I know Christ himself to be the author, and none but he. And this same sacrament is an establishment to my conscience, and an augmenting to my faith.

Chan. Why, did not Christ take bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, "Take, eat, this is my body that is given for you?" Did he give them his body, or no?

Young. He also took the cup, and gave thanks to his Father, and gave it to his disciples, saying, "Drink ye all hereof: for this is the cup of the New Testament in my blood, which shall be shed for many." Now, I pray you, sir, let me ask you one question: Did he give the cup the name of his blood, or the wine that was in the cup?

Then he was very angry, and said, Dost thou think that thou hast an hedge-priest in hand?

Young. No, sir, I take you not to be an hedge-priest; I take you for a doctor.

Chan. So me thinketh. Thou wilt take upon thee to teach me.

Young. No, sir, but I let you know what I know; and by argument one shall know more. Christ said, "As oft as ye do this, do it in remembrance of me;" but a remembrance is not of a thing present, but absent. Likewise St. Paul saith, "So oft as ye shall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall shew forth the Lord's death till he come:" then we must not look for him here, until his coming again at the latter day. Again, is not this article of our belief true, "He sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge both the quick and the dead?" But if he come not before he come to judgment, how then is he present in your sacrament of the altar? Wherefore I believe that the human body of Christ occupieth no more than one place at once; for when he was here, he was not there.

The Sixth Examination of Mrs. YOUNG, before the Chancellor.

Chan. WOMAN, the last time that thou wast before me, our talk was concerning the sacrament.

Young. Sir, true it is, and I trust that I said nothing that you can deny by the scriptures.

Chan. Yes, thou wilt not believe that Christ's flesh is flesh in thy flesh.

Young. No, sir, God hath given me no such belief, for it cannot be found by the scriptures.

Chan. Wilt thou believe nothing but what is in the scripture? Why, how many sacraments dost thou find in the scripture?

Young. The church of Christ doth set down two.

Chan. I will as well find seven by the scripture, as thou shalt find two.

Young. Sir, I talk not to you thereof, but I say that the church of Christ setteth out two, and I have been taught no more.

Chan. What are those two?

Young. The sacrament of Christ's body and blood, and the sacrament of baptism.

Chan. What sayest thou by the sacrament of wedlock?

Young. I have not heard it called a sacrament, but the holy estate of matrimony, which ought to be kept of all men that take it upon them.

Chan. How sayest thou by priests? Is it good that they should marry? Is it to be kept of them?

Young. I come not hither to reason any such matter, for I am no divine, and also it is no part of my faith.

Chan. Can you not tell? You shall tell before ever you go.

Young. Then you must keep me a good while; for I have not studied the scriptures for it.

Chan. No? Why, you will not be ashamed to flee unto the highest mystery, even to the sacrament at the first dash, and you are not afraid to argue with the best doctor in the land.

Young. God's mysteries I will not meddle with, but all things that are written, are written for our edification.

Chan. What say you by prayers for the dead? Is it not meet that if a man's friend be dead, his friend commend his soul unto God?

Young. There is no christian man that will commend his friend or his foe unto the devil. And whether it be good for him when he is dead or no, sure I am, that it is good when he is alive.

Chan. Then thou allowest not prayer to be good for them when they be dead, and lying in purgatory. Is it not meet that prayer be made unto God for them?

Young. Sir, I never heard in the scriptures of purgatory, but in the scripture I have heard of heaven and hell.

Chan. Why, you have nothing but the skimming of the scriptures. Our ancient fathers could find out in the bottom of the scriptures that there is a purgatory. Yea, they could find it in the New Testament, that a priest should take the sacrament, and go to the altar, and make an oblation, and offer it up every day.

Young. Sir, that could never be found in the Bible nor New Testament, as far as ever I could hear.

Chan. Whom dost thou hear read either the Bible or New Testament, but a sort of schismatics, bawdy bishops, and hedge-priests (which have brought into the church a stinking communion, which was never heard of in any place in the world, but here in England), which hath deceived the king and all the nobility, and all the whole realm.

Young. Sir, it is a vile name that you give them all.

Chan. Where are all the hedge-knaves now, that they come not to their answer?

Young. Answer, sir? Why, they have answered both with the scriptures, and also with their blood; and then where were you that you came not forth to answer in their times? I never knew any of you that were troubled, but two, and that was not for God's word, it was for their disobedience.

Chan. No, I pray you? Did you not know that we were hanged, killed, burned, and beheaded?

Young. Sir, I never knew that any of you ever was either hanged, killed, burned, or beheaded.

Chan. No? Did you never hear that the bishop of Rochester lost his head for the supremacy of the bishop of Rome?

Young. Then he died not for God's word.

Chan. Well, thou wilt believe nothing but that which is written in God's word. Where canst thou find the sabbath written in the scripture, by the name of the sabbath? For the right sabbath-day will I prove to be Saturday. Or, where canst thou find the articles of the creed in the scripture by the name of the articles? or where canst thou find in the scripture that Christ went down into hell?

Young. What place or part in the scripture can you find to disprove any of these things?

Chan. What priest hast thou lain withal that thou hast so much scripture? Thou art some priest's woman, I think, for thou wilt take upon thee to reason, and teach the best doctor in all the land.

Young. I was never yet priest's wife, nor yet priest's woman.

Chan. Have I touched your conscience?

Young. No, sir, you have not touched my conscience, but beware you hurt not your own.

Chan. Thou hast read a little in the Bible or Testament, and thou thinkest that thou art able to reason with a doctor, that hath gone to school thirty years; and, before God, I think if I had talked thus much with a Jew as I have done with thee, he would have turned ere this time. But I may say by you as Christ said by Jerusalem, saying, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft would I have gathered thee together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens, but thou wouldst not." And so would we gather you together in one faith, and you will not: and therefore your own blood be upon your own head; for I can do no more but teach you. Thou art one of the rankest heretics that ever I heard; for thou believest nothing but what is in the scripture; and therefore thou art damned.

Young. I do believe all things written in the scripture, and all things agreeable to the scripture, given by the Holy Ghost to the church of Christ, set forth and taught by the church of Christ, and shall I be damned because I will not believe an untruth?

Then the chancellor called the keeper, saying, Cluny, take her away, thou knowest what thou hast to do with her. And so she departed, and was brought again to the stock-house, and there she lay certain days, and both her hands manacled in one iron, and afterwards she was removed into the Lollards' Tower, and there she remained with both her feet in the stocks and irons till the next time of examination.

The Seventh Examination of Mrs. YOUNG, before the Chancellor and the Bishop's Scribe.

Chan. WOMAN, thou hast been twice before me, but we could not agree, and here be certain articles that my lord the bishop of London would that thou shouldst make answer unto, which are these: First, how many sacraments dost thou allow?

Young. Sir, as many as Christ's church doth allow, and that is two.

Then said the scribe, Thou wast taught seven before king Edward's days.

Chan. Which two sacraments be those that thou dost allow?

Young. The sacrament of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, and the sacrament of baptism.

Chan. Dost thou not believe that the pope of Rome is the supreme head of the church, immediately under God in earth?

Young. No, sir, no man can be the head of Christ's church: for Christ himself is the head, and his word is the governor of all that be of that church, wherefore they be scattered abroad.

Chan. Dost thou not believe that the bishop of Rome can forgive thee all thy sins heretical, detestable and damnable, that thou hast done from thine infancy unto this day?

Young. Sir, the bishop of Rome is a sinner as I am, and no man can forgive me my sins, but he only that is without sin, and that is Jesus Christ, who died for my sins.

Chan. Dost thou not know that the pope sent over his jubilees, that all that ever would fast and pray, and go to the church, should have their sins forgiven them?

The Scribe. Sir, I think that she was not in the realm then.

Chan. Hast thou not desired God to defend thee from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities?

Young. Yes, that I have.

Chan. And art thou not sorry for it?

Young. No, sir, not a whit.

Chan. Hast thou not said, that the mass was wicked, and the sacrament of the altar most abominable?

Young. Yes, that I have.

Chan. And art thou not sorry for it?

Young. No, sir, not a whit.

Chan. Art thou not content to go to the church, and hear mass?

Young. I will not go to the church, either to mass or mattins; till I may hear it in a tongue that I can understand: for I will be fed no longer in a strange language. And always the scribe did write every one of these articles, as they were demanded and answered unto.

Then the scribe asked her from whence she came.

The chancellor said, This is she that brought over all these books of heresy and treason.

Then the scribe said to her, Woman, where hadst thou all these books?

Young. I bought them in Amsterdam, and brought them over to sell, thinking to gain thereby.

The Scribe. What is the name of the book?

Young. I cannot tell.

Scribe. Why shouldst thou buy books, and know not their names?

Then said Cluny, the keeper, Sir, my lord bishop did send for her by name, that she should go to mass, but she would not.

Chan. Yea, did my lord send for her by name, and would she not go to mass?

Young. No, sir, I never will go to mass, till I do understand it, by the leave of God.

Chan. Understand it! why, who the devil can make thee understand Latin, thou being so old?

Then the scribe commanded her to set her hand to all these things.

Then said she, Let me hear them read first.

Scribe. Master Chancellor, shall she hear it read?

Chan. Ay, ay, let the heretic hear it read.

The she heard it read, and so signed it.

The Eighth Examination of Mrs. YOUNG, before the Bishop.

Bishop. IS this the woman that hath three children?

Keeper. Yea, my lord.

Bishop. Woman, here is a supplication put into my hands for thee. In like case there was another supplication put up to me for thee before this, in which thou madest as though I should keep thy children.

Young. My lord, I did not know of this supplication, nor yet of the other.

Bishop. Mr. Dean, is this the woman you have sued so earnestly for?

Dean. Yea, my lord.

Dean. Woman, what remaineth in the sacrament of the altar, when and after that the priest hath spoken the words of consecration?

Young. A piece of bread. But the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, which he did institute and leave among his disciples the night before he was betrayed, ministered according to his word, that sacrament I do believe.

Dean. How dost thou believe concerning the body of Christ? where is his body, and how many bodies hath he?

Young. Sir, in heaven he sitteth on the right hand of God.

Dean. From whence came his human body?

Young. He took it of the Virgin Mary.

Dean. That is flesh, blood, and bones, as mine is. But what shape hath his spiritual body? Hath it face, hands, and feet?

Young.

Young. I know no other body that he hath, but that body whereof he meant when he said, "This is my body, which is given for you; and this is my blood which shall be shed for you." Whereby he plainly meaneth that body and no other, which he took of the virgin Mary, having the perfect shape and proportion of a human body.

Story. Thou hast a wife body: for thou must go to the stake.

Dean. Art thou content to believe in the faith of Christ's church? But to ask of thee what Christ's church is, or where it is, I let it pass.

Young. Sir, to that church I have joined my faith, and from it I purpose never to turn, by God's help.

Dean. Wouldst thou not be at home with thy children with a good will?

Young. Sir, if it please God to give me leave.

Dean. Art thou willing to confess thyself to be a foolish woman, and to believe as our holy father the pope of Rome doth, and as the lord cardinal doth, and as my lord the bishop of London thine ordinary doth, and as the king and queen, and all the nobility in England do; yea, and the emperor, and all the noble persons of Christendom?

Young. Sir, I was never wise, but in few words I shall make you a brief answer how I do believe all things that are written in the scriptures, given by the Holy Ghost unto the church of Christ, set forth and taught by the church of Christ. Hereon I ground my faith; and not on man.

Then said Story, And who shall be judge?

Young. Sir, the scripture.

Story. And who shall read it.

Young. He unto whom God hath given the understanding.

Bishop. Woman, be reformable; for I would thou wert gone, and master dean here hath earnestly sued for thee.

Dean. Woman, I have sued for thee indeed, and I promise thee, if thou wilt be reformable, my lord will be good unto thee.

Young. I have been before my lord bishop, and before master chancellor three times, and have declared my faith.

Dean. And yet I know that master chancellor will say, that thou art a general heretic.

Story. Away with her.

Bishop. Master dean, you know that I may not tarry, nor you neither. Let her keeper bring her home to your own chamber soon at four o'clock in the afternoon, and if that we find her reasonable, then let her go, for I would that she were gone.

Then said the dean, With a good will, my lord; and so she was sent unto the place from whence she came, until it was four o'clock in the afternoon.

The Ninth Examination of ELIZABETH YOUNG, before the Dean, after which she was delivered.

Dean. ART thou a fool now, as thou wert to-day?

Young. Sir, I have learnt but small wisdom since.

Dean. Dost thou think that I am better learned than thou?

Young. Yes, sir, that I do.

Dean. Thinkest thou that I can do thee good?

Young. Yea, sir, and, if it please God, that you will.

Dean. Then I will do thee good indeed. What dost thou receive when thou receivest the sacrament which Christ left among his disciples the night before he was betrayed?

Young. Sir, that that his disciples did receive.

Dean. What did they receive?

Young. Sir, that that Christ gave them, they received.

Dean. What answer is this? was Christ there present?

Young. Sir, he was there present; for he instituted his own sacrament.

Dean. He took bread and he brake it, and he gave it to his disciples, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body which shall be broken for you." When thou receivest it, dost thou believe that thou receivest his body?

Young. Sir, when I receive, I believe that through faith I do receive Christ.

Dean. Dost thou believe that Christ is there?

Young. Sir, I believe that he is there to me, and by faith I do receive him.

Dean. He also took the cup and gave thanks, and gave it to his disciples, and said, "Drink ye all thereof; this is the cup of the New Testament in my blood, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." When thou dost receive it after the institution that Christ ordained among his disciples, the night before he was betrayed, dost thou believe that Christ is there?

Young. Sir, by faith I believe that he is there, and by faith I do believe that I do receive him.

Dean. Now thou hast answered me, remember what thou sayest, that when thou dost receive according to the institution of Christ, thou dost receive Christ.

Young. Sir, I believe Christ not to be absent from his own sacrament.

Dean. How long wilt thou continue in that belief?

Young. Sir, as long as I do live, by the help of God, for it is, and hath been my belief.

Dean. Wilt thou say this before my lord?

Young. Yea, sir.

Dean. Then I dare deliver thee. Why, thou calf, why wouldst thou not say so to-day.

Young. Sir, you asked me no such question.

Dean. Then you would stand in disputation how many bodies Christ had.

Young. Sir, indeed that question you did ask me.

Dean. Who shall be the sureties that thou wilt appear before my lord of London and me upon Friday next?

Young. Sir, I have no sureties, nor know I where to have any.

Then spake the dean unto two women that stood there, who had earnestly sued for her, saying, "Women, will ye be her sureties, that she shall appear before my lord of London and me, upon Friday next?"

Women. Yea, sir, and it please you.

Dean. Take heed that I find you no more a babbler in the scripture.

Young. Sir, I am no babbler in the scripture, nor yet can any man burden me therewith.

Dean. Yes, I have heard of you well enough what you are.

Then said he to the two women, what if a man should touch your conscience, do ye not smell a little of heresy also?

Women. No, sir.

Dean. Yes, a little of the frying-pan, or else wherefore have ye two so earnestly sued for her?

The one woman answered, because that her children were like to perish, and therefore God put me in mind to sue for her.

Then said the other woman, And I provided her child a nurse, and I am threatened to stand for the keeping of her child; and therefore it standeth me in hand to sue to have her out.

Dean. Woman, give thanks unto these honest women, who have so earnestly sued for thee, and I promise thee so have I. These great heretics will receive nothing but in spirit and faith; and so he rose and departed.

Young. Sir, God be praised, and I thank you for your goodness and theirs also, and so went away; and upon the Friday next, because she was accused, her two sureties went thither, and were discharged.

The Persecution of ELIZABETH LAWSON.

IN the town of Bedfield, in the county of Suffolk, dwelt an ancient godly matron, named Elizabeth Lawson, about the age of sixty years, who was apprehended as an heretic by the constables of the same town, named Robert Kitrich, and Thomas Elas, in the year 1556, 1556, because she would not go to church to hear mass, and receive the sacrament, and believe in it.

First, they laid her in a dungeon, and after that she was carried unto Norwich, and from thence to Bury gaol, where at last she was condemned to be burnt. In the mean time sir John Sylliard had her home unto his house, he being high sheriff that year, where she was hardly kept, and wrapped in irons, till at length, when they could by no means move her to recant, she was sent to prison again with shameful revilings.

Thus she continued in prison the space of two years and three quarters. In the mean time there were burnt her son and many more, whereby she would often say, "Good Lord, what is the cause that I may not yet come to thee with thy children? Well, good Lord, thy blessed will be done, and not mine."

Not long after this (most happily) followed the death of queen Mary, after whom succeeded queen Elizabeth. At which time this Elizabeth Lawson remained yet still in Bury prison, till at last she was bailed upon sureties, or else she could not be delivered. For she being a condemned person, neither the temporality, nor yet spiritual authority would discharge her without sureties. Now she being abroad, and her sureties made afraid by wicked men, said, they would cast her again in prison, except she would see them discharged.

Then she got a supplication to go unto the queen's majesty, and came to a friend of her's to have his counsel therein; who willed her to stay a while, because she was old, the days short, and the expences great, and weather foul (for it was a little before Christmas), and to tarry until summer. In the mean time God broke the bond, and shortened her journey; for he took her home to himself out of this life in peace.

This good old woman, long before she went to prison, had the falling sickness, and told a friend of her's, one Simon Harlston, after she was apprehended, that she never had it more, but lived in good health and joy of heart, through our Lord Christ.

She had a very unkind husband, who, while she was in prison, sold her raiment, and would not help her: and after she was out of prison, she returned home unto him, yet would he shew her no kindness, nor help her neither; and yet the house and land that he dwelt in he had by her; wherefore as long as she lived she was maintained by the congregation.

The said Elizabeth Lawson also had a sister, wife to one Robert Hollon, in Mickfield, in the same county of Suffolk, who likewise was persecuted and driven out from house to house, and a young man her son with her, because they would not go to the church to hear mass, and receive the sacrament of the altar.

An Account of the Persecution of THOMAS CHRISTENMASS and WILLIAM WATS.

IN this perilous rage of queen Mary's reign were two men persecuted, one called Thomas Christenmass, the other William Wats, of Tunbridge, in Kent. As these two men travelled from place to place, not resting two nights together in one place, they happened to go to Rochester in Kent, where they at the town's end met with a damsel of eight years of age, but whether she went, they knew not. It was then night, and they being weary, were willing to lie in the same town, but could not tell where, they feared so the bloody catholics. At last they devised to ask the damsel whether there were any heretics in the town, or no? and she said, Yea. They asked her where. She answered them, At such an inn, telling them the name, and where the inn was. Shortly after, as they were gone from her, they bethought themselves better, and God so moving their hearts, they went to the child again, and asked her how she knew that the innkeeper (of whom she spake before) was an heretic. Marry, quoth she, well enough, and his wife also. How knowest thou, pretty maiden? said they; I pray thee tell us. How know I? said she; marry, because they go to the church; and those that will not hold up their hands there, they will present them, and he himself goes from house to house, to compel them to come to church. When these two men heard this, they gave God praise, and avoided that house, taking the warning of that maid (of good bringing up, as it should seem) to be God's marvellous providence towards them.

In the last year but one of queen Mary's reign, William Wats lived at Seale, in Kent, where being apprehended, and brought by the constables before the bishop and justices at Tunbridge, who endeavoured to persuade him to turn from the truth, but all in vain, though they spent much time, and used many flattering words.

At dinner-time the constables took Wats to a victualing-house, where after they had well filled themselves, they fell asleep, supposing their prisoner had been sure enough under their hands. Wats's wife being in the house with her husband, and very careful for his well-doing, seeing them all fast asleep, desired her husband to go away, as God had given him an opportunity; but he refusing so long that at last a stranger hearing something of the dispute, asked what the matter was, and why she was so earnest with her husband: the wife told him. Then said the stranger to Wats, Father, go thy ways in God's name, and tarry no longer: the Lord hath opened the way unto thee. Upon which words he went his way, and his wife departed from him, and went home to her house at Seale, thinking her husband had gone another way. Now as she was going in at her door, telling her friends of his deliverance, immediately came in the said Wats also, and they all being amazed thereat, willed him in all haste to get him away; for they thought there would be search for him immediately.

Then Wats said, he would eat meat first, and also pray; which he did, and afterwards departed thence. As soon as he was out of doors, and had hid himself in an holly-bush, immediately came the said constables with thirty persons into the said house to search for him, where they pierced the feather-beds, broke open his chests, and made great havock; and as they were searching, the constable cried, I will have Wats, I will have Wats, I tell thee, I will have Wats; but God be thanked Wats could not be found. And when they saw it needless to search for him, in the end they took his wife, and set her in a pair of stocks, where she remained two days, and she was very bold in the truth, and at last delivered through the providence of God; whose name be glorified in all his works. Amen.

Mr. DABNEY.

THERE was at London a certain godly person, a painter, named Dabney, whom John Auales in the time of queen Mary had brought before Bonner to be examined for his faith. It happened the same time, when the said Dabney was there, that the bishop was occupied with examining of others, so that he was bid to stand by, and to wait the bishop's leisure. Upon the same, or not long after, suddenly came word to the bishop to prepare him with all speed, the general procession tarried for him. The bishop hearing that, setting all business apart, bustleth himself with all possible speed to the church, there to furnish procession. By reason whereof Dabney, who newly came to the house, was there left alone, while every man else was busied in preparing and setting themselves forward according as the case required.

To be short, as the time called on, Bonner, with his household makes all possible haste to the procession. Dabney being left alone, came down to the outward court next the gate, there walking heavily by himself, looking for nothing less than to escape that danger. The porter, who was only left at home, seeing the man walk alone, supposing he had been some citizen left there behind, and waiting for opening the gate, went and opened the wicket, asking if he would go out. Yea, said he, with a good will, if you will let me out. With all my heart, quoth the porter, and I pray you so do.

And thus the said Dabney taking the opportunity offered of God, being let out by the porter, escaped out of the wolf's mouth. The procession being done, when the bishop returned home, Dabney was gone, and could not be found. Whereupon search was made, but especially John Avalet laid wait for him: who, after long searching, when he could not get him, at length received fifteen crowns of his wife to let him alone when he should see him, and so that good man escaped.

ALEXANDER WIMHURST, Priest.

A LIKE example of God Almighty's goodness towards his afflicted servants in that dangerous time of persecution, may also appear evidently in one Alexander Wimhurst, a priest, sometime of Magdalen college, in Oxford, and then a papist, but since an earnest enemy to Antichrist, and a man better instructed in the true fear of God. It happened that one had recommended him to bishop Bonner for religion, upon what occasion I do not understand. According to the old manner in such cases provided, he sent forth Robin Caly, otherwise called Robin Papist, one of his whelps, to bring in the game, and to cause this silly poor man to appear before him. Little Robin, like a proper man, bestirreth him in his business, and smelleth him out, and when he had taken him, bringeth him along by Cheap-side, not suffering him to talk with any of his acquaintance by the way, though they were some of his old friends of Oxford that offered to speak unto him.

When they came into St. Paul's, he espied Dr. Chedsey there walking up and down, and, because he was able in such a case to do pleasure, and for that he had been of his old acquaintance in Oxford, he was very desirous to speak to him ere he went through. Chedsey, perceiving that Robin Caly did attend upon him, said, that he durst not meddle in the matter. Yes, (said little Robin) you may talk with him if it please you, master Doctor. To be short, Alexander opened his case, and in the end desired, for old acquaintance sake, that he would find means he might be brought before Dr. Martin to be examined, rather than any other. Nay, said he, (alleging the words of Christ unto Peter in the last chapter of St. John) you remember, brother, what is written in the gospel: "When thou wast young, thou didst gird thyself, and wentest whither thou wouldst; but being aged, other men shall gird thee, and lead thee whither thou wouldst not." Thus abusing the scripture to his private meaning, whereas notwithstanding he might easily have accomplished so small a request, if he had liked it.

Thence he was carried to Story and Cook, commissioners, there to learn what should become of him. Before them he behaved himself boldly and stoutly, as they on the other side did urge him with captious questions very cruelly. When they had baited the poor man their fill, they asked him where his whore was. She is not my whore (said he), but my lawful wife. She is thy whore, said they. She is not my whore (said he again), I tell you. So when they perceived that he would not give place unto them, nor attributed to them so much as they looked for at his hand, according to the ordinary manner, they commanded him to prison. And now mark well the providence of God in his preservation.

He was brought into Cluny's house, in Paternoster-row, from thence to be carried to Lollards'-Tower, out of hand, but that Cluny, (as it happened) his wife and his maid, were so earnestly occupied about present business, that they had not leisure then to lock up their prisoner. In the hall where Alexander sat was a strange woman, whose husband was then presently in trouble for religion, which perceived by some occasion or other, that this man was brought in for the like cause. Alack, good man; saith she, if you will you may escape the cruel hands of your enemies, forasmuch as they be all away that should look unto you. God hath opened the way unto you for a deliverance, and therefore lose not the opportunity thereof, if you be wise. Being persuaded with these and such like words, he went out of doors, and escaped their hands.

BOSOM's Wife.

T HIS good woman being at Richmond with her mother, was greatly urged to go to church. At length, through great importunity, she came; being in the church, and sitting with her mother in the pew, contrary in all things to the doings of the papists, she behaved herself so, that when they kneeled, she stood; when they turned forward, she turned backward, &c. This being notorious in the church, the constable and church-warden attached her in the queen's name, charging her and her mother to appear the next day at Kingston, which accordingly they did, and happening to meet the officers crossing the river, saluted them by their names, but at that time the officers had no power to speak to them, though afterwards they stamp and stared, and were mad with themselves for letting them pass, as was declared by the waterman in the boat. Whereupon the good woman taking her journey to London, escaped their cruelty.

JOHN DAVIS, under Twelve Years of Age.

I N the year 1546, and the last year of king Henry the Eighth, John Davis, a child of twelve years and under, who dwelling in the house of Mr. Johnson, apothecary, in the town of Worcester, his uncle, using sometimes to read in the Testament and other English books, was complained of by his mistress, who was an obstinate person, and consulted with one Thomas Parton, and Alice Brook, wife to Nicholas Brook, organ maker, with certain of the canons, and Mr. Johnson, chancellor to Dr. Heath, their bishop. The means whereby he was intrapped, was wrought by the afore-said Alice Brook, who procured her son Oliver, school-fellow with the said John Davis, to feign friendship with him, and under pretence to be instructed, to see his English books, and especially to get something of his writing against the six articles: which being had, was soon brought to the canons of the church and the chancellor. Whereupon Thomas Parton came to apprehend him, and his uncle was forced against his will to bind the poor boy's arms behind him; and so he was brought to the officers of the town, where he lay from the 14th of August till the last of September. Then was he commanded to the Freeman's prison, where one Richard Howborough, coming to persuade him from burning, willed him to prove first with a candle: who then holding his finger, and the other a candle under it a good space, yet (as the party himself assured me) he felt no burning thereof, neither would the other that held the candle believe him a great while, till he had looked, and saw no scorching of the candle at all appeared.

The child was removed from thence to an inner prison, called Peephole, where the low bailiff, named Robert Yould, laid upon him a pair of bolts, so that he could not lift up his little legs, but leaning on a staff, slipt them forward upon the ground: with these bolts his lying was upon the cold ground, having not one lock of straw nor cloth to cover him, save only two sheep-skins; neither durst father or mother, or any of his friends come to him. Besides this, and many great threats of the papists, there was a madman, put to him in the prison, with a knife about him, wherewith in his frantic rage he often threatened to stab him.

After this came to him one Joyliff and Yewer, two canons, who had his writings against the six articles, and his ballad, called, "Come down for all your shaven crown," to see whether he would stand to that he had written. Which done, with many great raging words, not long after sat Mr. Johnson, the chancellor, in the Guildhall, upon the poor lad. Where first were brought in his accusers, and sworn, then were sworn also twenty-four men which went on his quest, and found him guilty, but he never came before the chancellor. Upon this this he was sent to the common gaol among thieves and murderers, there to tarry the coming of the judges, and so to be had strait to execution. But the mighty mercy of the Lord, who helpeth the desolate and miserable, when all other help is past, so provided for this innocent lad, that the purpose of all his hard-hearted enemies was disappointed: for before the judges came, God took away Henry the Eighth out of this life. By reason whereof the force of the law was then stayed: however, he was nevertheless arraigned, being held up in a man's arms at the bar before the judges, who were Portman and Marven: who when they perceived that they could not burn him, would have him presently whipped. But Mr. Bourne declared to the judges, how he had whipping enough. After that he had lain a week more in prison, he had him home to his house, his wife anointed his legs herself with ointment, which then were stiff and numbed with irons, till at length when Mr. Bourne and his wife saw they could not win him to the belief of their sacrament, they put him away, lest he should infect their son Anthony, as they thought, with heresy.

Thus John Davis was mercifully preserved, after he had suffered imprisonment from the 14th day of August till within seven days of Easter, who is yet alive, and a profitable minister this day in the church of England: blessed be the Lord.

Mrs. ROBERTS.

MISTRESS ROBERTS, a gentlewoman, living (as I understand) in the town of Hawkhurst, in Suffex, being earnestly addicted to the truth of the gospel, and no less constant in that which she had learned therein, so kept herself during all the brunt of queen Mary's time, that she never came to their popish service, nor polluted her conscience with their idolatrous mass. There dwelt at the same time not far off a justice, called sir John Gilford, who being as fervent on the contrary side to set forward the proceedings of queen Mary, thought to prove masteries with this gentlewoman, in forcing her into the church. And first sending his wife, he attempted her by fair words and gentle persuasions to conform herself to the prince's laws, and to come, as other christian people did, to the church. Notwithstanding, she constantly persisting in the sincerity of the truth, would by no persuasions be won to do therein against her conscience; and so kept at home a certain time, till again Mr. Gilford thinking not to give her over so, sent his officers and servants to her, by force and power to haul her out of her house to the church, and so did. Where, by the way, she for grief of conscience swooned, and so of necessity was brought home again, and falling into an ague, was for that time dispensed with. When she had recovered her health again, he came in person to compel her to come to church whether she would or no. But, (as the proverb goeth) who can prevent that which God would have done? For when Mr. Gilford had purposed as pleased him, the Lord so disposed for this good woman, that as he was coming up stairs towards her chamber, suddenly his old disease the gout seized him, and so terribly tormented him, that he could go no further: and so he, that purposed to carry her to the church against her will, was forced himself to be carried home to his house on account of his pain, protesting and swearing that he would never from henceforth trouble that gentlewoman more, and no more he did.

Mrs. ANNE LACY.

MISTRESS ANNE LACY, widow, in Nottinghamshire, was in great danger in queen Mary's time, insomuch that the process was out against her, and she ready to have been apprehended, being so nearly pursued, that she was driven to hide her bible and other books in a dunghill. Mr. Lacy, her brother, was then justice of peace; but to whom (as I have heard) she was but very little beholden. Nevertheless, where kindred faileth, yet God's grace never faileth such as stick to him; for in this mean time, as the process came out against her, queen Mary died, and so she escaped.

CROSSMAN's Wife.

SHE lived at Tibnam Longrow, in Norfolk, and for not going to church, was sought for at her house by the constable of the hundred, who when he came to her house, she being at home with a child sucking in her arms, slept into a corner on the one side of the chimney, and they seeking about the chambers, the child never cried (although before they came it did) as long as they were there, and so by this means the Lord preserved her.

The Congregation at Stoke, in Suffolk.

THERE were some likewise that avoided the violent rage of the adversaries by means only of their number, and mutual according in godliness, wherein they did so hold together, that without much ado none well could be troubled: whereof we have an example in a certain town in Suffolk, called Stoke. After the three sharp years of queen Mary's persecution being past, yet notwithstanding the inhabitants of the town aforesaid, especially the women, came not to their church to receive, after the popish manner, the sacrament; who, if they had been but few, they could by no means have escaped imprisonment. But because there were so many, the papists thought it best not to lay hands upon them. Only they appointed them sixteen days respite after Easter, wherein as many as would, should receive the sacrament; those that would not, should stand to the peril that would follow. Of this company, which were many, giving their hands together, the chief were these:

Eve, an old woman of sixty years of age; Alice Coker, her daughter; Elizabeth Foxe; Agnes Cutting; Alice Spencer; Henry Canker; Joan Fouke; Agnes Spaulding; John Steyre, and his brother; John Foxe.

These, after the order was taken for their not coming to the church, took counsel among themselves what was best to be done, and at length concluded by promise one to another, that they should not receive at all. Yet some of them afterwards, being persuaded with fair promises that the communion should be ministered unto them according to king Edward's book, went to the parish priest (whose name was Cotes), and asked him after which sort he would administer the sacrament. He answered to such as he favoured, that he would give it after the right sort; the rest should have it after the popish manner.

To be short, none did communicate so, but only John Steyre and John Foxe; of which the one gave his wife leave to do as she thought best. The other went about with threats to compel his wife, saying, that otherwise he would divorce himself from her. As for the rest, they withdrew themselves from church, resorting to their wonted company, only Foxe's wife tarried still at home, in heaviness, whose husband practised with the curate in the mean time, that the next day after he should give her the sacrament, which was the seventeenth day after Easter. But the very same day, unknowing to her husband, she went secretly to her company, and with tears declared how violently her husband had dealt with her. The other women bade her notwithstanding to be of good cheer, and said, that they would make their most earnest prayers to God both for her and her husband; and indeed when they had so done, the matter took very good success. For the next day after, Goodman Foxe came of his own accord unto them, a far other man than he was before, and bewailed his own rashness, praying them that they would forgive him, promising ever after to be more strong in faith; to the great rejoicing both of them and his wife.

About half a year after this, the bishop of Norwich sent sent forth certain of his officers or apparators thither, which gave them warning every one to come to the church the next Sunday following. If they would not come, they should appear before the commissary out of hand, to render account of their absence. But the women having secret knowledge of this before, kept themselves out of the way on purpose to avoid the summons or warning. Therefore when they were not at the church on the day appointed, the commissary did first suspend them, according to the bishop of Rome's law, and within three weeks after did excommunicate them. Therefore when they perceived that an officer of the town was set to take some of them, they convening themselves privily out of the town, escaped all danger.

The Congregation in London.

NO less wonderful was the preservation of the congregation in London, which from the first beginning of queen Mary to the latter end thereof, continued, notwithstanding whatsoever the malice, device, searching, and inquisition of men, or strictness of laws could work to the contrary. Such was the merciful hand of the Lord, according to his accustomed goodness, ever working with his people. Of this bountiful goodness of the Lord, many and great examples appeared in the congregation which I now speak of. How often, and in what great danger did he deliver them!

First, In Black-friars, when they should have resorted to sir Thomas Carden's house, private watch was laid for them, but yet through God's providence the mischief was prevented, and they delivered.

Again; they narrowly escaped about Aldgate, where spies were laid for them: and had not Thomas Simson, the deacon, espied them, and bid them disperse themselves away, they had been taken. For within two hours, the constables coming to the house after they were gone, demanded of the wife what company had been there. To whom she, to excuse the matter, made answer again, saying, that half a dozen good fellows had been there at breakfast as they went a maying.

Another time also about the Great Conduit, they passing there through a very narrow alley, into a cloth-worker's loft, were espied, and the sheriffs sent for: but before they came, they having privy knowledge thereof, immediately shifted away out of the alley, John Ayles standing alone in the mercers chapel, staring at them.

Another like escape they made in a ship at Billingsgate, belonging to a certain good man of Leigh, where in the open sight of the people they were assembled together, and yet through God's mighty power escaped.

Betwixt Ratcliff and Redriff, in a ship called Jesus ship, twice or thrice they assembled, having there closely, after their accustomed manner, both sermon, prayer, and communion, and yet through the protection of the Lord they returned, although not unespied, yet untaken.

Moreover, in a cooper's house in Pudding-lane, so near were they to perils and dangers, that John Ayles coming into the house where they were, talked with the man of the house, and after he had asked a question or two, departed; God so working, that either he had no knowledge of them, or no power to take them.

But they never escaped more hardly, than once in Thames-street in the night-time, where the house being beset with enemies, they were delivered by the means of a mariner, who being at that present in the same company, and seeing no other way to avoid, pluckt off his slops and swam to the next boat, and so rowed the company over, using his shoes instead of oars; and so the jeopardy was dispatched.

What should I speak of the extreme danger which that goodly company was in at the taking of Mr. Rough, their minister, and Cutbert Simson, their deacon, had not God's providence given knowledge before to Mr. Rough in his sleep, that Cutbert Simson should leave behind him at home the book of all their names, which he was wont to carry about with him; whereof mention is made before.

In this church or congregation there were sometimes forty, sometimes an hundred, sometimes two hundred, sometimes more, sometimes less. About the latter time of queen Mary it greatly increased. From the beginning, which was about the first entry of queen Mary's reign, they had divers ministers; first, Mr. Scamier, then Tho. Foule, after him Mr. Rough, then Mr. Augustine Bernher, and lastly, Mr. Bentham; concerning the deliverance of which Mr. Bentham (being now bishop of Coventry and Litchfield), God's mighty providence most notably is to be considered. The story is thus:

On a time when seven martyrs were burnt in Smithfield, a proclamation was issued out, strictly forbidding all persons whatsoever either to salute, or pray for, the prisoners as they came to the stake: the godly people hearing this, great numbers of them assembled together, resolving to comfort and encourage them by their prayers: and when they came towards the stake, well guarded by officers armed with bills and glieves as usual, the whole congregation ran in upon them, kissing and embracing them, (not minding the officers and their weapons) and carried them to the stake, and might as well have carried them off, for aught the officers could do to prevent it.

This done, and the people giving place to the officers, the proclamation was read with a loud voice to the people in the names of the king and queen, That no man should pray for them, or once speak a word unto them. Mr. Bentham, then minister of the congregation, seeing the fire set to the martyrs, turned his eyes to his people and said, We know they are the people of God, and therefore we cannot chuse but say, God strengthen them: and then he boldly said, Almighty God, for Christ's sake strengthen them. With that all the people with one consent, and one voice, said, Amen, Amen. The noise whereof was so great, that the officers could not tell what to say, or whom to accuse. And thus much concerning the congregation of the faithful assembling together at London in the time of queen Mary.

Another time, as Mr. Bentham was going through St. Catherine's, intending to take a walk in the air, he was forced by two or three men to go along with them. Mr. Bentham being amazed at the suddenness of the matter, required what their purpose was, or whither they would have him go. They answered, that by the occasion of a man there found drowned, the coroner's inquest was called and charged to sit upon him, of which inquest he must of necessity be one, &c. He endeavoured to excuse himself alledging that he had no skill, and less experience in such matters; and if it would please them to let him go, they would meet with another more fit for their purpose. But when with this they would not be satisfied, he further urged, that he was a scholar in the university of Oxford, and thereby was privileged from being of any inquest. The coroner demanded the sight of his privilege. He said, if he would give him leave, he would fetch it. Then said the coroner, The queen must be served without delay; and so constrained him to be at the hearing of the matter. Then a book was offered him to swear upon; upon his opening it, he found it to be a popish primmer, and refused to swear thereon, and declared moreover what superstition in the book was contained. What, said the coroner, I think we shall have an heretic among us. And upon that, after much reasoning, he was committed to the custody of an officer till further examination: by occasion whereof he hardly could have escaped, had not the Lord helped where man was not able. What followed? As they were thus contending about matters of heresy, suddenly cometh the coroner of the admiralty, disannulling and repealing the order and calling of that inquest, for that it was (as he said) pertaining to his office; and therefore the other coroner and his company in that place had nothing to do. And so the first coroner was discharged and displaced; by reason whereof Mr. Bentham escaped their hands.

EDWARD BENNET.

ABOUT the second year of queen Mary, Edward Bennet, then dwelling at Queenhithe, was desired by Mr. Tingle, then prisoner in Newgate, to bring him a New Testament. He procured one of Mr. Coverdale's translation, wrapt it in a handkerchief, saying to George the keeper, who asked him what he had, that it was a piece of powdered beef. Let me see it, said he. Perceiving what it was, he brought him to sir Roger Cholmley, who examined him why he did so, saying that book was not lawful, and so committed him to Wood-street Compter, where he continued twenty-five weeks.

Dr. Story coming to the prison to examine other prisoners, this Bennet looking out at the grate, spake to him, desiring him to be good unto him, and to help him out, for he had long lain in prison. To whom Dr. Story answered, Wast thou not before me in Christ's church? Yes forsooth, said Bennet. Ah, said Story, thou dost not believe in the sacrament of the altar? Marry, I will help thee out; come, said he to the keeper, turn him out. I will help him; and so took Bennet with him, and brought him to Cluny, in Paternoster-row, and bade him bring him to the Coal-house, and there he was in the stocks a week.

Then the bishop sent for him to talk with him, and first asked him, if he were confessed? No, said Bennet. He asked him if he would be confessed? No, said he. Then he asked him if the priest could take away his sins. No, said Bennet, I do not so believe.

Then he and Harpsfield laughed at him, and mocked him, asking him if he did not believe that whatsoever the priest bound here in earth, should be bound in heaven, and whatsoever he looseth in earth should be loosed in heaven. No, said Bennet; but I believe that the minister of God, preaching God's word truly, and administering the sacraments according to the same, whatsoever he bindeth on earth, should be bound in heaven, and whatsoever he looseth, &c. Then the bishop putting him aside, said he should go to Fulham and be whipped.

Mr. Buswell, a priest, then came to him lying in the Coal-house, in the stocks, and brought Cranmer's recantation, saying, that he had recanted. My faith, said the other, lieth in no man's book, but in him which hath redeemed me. The next Saturday, Bennet with five others were called for to come to mass in the chapel. The mass being done, and they coming out, five of them went to prison, and were afterwards burned. Bennet being behind, and coming toward the gate, the porter, opening to a company going out, asked if there were no prisoners there. No, said they. Bennet standing in open sight before him, with other serving men who were there by reason that Bonner made many priests that day, when the gates were opened, went out amongst them and so escaped.

Again, in the last year of queen Mary, the same Bennet being taken again with the twenty-four beyond Islington, and brought to sir Roger Cholmley's, the people coming very thick, did cut off some of them, to the number of eight, which were behind, among whom was Bennet. Then he knocked at the gate to come in, the porter said, that he was none of the company. He said, Yes, and knocked again. Then there stood by one of the congregation, named Johnson, who said, Edward, thou hast done well, do not tempt God: go thy way. And so he taking the warning as sent of God, with a quiet conscience eschewed burning.

JEFFERY HURST, Brother-in-law to GEORGE MARSH, Martyr.

IN the town of Shakerley, in Lancashire, dwelt one Jeffery Hurst, the son of an honest yeoman, who had besides him eleven children, the said Jeffery being the first and eldest: and their father being willing to bring them up, so that they should be able another day to help themselves, he did bind this Jeffery apprentice unto the craft of nailing, to make all kind of nails, which occupation he learned, and served out the time of seven years, which being expired he gave himself at times to learn of his other brethren which went to school; and as he was very willing to the same, so God sent him knowledge; wherein he persevered and went forwards in such sort, that he could write and read indifferently, and in longer continuance came by more knowledge; and so having the Bible and divers other books in his house, did come to knowledge in the scripture. After this he took to wife the sister of Mr. George Marsh, of whose martyrdom mention is made before, and being very familiar with him, did greatly amend his knowledge. Now when queen Mary was entered the first year of her reign, he kept himself away from their doings, and came not to the church: whereupon he was laid in wait for and called heretic, and Lollard, and so for fear of further danger he was compelled to leave his wife and child, and fly into Yorkshire, and there being not known, did lead his life, returning sometimes by night to comfort his wife, and bringing with him some preacher or other, who used to preach unto them so long as the time would serve, and so departed by night again. The names of the preachers were, Mr. Reneses, Mr. Best, Mr. Brodbanke, Mr. Ruffel, and every time they came thither they were about twenty or twenty-four sometimes, but sixteen at least, who had there also a communion. And thus in much fear did he with others lead his life, till the last year of the reign of queen Mary. Then it chanced that the said Jeffery Hurst, after the death of his father, came home and kept close for seven or eight weeks.

There dwelt not far off, at Morles, a certain justice of the peace, and of the quorum, named Thomas Lelond, who hearing of him, appointed a time to come to his father's house where he then dwelt, to rifle the house for books, and to search for him also, and so he did. Jeffery and his company having knowledge of their coming, took the books which were in the house, as the Bible, the communion book, and the New Testament of Tindal's translation, and divers others, and threw them all underneath a tub or vat, conveying also the said Jeffery under the same, with a great deal of straw underneath him; for as it chanced they had the more time, because when the justice came almost to the door, he stayed and would not enter the house till he had sent for Hurst's mother's landlady, Mrs. Shakerley; and then with her consent intended to go forwards. In the mean time, Jeffery by such as were with him, was willed to lay in his window the Testament of Tindal's translation, and a little book containing the third part of the Bible, with the book of Ecclesiasticus, to try what they would say unto them.

This done, Mrs. Shakerley came. Unto whom the justice immediately declared the cause of his coming, and how he was sorry to attempt any such thing against any of her tenants for her sake, but notwithstanding he must needs execute his office. And again you must (said he) note this, that a scabbed sheep is able to infect a great number; and especially having, as he hath, so many brethren and sisters, he is able to marr them all, if he be not looked to in time. And thus concluding, Mr. Lelond entered into the house, and being come in, set himself in a chair in the middle of the house, and sending sir Ralph Parkinson, his priest, and one of his men, and one of Mrs. Shakerley's men, about the house, to search and rifle the chests (who did so), in the mean time he talked with Hurst's mother, almost sixty years of age; and chiding with her that she would suffer her son so to order and behave himself like an heretic, said, Thou old fool, I know myself that this new learning shall come again; but for how long? even for three or four months, and no longer. But I will lay thee, old fool, in Lancaster dungeon for this, and well worthy.

Now as concerning the searchers, they found nothing but Latin books, as grammar, and such like. These be not what we look for (said they), we must see farther, and so looked into Hurst's chamber, where they found the aforesaid books. Then sir Ralph taking up the Testament, looked on it, and smiled. His master seeing that, said, Now, sir Ralph, what have we here? Forsooth, saith he, a Testament of Tindal's translation, plain heresy, and none worse than it. Then said he, all their goods are lost to the queen, and their bodies to prison, and was wonderfully hasty; notwithstanding, through the means of Mrs. Shakerley, he was content to stay a little.

Then the priest looked on the other book. What say you to that, sir Ralph? is that as bad as the other? No, said he, but it is not good that they should have such English books to look on, for this and such others may do much harm. Then he asked his mother where her eldest son was, and her daughter Alice. She answered she could not tell; they had not been with her a long time. And he swore by God's body, he would make her tell where they were, or he would lay her in Lancaster dungeon; and yet he would have them notwithstanding too. To be short, for fear, he had his brother J. Hurst and his mother bound in an hundred pounds to bring the parties before him in fourteen days time, and so he departed, and the priest put both the books in his bosom, and carried them away with him. Then John Hurst went after them, desiring that he might have the book which the priest found no fault with; but he said, they should answer to them both, and which soever was the better, neither was good.

As this passed on, when the time was come that Jeffery Hurst and his sister should be examined, the justice sent for them betimes in the morning, and had prepared a mass to begin withal, asking Jeffery Hurst if he would first go and see his Maker, and then he would talk further with him. To whom Jeffery answered and said, Sir, my Maker is in heaven, and I am assured in going to your mass I shall find no edification thereby; and therefore I pray you hold me excused.

Well, well, said he, I perceive I shall find you an heretic, by God; but I will go to mass, and I will not lose it for all your prattling. Then he went into his chapel, and when mass was done he sent for them, and caused his priest to read a scroll unto them concerning the seven sacraments; and ever as he spake of the body and blood of Christ, he put off his cap, and said, Lo, you may see, you will deny these things, and care not for your prince; but you shall feel it before I have done with you, and all the faculty of you, with other talk more between them, I know not what; but in the end they were licensed to depart under sureties to appear again before him within three weeks, and then to go to Lancaster. However, in the mean time it so pleased God, that within four days of the day appointed, it was noised that the queen was dead, and within fourteen days after the said Jeffery Hurst had his two books sent home, and nothing was said unto him.

It followed after this that God's word began to take place, and the queen's visitors came down into that country, who chose four men in the parish, to wit, Simon Smith, Jeffery Hurst, Henry Brown, George Eccersley, which four were protestants, to see the queen's proceedings take place; who according to their power did so, notwithstanding it little prevailed; and therefore the said Jeffery being sorely grieved with the office, fell sick, in which sickness it pleased God to call him, making a very godly end, God have the praise for it.

Now to return to the aforesaid Thomas Lelond again, he continued still in his office, did very seldom come to the church, but said he was aged, and might not labour, and there kept with him sir Ralph Parkinson, his priest, who could (as it was said) administer the communion unto the people, and sing mass unto his master: yes, and (as the same reported) did a prettier feat than all that, for he begat two children by a servant in his house, his master knowing it, and saying nothing, for that he would not lose his good mass-priest.

Furthermore, this was noted in the same justice Lelond's behaviour at church time, he had a little dog which he would play with all service time, and the same dog had a collar full of bells, so that the noise of them molested and troubled others as well as himself, from hearing the service. Also it was observed in the same justice, that as he sat in his chapel at service time, his manner was on a willow bark to knit knots, for that, he could not be suffered to have his beads, and to put the same upon a string also. Witness hereof Edward Hurst, with others.

Furthermore, as concerning Henry Brown, one of the four chosen men before-mentioned, this is also to be noted, that the said Henry Brown, dwelling in the town of Pinnington, in the same parish, 1564, had a little boy, who as he was playing in the town, one Glave's wife gave unto the boy a pair of beads made of wood for him to play withal. the little boy, being glad thereof to have such a fine thing, went home and shewed them to his father. His father seeing the beads took them and burnt them, and when he had so done, went forth and asked who had given unto his little boy that pair of beads.

That I did, said Glave's wife.

Well, said he, I have burnt them.

Hast thou so? said she, and thrust him from her. They shall be the dearest beads that ever thou sawest, and immediately went and complained unto the justice, how Brown had burned her beads.

At this the justice was very angry, and directed his letter unto the constables of the said town, by his own hand subscribed; the title of which superscription on the backside was this, "To the constables of Pinnington give this."

This done, the constables according to their charge brought him before the justice at the time appointed; and when the justice came to talk with him, he was in such a heat, that he called him thief, and said that he had robbed his neighbour in burning of her beads, and that there were rings and other jewels on them, and that he might as well have picked her purse; wherefore (said he) I will lay thee in Lancaster dungeon for this trick.

Whilst they were thus talking, there came all his servants about them from their work, saying, Is this master doctor Brown, that will burn beads? I pray you, sir, let us have him here and preach: I will give you a quarter's wages, saith one; and I will give you money, saith another, and he shall be master doctor, with much derision and scoffing at this poor man.

He hearing this, spake again boldly, and said, Did you send for me to make a laughing-stock of me? You be in office, and ought rather to come to the church, and see such papistry abolished yourself, than thus to trouble me for doing my duty: but I tell you plainly, that you do not come to church as you ought to do, and therefore with more things than I have to charge you withal, I say you do not well. When all this misdemeanour by the justice laid to his charge would not prevail, and also a witness came in of the papist who knew the beads, and testified that they were plain, and cost but a half-penny, he then went into his parlour in a passion, and one master Exberston, a papist, with him; which Exberston turned back, and said, Is it you, Henry Brown, that maketh this stir? You are one of them that pulled down crosses in the church, and pulled down the rood-sollor, and all the saints; you were best now to go paint a black devil, and set him up and worship him, for that will serve well for your religion. And thus, under suretyship, he departed till July following, and then he said he should go to Lancaster prison, and so he came away.

The time drew on that he should appear, but God stayed the matter, and in July as the aforesaid Thomas Lelond sat in his chair talking with his friends, he fell down suddenly dead, not much moving any joint: and thus was his end; from such God defend us.

WILLIAM WOOD, of Kent.

WILLIAM WOOD, baker, dwelling in the county of Kent, was examined before Dr. Kenall, chancellor of the diocese of Rochester, Dr. Chedsey, the mayor of Rochester, and Mr. Robinson, the scribe, on the 19th day of October, and in the the second year of queen Mary, in St. Nicholas church in Rochester.

Scribe. William Wood, you are presented because you will not come to the church, nor receive the blessed sacrament of the Altar. How say you? Have you received it, or have you not?

Wood. I have not received it, nor dare I receive it, as you minister it.

Kenall. Thou heretic, what is the cause that thou hast not received the blessed sacrament of the altar? And at this word they all put off their caps; and made low obeisance.

Wood. There are three causes that make my conscience afraid that I dare not receive it. The first, Christ did deliver it to his twelve apostles and said, Take, eat, and drink ye all of this, &c. and ye eat and drink up alone. The second cause is; you hold it to be worshipped, contrary to God's commandment, Thou shalt not bow down nor worship. The third cause is; you administer it in a strange tongue, contrary to St. Paul's doctrine, I would rather have five words with understanding, than ten thousand with tongues; by reason whereof the people be ignorant of the death of Christ.

Kenall. Thou heretic, wilt thou have any plainer words than these, "Take, eat, this is my body?" Wilt thou deny the scriptures?

Wood. I will not deny the holy scriptures, God forbid, but with my heart I do faithfully believe them. St. Paul saith, "God calleth those things that are not, as though they were:" and Christ saith, "I am a vine: I am a door." St. Paul saith, "The rock is Christ:" All which are figurative speeches, wherein one thing is spoken, and another thing is understood.

Robinson. You make a very long talk of this matter: learn, Wood, learn.

Kenall. Nay, these heretics will not learn: look how this heretic glorieth in himself: thou fool, art thou wiser than the queen and her council, and all the learned men of this realm?

Wood. And please you, Mr. Chancellor, I think you would be loth to have such glory, to have your life and goods taken away, and to be thus called upon, as you rail upon me. But the servant is not greater than his master. And where you do mock me, and say that I am wiser than the queen and her council, St. Paul saith, "The wisdom of the wise of this world is foolishness before God, and he that will be wise in this world, shall be accounted but a fool."

Kenall. Dost not thou believe that after these words spoken by a priest, Hoc est corpus meum, "this is my body;" there remaineth no more bread and wine, but the very flesh and blood of Christ, as he was born of the virgin Mary, really and substantially, in quantity and quality, as he did hang upon the cross?

Wood. I pray you, Mr. Chancellor, give me leave, for my learning, to ask you one question, and I will answer you after.

Kenall. It is some wise question, I warrant you.

Wood. God spake to the prophet Ezekiel, saying, "Thou son of man, take a razor, and shave off the hair of thy head, and take one part and cast it into the air, take the second part and put it into thy coat lap; and take the third part, and cast it into the fire: and this is Jerusalem." I pray you, Mr. Chancellor, was this hair that the prophet did cast into the fire, or was it Jerusalem?

Kenall. It did signify Jerusalem.

Wood. Even so this word of Christ, "This is my body," is not to be understood, that Christ's carnal, natural and real body is in the same, in quantity and quality as it was born of the virgin Mary, and as he was crucified on the cross, is present or inclosed in the sacrament; but it doth signify Christ's body, as St. Paul saith, "So often as ye eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, you shall shew forth the Lord's death till he come." What should the apostle mean by this word, "Till he come," if he were here carnally, naturally, corporally, and really, in the same quantity and quality as he was born of the virgin Mary, and as he did hang on the cross, as you say? But St. Paul saith, "You shall shew the Lord's death till he come." This doth argue, that he is not here as you would have us to believe.

Chedsey. I will prove that Christ is here present under the form of bread; but not in quantity and quality.

Kenall. Yes he is here present in quantity and quality.

Chedsey. He is here present under a form, and not in quantity and quality.

Yes, said Kenall.

No, said Chedsey.

I will prove the contrary, said Chedsey.

And these two doctors were so earnest in this matter, the one to affirm, the other to deny, contending so fiercely one with the other, that they foamed at the mouth, and one was ready to spit in another's face, so that in great fury and rage the two doctors rose up from the judgment seat, and Dr. Kenall departed out of the church in great rage and fury immediately.

Wood. Behold, good people, they would have us to believe, that Christ is naturally, really, in quantity and quality, present in the sacrament, and yet they cannot tell themselves, nor agree within themselves how he is there.

At these words the people made a great shout, and the mayor stood up and commanded the people to be quiet, and to keep silence. And the God that did deliver St. Paul out of the hands of the high priests, by the contention that was between the pharisees and sadduces, did even so deliver me at that time out of the mouths of the bloody papists, by means of the contention of these two doctors. Blessed be the name of the Lord, who hath promised to lay no more upon his people than he will enable them to bear, and in the midst of temptation can make a way for them (how, and when it pleaseth him) to escape out of all dangers.

Many other like examples of God's helping hand have been declared upon his elect saints and children, a remarkable instance of which may be seen in Simon Grinæus, mentioned in the commentary of Melancthon, in his own words as followeth.

The History of SIMON GRINÆUS, collected out of Melancthon's Commentaries upon the tenth Chapter of Daniel.

WHEN I was (saith he) at the assembly holden at Spire, in the year of our Lord 1539, by chance Simon Grinæus came thither unto me from the university of Heidelberg; where he heard Faber, the bishop of Vienna, in a sermon, defend and maintain many detestable errors. When the sermon was done, he followed Faber out of the church, and saluted him reverently, telling him that he had something to say to him: the bishop was willing to talk with him.

Then Grinæus said unto him, that he was very sorry that a man of such learning and authority should openly maintain such errors as were both contumelious against God, and also might be refuted by the manifest testimonies of the scriptures. Ireneus writeth, (saith he) that Polycarpus was wont to stop his ears whensoever he heard any erroneous and wicked doctrine. With what mind then (think you) would Polycarpus have heard you argue and reason what is it that the mouse eateth, when he gnaweth the consecrated host? Who would not bewail such ignorance and blindness of the church? With this the bishop broke off his talk, and asked his name. This man, dissembling nothing, gently told him that his name was Grinæus.

This bishop, as many well know, was also timorous and fearful in the company of learned men. Wherefore he fearing the learning, eloquence, and fervent zeal of Grinæus, especially in such a matter as this was, fained as though he had been sent for by the king, and that he had no leisure now to reason upon this matter matter. He pretended that he was very desirous of acquaintance and longer talk with Grinæus, intreating him, that, both for his own private cause, and also for the commonwealth, he would come again the next day unto him, and so shewed him his lodging, and appointed him an hour when he should come. Grinæus, thinking that he had spoken unfeignedly, promised so to do.

When he was departed from the bishop, he immediately came to us, and was scarcely sat at the table (for it was supper-time) reciting part of the talk he had with the bishop unto me, and others there present, when, sitting with my company, I was suddenly called out of the parlour by a certain ancient fatherly man, who shewing a singular gravity in his countenance, words, and behaviour, spake unto me, and said, that the serjeants would by and by come unto our lodging, being sent by the king's command, to carry Grinæus to prison, whom the bishop had accused to the king; commanding that Grinæus should immediately depart out of the town; and exhorting me, that we should in no case delay the time: and so bidding me farewell, departed. But what old man this was, I neither knew then, nor ever after could understand. I returning again to my company, bade them arise, and told them what the old man had said unto me.

By and by, we taking Grinæus in the midst of us, carried him through the street to the river Rhene; and after we had stayed upon the hither bank awhile, until Grinæus with his companion were carried over in a small boat, returning again to our lodging, we understood that the serjeants had been there, when we were but a little way gone out of the house. Now in what danger Grinæus would have been, if he had been carried to prison by this cruelty of the bishop, every man easily may conjecture: wherefore we judged that that most cruel intent and purpose of his was disappointed by God's merciful providence. And as I cannot say what old man it was that gave me that warning, even so likewise the serjeants made such quick speed, that, except Grinæus had been covered and defended by angels, through the marvellous providence of God, he could never have escaped.

Concerning the truth of this matter, there are many good men yet alive who know the same, and also were present when this circumstance happened. Therefore let us give thanks unto God, who hath given us his angels to be our keepers and defenders, whereby with more quiet minds we may fulfil and do the office of our vocation.

With such like examples of God's mighty and merciful custody, the church of Christ in all ages abounds, as by manifold experience appears, as well among the Germans, as in other places and ages: but in no place more, nor at any time more plentiful, than in the persecuting time of queen Mary, in this realm of England, as partly hath been already shewn, and will hereunto be added.

The Lady Catherine, Duchess of Suffolk.

STEPHEN GARDINER, bishop of Winchester, surmising the lady Catherine, baroness of Willoughby and Eresby, and duchess dowager of Suffolk, to be one of his ancient enemies, because he knew he had deserved no better of her, devised, in the holy time of the first Lent in queen Mary's reign, a holy practice of revenge, first, by touching her in the person of her husband, Richard Bertie, esquire, for whom he sent an attachment (having the great seal at his devotion) to the sheriff of Lincolnshire, with a special letter, commanding most strictly the same sheriff to attach the said Richard immediately, and without bail to bring him up to London to his Lordship. Mr. Bertie being clear in conscience, and free from offence toward the queen, could not conjecture any cause of this strange process, unless it were some quarrel for religion, which he thought could not be so sore as the process pretended.

The sheriff, notwithstanding the commandment, adventured only to take a bond of Mr. Bertie, with two sureties, in a thousand pounds, for his appearance before the bishop on Good-Friday following; at which day Mr. Bertie appeared, the bishop then being at his house by St. Mary Overy's. Of whose presence when the bishop understood by a gentleman of his chamber, he came out of his gallery into his dining-chamber in great rage, where he found a crowd of suitors, saying he would not that day hear any, but came forth only to know of Mr. Bertie, how he, being a subject, durst so arrogantly set at light two former processes of the queen.

Mr. Bertie answered, that notwithstanding my lord's words might seem to the rest somewhat sharp towards him, yet he received great comfort of them. For whereas he before thought it extremely hard to be attached, having used no obstinacy or contumacy, now he gathered of those words, that my lord meant not otherwise but to have used some ordinary process: none, however, came to his hands.

Yea, marry, said the bishop, I have sent you two subpoenas to appear immediately, and I am sure you received them, for I committed the trust of them to no worse a man than Mr. Solicitor; and I shall make you an example to all Lincolnshire for your obstinacy.

Mr. Bertie denying the receipt of any subpoena, humbly prayed his lordship to suspend his displeasure and the punishment till he had good trial thereof, and then, if it please him, to double the pain for the fault, if any were.

Well, said the bishop, I have appointed myself this day (according to the holiness of the same for devotion, and I will not further trouble myself with you; but I injoin you in a thousand pounds not to depart without leave, and to be here again to-morrow at seven of the clock. Mr. Bertie came at the time appointed, at which time the bishop had with him Mr. Serjeant Stampford, to whom he moved certain questions of the said Mr. Bertie, because Mr. Serjeant was towards the lord Wriothesley, late earl of Southampton, and chancellor of England, with whom the said Mr. Bertie was brought up. Mr. Serjeant gave a very friendly account of Mr. Bertie, of his own knowledge, for the time of their conversation together. Whereupon the bishop caused Mr. Bertie to be brought in, and first making a false train (as God would, without fire) before he would descend to the quarrel of religion, he first assaulted him in this manner.

Bishop of Winchester. The queen's pleasure is, that you shall make present payment of 4000 pounds, due to her father by duke Charles, late husband to the duchess your wife, whose executor she was.

Bertie. Pleaseth it your lordship, that debt is installed, and is, according to that instalment, truly answered.

Bishop. Tush, the queen will not be bound to instalments in the time of Kett's government: for so I esteem the late government.

Bertie. The instalment was appointed by king Henry the Eighth; besides, the same was, by special commissioners, confirmed in king Edward's time; and the lord treasurer being an executor also to the duke Charles, solely and wholly, took upon him, before the said commissioners, to discharge the same.

Bishop. If it be true that you say, I will shew you favour. But of another thing, Mr. Bertie, I will admonish you, as meaning you well. I hear of your evil religion, yet I can hardly think evil of you, whose mother I know to be as godly a catholic as any within this land; yourself brought up with a master, whose education, if I should disallow, I might be charged as author of his error. Besides, partly I know you myself, and understand of my friends enough to make me your friend: wherefore I will not doubt of you; but I pray you, if I may ask the question of my lady your wife, is she now as ready to set up the mails, as she was lately to pull it down, when she caused, in her progress, a dog to be carried in a rochet, and called by my name? or doth she think her lambs now safe enough, who said to me, when when I vailed my bonnet to her out of my chamber window in the Tower, That it was merry with the lambs, now the wolf was shut up? Another time, my lord, her husband, having invited me and divers ladies to dinner, desired every lady to chuse him whom she loved best, and so place themselves: my lady, your wife, taking me by the hand, for my lord would not have her to take himself, said, That, forasmuch as she could not sit down with my lord, whom she loved best, she had chosen him whom she loved worst.

Of the device of the dog, quoth Mr. Berty, she was neither the author nor the allower. The words, though in that season they sounded bitter to your lordship, yet if it would please you, without offence, to know the cause, I am sure the one will clear the other. As touching setting up of mas, which she learned, not only by strong persuasions of divers excellent learned men, but by universal consent and order, these six years past, inwardly to abhor, if she should outwardly allow, she should both to Christ shew herself a false christian, and to her prince a masquing subject. You know, my lord, one by judgment reformed, is more worth than a thousand transformed temporisers. To force a confession of religion by mouth, contrary to that in the heart, worketh damnation where salvation is pretended.

Yea, marry, quoth the bishop, that deliberation would do well if she were required to come from an old religion to a new: but now she is to return from a new to an ancient religion; wherein, when she made me her gossip, she was as earnest as any.

For that, my lord, (said Mr. Berty) not long since she answered a friend of her's, using your lordship's speech, That religion went not by age, but by truth: and therefore she was to be turned by persuasion, and not by commandment.

I pray you, (quoth the bishop) think you it possible to persuade her?

Yea verily (said Mr. Berty) with the truth: for she is reasonable enough.

The bishop, in reply to this, said, It will be a marvellous grief to the prince of Spain, and to all the nobility that shall come with him, when they shall find but two noble personages of the Spanish race within this land, the queen and my lady your wife, and one of them gone from the faith.

Mr. Berty answered, that he trusted they should find no fruits of infidelity in her.

The bishop then persuaded Mr. Berty to labour earnestly for the reformation of her opinion, and offering large friendship, released him of his bond from further appearance.

The duchess and her husband, from the daily accounts which they received from their friends, understanding that the bishop meant to call her to an account of her faith, whereby extremity might follow, devised how they might pass the seas by the queen's licence. Mr. Berty had a ready means; for there remained great sums of money due to the old duke of Suffolk (one of whose executors the duchess was) beyond the seas, the emperor himself being one of those debtors.

Mr. Berty communicated this his purposed suit for licence to pass the seas, and the cause, to the bishop, adding, that he took this to be the most proper time to deal with the emperor, by reason of likelihood of marriage between the queen and his son.

I like your device well, said the bishop, but I think it better that you tarry the prince's coming, and I will procure you his letters also to his father.

Nay, said Mr. Berty, under your lordship's correction, and pardon for so liberal speech, I suppose the time will then be less convenient; for when the marriage is consummated, the emperor hath his desire, but till then he will refuse nothing to win credit with us.

By St. Mary, said the bishop, smiling, you guess shrewdly. Well, proceed in your suit to the queen, and it shall not lack my helping hand.

Mr. Berty found so good success, that he obtained the queen's licence, not only to pass the seas, but to pass and repass them as often as he should think proper, till he had finished his business beyond the seas. He accordingly embarked at Dover, about the beginning of June, in the first year of her reign, leaving the duchess behind, who, by agreement with her husband, followed, taking barge at Lion-key, very early in the morning of the first of January ensuing, not without some danger.

None of the persons who accompanied her, except Mr. Robert Cranwell, an old gentleman, whom Mr. Berty had provided for that purpose, were made privy to her departure till the instant. She took her daughter with her, an infant of one year old, and the meanest of her servants, for she imagined the best would not adventure that fortune with her. They were in number four men, one a Greek born, who was a rider of horses; another a joiner, the third a brewer, the fourth a fool, a kitchen-maid, a gentlewoman, and a laundress.

As she departed her house called the Barbican, between four and five o'clock in the morning, with her company and baggage, one Atkinson, a herald, keeper of her house, hearing a noise, rose and came out with a torch in his hand, as she was going out of the gate; wherewith being amazed, she was forced to leave a mail with necessaries for her young daughter, and a milk-pot with milk, in the same gate-house, commanding all her servants to hasten forward to Lion-key: and taking with her only the two women and her child, as soon as she was clear of her own house, perceiving the herald to follow, she stepped into the Charter-house just by. The herald coming out of the duchess's house, and seeing nobody stirring, nor assured (though by the mail suspecting) that she was departed, returned in; and while he was searching the parcels left in the mail, the duchess issued into the streets, and proceeded on her journey, she knowing the place only by name where she should take her boat, but not the way thither, nor any that was with her. Likewise her servants having divided themselves, none but one knew the way to the said Lion-key.

So she appeared like a mean merchant's wife, and the rest like mean servants, walking in the streets unknown, she took the way that leads to Finsbury field; and the others walked the city streets as they lay open before them, till by chance, more than discretion, they met all suddenly together a little within Moregate, from whence they passed directly to Lion-key, and there took barge in a morning so misty, that the steer's-man was loth to launch out, but that they urged him. So soon as the day permitted, the council was informed of her departure, and some of them came forthwith to her house to inquire of the manner thereof, and took an inventory of her goods, besides further order devised for search and watch to apprehend and stay her.

The fame of her departure reached Leigh, a town at the Land's End, before her approaching thither. By Leigh dwelt one Gosling, a merchant of London, an old acquaintance of Cranwell's, whither the said Cranwell brought the duchess, naming her Mrs. White, the daughter of Mr. Gosling, for such a daughter he had who never was in that country. She there reposed herself, and made new garments for her daughter, having lost her own in the mail at Barbican.

When the time came that she should take ship, being constrained that night to lie at an inn in Leigh, (where she was again almost betrayed) yet notwithstanding by God's good working she escaped that hazard; at length, as the tide and wind served, they went aboard, and carried twice into the seas, almost into the coast of Zealand, by contrary wind were driven to the place from whence they came; and at the last recoil, certain persons came to the shore, suspecting she was within that ship; yet having examined one of her company that was on shore for fresh provision, and finding by the simplicity of his tale only the appearance of a mean merchant's wife to be on ship-board, he ceased to search any further.

To be short, so soon as the duchess had landed in Brabant, she and her women were apparelled like the women of the Netherlands with hooks; and so she and her husband took their journey towards Cleveland, and being arrived at a town called Santon, took a house there, until they might further devise of some sure place where to settle themselves.

About five miles from Santon, is a free town called Wefell, under the said Duke of Cleve's dominion, and one of the Hans-towns, privileged with the company of the Steel-yard, in London, whither divers Walloons were fled for religion, and had for their minister one Francis Perusell, then called Francis de Rivers, who had received some courtesy in England at the duchess's hands. Mr. Berty being yet at Santon, practised with him to obtain a protection from the magistrates for his, and his wife's abode at Wefell; which was the sooner procured, because the state of the duchess was not discovered, but only to the chief magistrate, earnestly bent to shew them pleasure, while this protection was in seeking.

In the mean while at the town of Santon was a muttering, that the duchess and her husband were greater personages than they gave themselves forth: and the magistrates not very well inclined to religion, the bishop of Arras also being dean of the great minister, orders were taken that the duchess and her husband should be examined of their condition and religion upon a sudden. Which being discovered by a gentleman of that country to Mr. Berty, he without delay taking no more than the duchess, her daughter, and two others with them, as though he meant no more than to take the air, about three o'clock in the afternoon in February, on foot, without hiring either horse or waggon, for fear of disclosing his purpose, meant privately that night to get to Wefell, leaving the rest of his family at Santon.

After they had travelled one English mile from the town, there fell a mighty rain of continuance, whereby a long frost and ice before congealed, was thawed, which doubled more the weariness of those new lacquies. But being now on the way, and overtaken with the night, they sent their two servants (which only went with them) to a village as they passed, to hire a car for their ease, but none could be hired. In the mean time Mr. Berty was forced to carry the child, and the duchess his cloak and rapier. At last between six and seven o'clock of a dark night, they came to Wefell, and repairing to the inns for lodging, and some repose, after such a painful journey, found hard entertainment; for going from inn to inn, offering large sums of money for a small lodging, they were refused by all the inn-holders, suspecting Mr. Berty to be a launce-knight, and the duchess to be his woman. The child for cold and sustenance cried pitifully, the mother wept as fast, and the heavens rained as fast as the clouds could pour.

Mr. Berty, destitute of all other succour of hospitality, resolved to bring the duchess to the porch of the great church in the town, and so to buy coals, victuals, and straw for their miserable repose there that night, or at least till by God's help he might provide her better lodging. Mr. Berty at that time understood not much Dutch, and by bad weather and late season of the night, he could not happen upon any that could speak English, French, Italian, or Latin, till at last going towards the church-porch, he heard two striplings talking Latin, to whom he approached, and offered them two stivers to bring him to some Walloon's house.

By these boys, and God's good conduct, he chanced at the first upon the house where Mr. Perusell supped that night, who had procured them the protection of the magistrates of that town. At the first knock, the good man of the house himself came to the door, and opening it, asked Mr. Berty who he was. Mr. Berty said, an Englishman, that sought for one Mr. Perusell's house. The Walloon desired Mr. Berty to stay a while, then went back, and told Mr. Perusell, that the same English gentleman, of whom he had talked at supper-time, had sent by likelihood his servant to speak with him. Whereupon Mr. Perusell came to the door, and beholding Mr. Berty, the duchess, and their child, their faces, apparel, and bodies so far from their old form, deformed with dirt, weather, and heaviness, could not speak to them, nor they to him for tears. At length recovering themselves, they saluted one another, and so together entered the house, God knoweth full joyfully; Mr. Berty changing his apparel with the good man, the duchess with the good wife, and their child with the child of the house.

Within a few days after, by Mr. Perusell's means, they hired a very fair house in the town, and did not delay to shew themselves what they were, in such good sort as their present condition permitted. It was by this time through the whole town, what discourtesy the inn-holders had shewed unto them at their entry, insomuch that on the Sunday following, a preacher in the pulpit openly in sharp terms rebuked that great incivility toward strangers, by allegation of sundry places out of the holy scriptures, discoursing how not only princes sometimes are received in the image of private persons, but angels in the shape of men, and that God of his justice would make them strangers one day in another land, to have more sense of the afflicted heart of a stranger.

The time thus passing forth, as they thought themselves thus happily settled, suddenly a watch-word came from sir John Mason, then queen Mary's ambassador in the Netherlands, that my lord Paget had feigned an errand to the baths that way: and whereas the duke of Brunswick was shortly with ten ensigns to pass by Wefell for the service of the house of Austria against the French king, the said duchess and her husband should be with the same company intercepted.

Wherefore to prevent the cruelty of these enemies, Mr. Berty with his wife and child departed to a place called Wineheim, under the Palsgrave's dominion; where under his protection they continued till their necessities began to fail them, and they, almost fainting under so heavy a burden, began to fail of hope.

At which time, in the midst of their despair, there came suddenly to them, letters from the Palatine of Vilva, that the king of Poland was informed of their hard estate by a baron, named Joannes Alasco, that was sometime in England, offering them great courtesy. This provision unlooked for, greatly revived their heavy spirits. Yet considering they should remove from many of their countrymen and acquaintance, to a place so far distant, a country not frequented by the English, and perhaps upon their arrival not finding what they looked for, the end of their journey should be worse than the beginning, they advised thereupon with one Mr. Carloe, late bishop of Chichester, that if he would vouchsafe to take some pains therein, they would make him a fellow of that journey. So finding him agreeable, they sent with him letters of thanks to the king and Palatine, and also a few principal jewels (which only they had left of many), to solicit for them, that the king would vouchsafe under his seal, to assure them of the thing which he so honourably by letters had offered.

That favour, by the forwardness of the Palatine, was as soon granted as uttered. Upon which assurance the said duchess and her husband, with their family, began their journey in April, 1557, from the castle of Wineheim, where they before lay, towards Frankfort. In which their journey, it were too long here to describe what dangers fell by the way, upon them and their whole company, by reason of the Landgrave's captain, who, under a quarrel pretended for a spaniel of Mr. Berty's, set upon them in the highway with his horsemen, thrusting their boar-spears through the waggon where the women and children were, Mr. Berty having but four horsemen along with him. In which scuffle it happened that the captain's horse was slain under him.

Whereupon a rumour was spread immediately through the towns and villages about, that the Landgrave's captain should be slain by certain Walloons, which exasperated the countrymen the more fiercely against Mr. Berty, as afterwards it proved. For being motioned by his wife to save himself by the swiftness of his horse, and to reach some town thereby for his rescue, he so doing, was in worse case than before: for the townsmen and the captain's brother, supposing no less but that the captain had been slain, pressed so eagerly upon him, that he had been there taken and murdered among them, had not he (as God would have it) espied a ladder leaning to a window, by which he got into the house.

house, and went up into the garret; where, with his dagger and rapier he defended himself for a time: but at length the burgh-master coming thither with another magistrate, who could speak Latin, he was advised to submit himself to the order of the law. Mr. Berty knowing himself to be clear, and the captain to be alive, was the more bold to submit himself to the judgment of the law, upon condition that the magistrate would receive him upon safe conduct, and defend him from the rage of the multitude. Which being promised, he willingly delivered up his weapons, and peaceably surrendered himself into the hands of the magistrates, and so was committed to safe custody till the truth of his cause could be tried.

Then Mr. Berty wrote a letter to the Landgrave, and another to the earl of Erbagh, dwelling about eight miles off, who came early in the morning to the town, where the duchess was brought with her waggon, Mr. Berty also being in the same town under custody.

The earl, who had some intelligence before of the duchess, after he had come and had shewn her such courtesy as he thought belonged to her estate and dignity, the townsmen perceiving the earl behave himself so humbly to her, began to consider more of the matter, and further understanding the captain to be alive, both they and the authors of this stir, drew in their horns, shrunk away, and made all the friends they could to Mr. Berty and his lady, beseeching them not to report their doings after the worst manner.

And thus Mr. Berty and his wife, escaping that danger, proceeded in their journey toward Poland, where in conclusion they were quietly entertained by the king, and placed honourably in the earldom of the said king of the Poles, in Sanogelia, called Crozan, where Mr. Berty with the duchess, having the king's absolute power of government over the said earldom, continued in honour, peace and plenty, till the death of queen Mary.

THOMAS HORTON, Minister.

THOMAS HORTON used often to travel between Germany and England, for the benefit and sustenance of the poor English exiles there: so he journeying on a time between Maestricht and Cologne, chanced to be taken by certain rovers, and so being led by them away, was in no little danger: and yet this danger of his was not so great, but the present help of the Lord was greater to aid and deliver him out of the same.

THOMAS SPRAT, of Kent, Tanner.

HE had been some time a servant to one justice Brent, a heavy persecutor, and therefore forsaking his master for religion's sake, he went to Calais, (accompanied by one William Porrege, who was afterwards a minister) from whence they used often for their necessary affairs to have recourse to England.

In the fourth year of queen Mary they landed at Dover, and taking their journey together towards Sandwich, suddenly upon the way, three miles from Dover, they happened to meet justice Brent, the two Blachendens, and other gentlemen with their servants, to the number of ten or twelve horses. One of the Blachendens happened to know William Porrege, the other had only heard of his name.

Sprat first espying his master Brent, was much surprised, saying to his companion, yonder is Mr. Brent, God have mercy upon us. Well, quoth Porrege, seeing now there is no remedy, let us go on our way. And so thinking to pass by them, they kept themselves at a distance, Sprat also shadowing his face with his cloak.

One of Mr. Brent's servants knowing Sprat, called out to his master, saying, Yonder is Thomas Sprat; at which words they all stopt their horses, and called for Thomas Sprat to come to them. They call you, said William Porrege; now there is no remedy, but we are taken: and so would have persuaded him to go to them being called, for that there was no escaping from so many horsemen in those plains and downs, where was no wood near them by a mile, and but one hedge about a stone's throw off. All this notwithstanding, Sprat staid, and would not go. Then they called again, sitting still on horseback. Ah, firrah, quoth the justice, why come you not hither? And still his companion moved him to go, seeing there was no hope of getting away. Nay, said Sprat, I will not go to them; and therewith took to his legs, running to the hedge that was next him. They seeing that, set spurs to their horses, thinking it impossible for him to escape their hands. When he got to the hedge, scrambling through the bushes, they were at his heels, and struck at him with their swords, one of the Blachendens (both of them haters of God's word) cruelly crying, Cut one of his legs off.

He had no sooner got through the hedge, but one of justice Brent's servants (a fellow that had some time been his fellow-servant) followed him on foot: the rest rode up the other side of the hedge to meet him at the end.

While they were following Sprat, only one remained with William Porrege (which was one of the Blachendens, but not he that knew him), who began to question him, not asking what was his name (as God would have it) for then he had been known and taken: but from whence he came, and how he got into Sprat's company, and whither he was going: he answered, that he came from Calais, and Sprat came over with him in the passage-boat, and they were both going to Sandwich: and so without any more questions he let him depart. But to return.

As Sprat was pursued on the one side of the hedge by his old fellow-servant in his boots, and on the other side by horsemen, his fellow-servant cried out, You had as good tarry: for we will have you, we will have you: yet notwithstanding he still kept his course till he came to a steep down-hill at the end of the hedge, down which he ran from them, for the horsemen could not follow him without fetching a great compass about. After he had ran almost a mile he got into a wood, but by that time they were just behind him: but night coming on, and it beginning to rain, they pursued him no further. And thus by the providence of God they both got clear.

Not long after this, one of the two cruel Blachendens was murdered by his own servant.

JOHN CORNET.

THIS young man was apprentice to a musician at Colchester, and being sent by his master to a wedding (in the second year of queen Mary), in a town hard by, called Rough-hedge, was requested by a company there of good men (the constables being present), to sing some songs of the scripture: he happened to sing a song, called, News out of London, which tended against the mass, and against the queen's mis-proceedings.

Whereupon the next day he was accused by the parson of Rough-hedge, called Yackfley, and committed, first to the constable, where his master gave him over, and his mother forsook and cursed him. From thence he was sent to Justice Cannall, and then to the earl of Oxford, where he was first put in irons and chains, and after that so manacled, that the blood spirted out of his finger's ends, because he would not confess the names of those who allured him to sing. After that, he was sent again to Rough-hedge, and there whipped till the blood followed, and banished the town for ever.

THOMAS BRYCE.

HE being in the house of John Seal, in the parish of Horting, the bailiff and other neighbours were sent by sir John Baker, to search for, and apprehend him, and though they perfectly knew his stature and the colour of his garments, yet then they had no power to know him, though he stood before their faces. So miraculously did the Almighty dazzle their eyes, that they they asked for him, and looked on him, yet notwithstanding he quietly took his bag of books, and departed out of the house without any hand laid upon him.

Also another time, about the second year of queen Mary, the said Thomas Bryce, with John Bryce, his elder brother, coming then from Wesell, meeting together at their father's house, as they travelled towards London, to give warning to one Springfield there, which else was like to be taken unawares by his enemies waiting for him upon Gad's-hill, fell into company with a promoter, who dogged and followed them again to Gravesend, into the town, and laid the house for them where they were, all the way they should go to the water's side, so that it had not been possible for them to have avoided the present danger of those persecutors, had not God's provident care otherwise disposed for his servants, through the ostler of the inn, who conveyed them under cover by a secret passage; whereby they took barge a mile out of town, and so in the end both the lives of them, and also Springfield, were preserved, through God's gracious protection.

GERTRUDE CROKHAY.

GERTRUDE CROKHAY, dwelling in St. Catherine's, by the Tower of London, and being then in her husband's house, it happened in the year 1556, that the pope's childish Saint Nicholas went about the parish. Which she understanding, shut her door against him, not suffering him to enter into the house.

Then doctor Mallet hearing thereof, and being then master of the said St. Catherine's, the next day came to her with twenty at his tail, thinking belike to affright her, and asked why she would not the night before let in St. Nicholas, and receive his blessing, &c. To whom she answered thus: Sir, I know not that St. Nicholas came hither. Yes, quoth Mallet, here was one that represented St. Nicholas.

Indeed sir, (said she) here was one that was my neighbour's child, but not St. Nicholas: for St. Nicholas is in heaven. I was afraid of them that came with him, to have had my purse cut by them: for I have heard of men robbed by St. Nicholas's clerks, &c. So Mallet perceiving that nothing could be gotten at her hands, went his way as he came, and she for that time escaped.

Then in the year 1557, a little before Whitsuntide, it happened that the said Gertrude answered for a child that was baptized of one Thomas Saunders, which child was christened secretly in a house after the order of the service-book in king Edward's time; and that being soon known to her enemies, she was sought for; who understanding nothing thereof, went beyond the sea into Guelderland, to see certain lands that should come to her children in the right of her first husband, who was a stranger born: and being there about a quarter of a year, at length coming home by Antwerp, she chanced to meet with one John Johnson, a Dutchman, alias John de Villa, of Antwerp, shipper, who seeing her there, went out of malice to the Margrave, and accused her of being an anabaptist, whereby she was taken and carried to prison. The cause why he did thus, was because he claimed of Mr. Crokhay, her husband, a piece of money which was not his due, for a ship that Mr. Crokhay bought of him, and because he could not get it, he wrought this displeasure. Well, she being in prison, lay there a fortnight. In which time she saw some that were prisoners there, who privately were drowned in Rhenish-wine-fats, and after secretly put in sacks and cast into the river. Now she, good woman, expecting to be so served, took thereby such fear, that it brought the beginning of her sickness, of which at length she died.

Then at last was she called before the Margrave, and charged with anabaptistry: which she there utterly denied, and detested the error, declaring before him in Dutch her faith boldly, without any fear. So the Margrave hearing the same, in the end being well pleased with the profession, at the suit of some of her friends delivered her out of prison, but took away her book, and so she came over into England again.

THOMAS ROSE, a Preacher.

HE was a Devonshire man, born in Ermouth, and being made priest in that country, was brought out of it by one Mr. Fabian, to Polsted, in Suffolk, where the said Mr. Fabian was parson, and in a short time after by his means was placed in the town of Hadley, where he, first coming to some knowledge of the gospel, began there to treat upon the creed, and thereupon took occasion to inveigh against purgatory, praying to saints and images, about the time that Mr. Latimer began to preach at Cambridge, in the time of Bilney and Arthur; insomuch that many embracing the truth of Christ's gospel, against the said purgatory and other points, and the number of them daily increasing, the adversaries began to stir against him, insomuch that Mr. Bate (who afterwards became a godly zealous man) was then brought to preach against the said Thomas Rose; notwithstanding this, he continued still very vehemently against images, and the Lord so blessed his labours, that many began to contrive how they might deface and destroy them, and especially four men, whose names were, Ring, Debnam, Marsh, and Gard, who usually resorted to his sermons, by which they were so inflamed, that soon after they ventured to destroy the rood of the court of Dover, which cost three of them their lives, who were hanged in chains, because they would not accuse Thomas Rose as their counsellor. The said Rose had the coat of the rood brought to him afterwards, who burnt it. The rood was said to have done many and great miracles, yet being in the fire, could not help himself, but burned like a block, as indeed it was.

At this time there were two fore enemies in Hadley, Walter Clerk and John Clerk, two brothers: these complained to the council, that an hundred men were not able to fetch Thomas Rose out of Hadley, who then was upon examination of his doctrine committed to the commissaries keeping. And indeed such was the zeal of a number towards the truth then in that town, that they were much offended that their minister was so taken from them, and had therefore by force brought him from the commissary, if certain wise men had not otherwise persuaded them, who at length also with more quiet placed him in his office again: which so enraged the two brothers, Walter Clerk and John Clerk, that they complained to the council, as aforesaid; whereupon a serjeant at arms was sent from the council to arrest Thomas Rose and bring him before them. Then his adversaries laid to his charge, that he was privy to the burning of the rood at Dover court, and upon this he was committed to prison in the bishop of Lincoln's house in Holborn, where he remained from Shrovetide to Whitsuntide, and great part of the time in the stocks.

The stocks was very high and large, so that day and night he lay with his back on the ground, upon a little straw, with his heels so high, that the blood was fallen from his feet, which were so benumbed that he could hardly feel them for a long time. By this treatment he fell sick, and the keeper often hearing him cry and groan through extremity of pain, was moved with pity, and went to the bishop and told him, that he would not keep him to die under his hand, and upon this he had some more ease and liberty. Now at this time his mother was come from Hadley to see him, but she was not suffered to speak with him (such was their cruelty), but the bishop flattered her, and gave her a pair of pardon-beads, and bade her go home and pray, for she might not see him; which thing pierced the hearts both of the mother and the son. At this time also certain men of Hadley, very desirous to see him, endeavoured to speak with him, but might not be suffered, till at length they gave the keeper four shillings, and yet then might not speak to him, or see him, otherwise than through a grate. And thus continued he till Midsummer in prison. Then he was removed to Lambeth, in the first year of Dr. Cranmer's consecration, who used him much more courteously courteously than ever the bishop of Lincoln did, and at length wrought his deliverance, and set him at liberty : but yet so, that he was bound not to come within twenty miles of Hadley. After this he came to London, and there preached the gospel half a year, till Hadley men hearing thereof, laboured to have him to Hadley again, and indeed by means of sir John Rainford, knight, obtained at the archbishop's house to have him thither : however, by means one was placed in the cure at Hadley, he could not enjoy his office again there, but went to Stratford three miles off, and there continued in preaching the word three years, till at length the adversaries procured an inhibition from the bishop of Norwich, to put him to silence. But a great number laboured to have him continue in preaching, and subscribed a supplication to the archbishop, with one hundred and twenty hands, who under their seals also testified of his honest demeanour, so that the adversaries this way not prevailing, they indicted him at Bury, in Suffolk, so that he was constrained to flee to London, and to use the aid of the lord Audley, then lord chancellor, who removed the matter from them, and called it before him, and after examination of the matter, set him free, and sent him by a token to the lord Cromwell, then lord privy seal, for a licence from the king to preach : which being obtained by the lord Cromwell's means (who hereupon also had admitted the said Thomas Rose his chaplain), forthwith he was sent into Lincolnshire and to York. In the mean time such complaint was made to the duke of Norfolk, for that he preached against auricular confession, transubstantiation, and such other points contained in the six articles (which then to have done, by law was death), that the duke in his own person not only sought him at Norwich, but also beset all the ports for him, from Yarmouth to London ; and being lieutenant, commanded, that whosoever could take the said Thomas Rose, should hang him on the next tree. However, the said Thomas Rose at his coming home, having warning thereof by certain godly persons, was conveyed away and passed over to Flanders, and so to Zurich in Switzerland, where a time he remained with Mr. Bullinger, and afterwards went to Basil, and there hosted with Master Grinæus, till letters came that Master doctor Barnes should be bishop of Norwich, and things should be reformed and restored. But when he came to England again, it was not so, and therefore forthwith fled again beyond the seas, being so beset, as if the mighty providence of God had not sent him in readiness to receive him the self same man, boat, and boy that before carried him over, it had been impossible for him to have escaped. But such was the goodness of God towards him, that he safely was conveyed, and lived at Barrow the space of three years, till at length purposing to come over into England, about business that he had, he, his wife, and their child, being but a year and three quarters old, upon the sea, the ship being in great danger, wherein they sailed (for the mast being cut away in that peril, they were carried whithersoever the waves tossed them), they with divers others expected nothing but death. However, at length they were taken prisoners, and carried into Dieppe in France, having all their stuff taken from them, and forty pounds in money. There they remained prisoners from Michaelmas till Allhallowtide, in great heaviness, not knowing what would become of them, but depending only upon God's providence. It pleased God at the same time, that one Mr. Young, of the town of Rye (who had heard him preach before), came thither for the redeeming of certain Englishmen there taken prisoners. This Mr. Young moved to see them in this case, much pitied them, and comforted them, and told them he would pay their ransom, and so he did, had them away, and brought them to Rye, and from thence by stealth they came to London. At length the honourable earl of Suffex, hearing of the said Thomas Rose, sent for him, his wife, and his child, and had them to his house at Attleborough, where they continued, till at length it was blazoned abroad, that the earl was a maintainer of such a man to read in his house, as had preached against the catholic faith (as they term it) ; the earl being at the parliament, and hearing thereof, wrote a letter to warn him to make shift for himself, and to escape. So that from thence he passed to London, making hard shift for a year there and somewhat more, till the death of king Henry. After the king's death, he and others, who in the king's general pardon were excepted (and therefore dead men, if they had been taken whilst king Henry lived), by certain of the council were set at liberty, and after king Edward was crowned, were licensed to preach again by the king, who gave unto the said Thomas Rose the benefice of West-Ham, by London. But at the death of that virtuous and noble prince, he was deprived of all, and so should also have been of his life, had not God appointed him friends, who received him in London secretly, as their teacher in the congregation, among whom for the poor prisoners at their assemblies forty-one in a night oftentimes were gathered. And thus he continued amongst them, and with the lady Vane almost a year in the reign of queen Mary. But although he oftentimes escaped secretly whilst he read to the godly in sundry places of London, yet at length through a Judas that betrayed them, he with 35 more were taken in Bow-church yard, at a sheerman's house on New-years day at night. The rest being committed to prison, the said Thomas Rose was had to Stephen Gardiner, the bishop of Winchester, who would not speak with him that night, but committed him to the Clink, till the Tuesday after.

Rose. I Wonder, my lord, that I should be thus troubled for that which by the word of God hath been established, and by the laws of this realm hath been allowed, and by your own writing so notably in your book De vera obedientia, confirmed.

Bishop. Ah sirrah, hast thou gotten that ?

Rose. Yea, my lord, I thank God, and do confess myself much thereby confirmed. For as touching the doctrine of supremacy, against the bishop of Rome's authority, no man hath said further. And as I remember, you confess it, that when this truth was revealed unto you, you thought the scales to fall from your eyes.

Bishop. Thou liest like a varlet, there is no such thing in my book : but I shall handle thee, and such as thou art, well enough. I have long looked for thee, and at length have caught thee. I will know who are thy maintainers, or else I will make thee a foot longer.

Rose. My lord, you shall do as much as pleaseth God, and no more, yet the law is in your hand ; but I have God for my maintainer, and none other. At these words one of the servants stepped forth, and said, My lord, I heard this man preach by Norwich, in sir John Robster's house, and in his prayer he desired God to turn queen Mary's heart, or else to take her out of the world : and this was in king Edward's time.

Rose. My lord, I made no such prayer, but next after the king, I mentioned her in this manner, saying, Ye shall pray for my lady Mary's grace, that God will vouchsafe to endue her with his Spirit, that she graciously may perceive the mysteries contained within his holy laws, and so render unto him her heart purified with true faith, and true and loyal obedience to her sovereign lord and king, to the good example of the inferior subjects. And this, my lord, is already answered in mine own hand-writing to the council.

Unto this he said little, but turning his face to some that were by him, This is he, said the bishop, that my lord of Norwich told me had gotten his maid with child.

Rose. This is no heresy, my lord, although it be a lie. Indeed certain wicked persons raised this report of me, for the hatred they bare to the doctrine which I preached : but for purgation of myself herein I had no less than six of the council's hands, that there might be due and diligent examination of this matter in the country, by men of worship appointed for that purpose, who can all testify, I thank God, that I am most clear from such wickedness, and indeed they have cleared me from it; and therefore I doubt not but all good men will see the mischievous device of mine adversaries, who, when other means failed, by such sinister means, went about to draw me into discredit and hatred: but God, who is the helper of the innocent, and searcher of men's hearts, hath and doth defend me, and hath laid open things that were hid, to their shame. One of the chief reporters of this, that I should so abuse myself, was one Mr. Clark, servant, and in some estimation with the old lord treasurer of England, reputed and taken for a conjuror, who afterwards hanged himself in the Tower. Then the bishop commanded that I should be carried to the Tower and kept safely; where I lay till the week before Whitsuntide. After which time I was twice called, when the bishop came to the Tower about other prisoners. Notwithstanding, the bishop had no great talk with me, but spake friendly. One sir Richard Southwell, knight, however, still accused me for my prayer, and said I did put a difference betwixt lady Mary and lady Elizabeth, for that I prayed in king Edward's faith, and prayed that he would confirm lady Elizabeth in that which was well begun upon her. Upon this the bishop said little. But in the week before pentecost, I was conveyed from the Tower to Norwich, there to be examined by the bishop and his clergy, as concerning my faith, the manner whereof here followeth.

The Second Examination of THOMAS ROSE, before Dr. HOPKINS, Bishop of Norwich, in the Presence of Sir W. WOODHOUSE, Mr. STEWARD the Chancellor, Dr. BARRET, with divers others 1553.

AFTER I was presented by my keeper, the bishop immediately asked me what I was. I told him I had been a minister.

Bishop. What is this to the purpose? Were you a friar or a priest?

Rose. Friar was I never, but a priest have I been, and beneficed by the king's majesty.

Bishop. Where were you made priest?

Rose. In Exeter, in the county where I was born. Then the bishop required of me my letters of orders. I told him I knew not where they were, for they were things of me not greatly regarded.

Bishop. Well, you are sent to me to be examined; what say you, will you submit yourself to the order of the church of England.

Rose. My lord, I trust I am not out of the order of Christ's church in England, neither do I know myself an offender thereagainst.

Bishop. What? yes, you have here preached most damnable and devilish doctrine.

Rose. Not so, my lord. The doctrine by me here preached was both true, sincere, and holy. But, indeed, the doctrine that is now set forth is most wicked and damnable, yea, and that both against God's laws and men's. But as for the doctrine by me preached, it is grounded upon the word of God, set out also by the authority of two most mighty kings, with the consent of all the nobility and clergy of the same: so that I preached nothing but their lawful proceedings, having their lawful authority under their broad seal for confirmation of the same, for which my doing you cannot justly charge me. And since the law ceased, I have kept silence; so that the council which sent me unto you, have not charged me therewith. Wherefore you do me open wrong to burthen me with that wherein I am free.

Chan. What, sir? you are very captious; answerest thou my lord after such a sort?

Rose. Sir, I answer for myself, and according to the truth; wherewith ye ought not to be offended, if ye be of God.

Chan. Thou art an evil man. Wast thou not abused before now?

Rose. No, you untruly report me, and are in no wise able to prove that which you have spoken: so that your words appear to proceed altogether of malice, which I have not deserved at your hands. But in this I well perceive you are made an instrument to utter other men's malice conceived of old.

Chan. What sayest thou to the real presence in the sacrament?

Rose. I know right well you are made an instrument to seek innocent blood: well, you may have it, if God permit, it is present at hand, for I am not come hither to lye, but to die (if God see it good) in defence of that which I have said. Wherefore you may begin when you shall think good, for I have said nothing but the truth, and that which, in those days, was by all men allowed for truth, and against which you at that time durst not once whisper, although you now brag ever so much.

Bishop. Well, father Rose, whatsoever hath been done in times past, shall not now be called in question, so that you now submit yourself: for not only you, but all the whole realm, hath been out of the right way, both high and low, spiritual and temporal; but all notwithstanding have submitted themselves, and acknowledged their faith. Wherefore if you will be accounted for an Englishman, you must likewise submit yourself.

Rose. My lord, I am an Englishman born, and do most humbly require of the christian congregation of England, to be counted as a particular member of the same, and with all due reverence submit myself as in the form and manner following: That whatsoever law or laws shall be set forth in the same for the establishment of Christ's true religion, and that, according to the faith and doctrine of the holy patriarchs and prophets, Jesus Christ and his holy apostles, with the faithful fathers of Christ's primitive church, I do not only hold it, and believe it, but also most reverently obey it. At which my assertion, the bishop seemed to be greatly rejoiced, and said, Well, then we shall soon be at a point: but you shall take this for no day of examination, but rather of communication, so that you shall now depart, and consider with yourself until we call for you again: and so ended our first meeting.

The Third Examination of THOMAS ROSE.

ON Friday following, I was called again into Christchurch within their lady's chapel, as they termed it, where was gathered a great part of the whole city of Norwich, and after I was presented by my keeper, the bishop began with a great protestation, and after many words, demanded of me, whether I would submit myself or no. I answered as before I had done, that, according to my former protestation, I would most gladly obey. Then said the chancellor, (to utter his gentleness) I think you do but feign.

Rose. The fault then, said I, shall be in yourself, and not in me: for if you burden me with nothing but scriptures, and the fathers of Christ's primitive church, then, as I said before, so I say again, I shall most gladly obey.

Chan. Well then, seeing you challenge to be member of the church of England, your mother here, for a trial of obedience, provoketh you, as mothers are wont to allure you, to receive this little gift at her hand.

Rose. Forsooth, said I, if she offer it me, as received of God my father, I shall gladly receive it, as from the hand of my very true and spiritual mother.

Chan. What say you to ear-confession? Is it not a law ecclesiastical and necessary for the church of England?

Rose. Some ways it might be permitted, and some ways not, and that because it had not its original of God and his blessed word; and yet I deny not, but that a man, being troubled in his conscience, and resorting to a discreet, sober, and christian learned man, for the quieting of his mind, might well be permitted: but to bind a man, under pain of damnation, once every year, to number his sins into the ears of a filthy, lecherous priest, is not of God, neither can be proved by his word.

Bishop.

Bishop. Ah, firrah; you will admit nothing but scripture, I see well.

Rose. No truly, my lord, I admit nothing but scripture for the rule of the soul: for why? faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God; and where the word of God is not, there ought no belief to be given: for whatsoever is not of faith is sin. And here they left off speaking any more of that matter.

Mr. Chancellor then began to whet his teeth at me, saying, Yea, but you have preached, that the real, natural, and substantial presence of Christ is not in the sacrament. What say you to that?

Rose. Verily, I say that you are a bloody man, and seek to quench your thirst in the blood of an innocent, and therefore, to satisfy you in that behalf, I say verily unto you, that so I have here preached: although, contrary to law you challenge me with the same, yet will I in no wise deny it, though justly I might do it, but stand thereunto, even to seal it with my blood, desiring all that are here present to testify the same, and believe it as the only truth.

Bishop. I charge you all to believe it not.

Rose. Yea, but my lord, if you will needs have credence given you, you must bring God's word to maintain your sayings.

Bishop. Why, doth not Christ say, This is my body? And can there be any plainer words spoken?

Rose. It is true, my lord, the words are as plain as can be; and even so are these, where it is said, I am a door, a vine, and Christ called a stone, a lion, and yet is he naturally none of these: for they are all figurative speeches, as both the scriptures and fathers do sufficiently prove.

At which saying, the bishop would have had me stay, saying I should have another day wherein I might take better advice.

Rose. Not so, my lord, for I am at a full point with myself in that matter, and am right well able to prove both your transubstantiation, with the real presence, to be against the scriptures and the ancient fathers of the primitive church: for Justin, who is one of the most ancient writers that ever wrote upon the sacrament, writeth in his second apology, that the bread, water, and wine in the sacrament, are not to be taken as other meats and drinks, but are meats purposely obtained to give thanks unto God, and therefore are called Eucharistia, and also have the names of the body and blood of Christ; and that it is not lawful for any man to eat or drink of them, but such as profess the religion of Christ, and live also according to their profession: and yet, saith he, the same bread and drink is changed into our flesh and blood, and nourisheth our bodies. By which saying, it is evident that Justin meant, that the bread and wine remain still, or else they could not have turned into our flesh and blood, and nourish our bodies.

At which my saying they were greatly troubled, but enforced themselves to have denied the doctor, and would suffer me to speak no more, but straitway was I carried away unto my lodging: and so ended the second day of mine appearance, which was the Friday in Whitsun week, and then was I appointed to appear again on the Monday following. However, upon what occasion I know not, it was deferred unto Wednesday.

In the mean time, the bishop sent two of his chaplains to me, with whom I had communications about the real presence. After long reasoning concerning this point, at length I drove them to this issue; whether they did confess that Christ in the self-same body which was conceived of the virgin Mary, and wherein he suffered and rose again, do in the self-same body naturally, substantially, and really sit at the right-hand of God the Father, without return from thence, until the day of the general judgment, or not? Whereunto they answered Yes, truly, we confess it, hold it, and believe it. Then I again demanded of them, whether they did affirm after the words pronounced by the minister, there to remain flesh, blood, bones, hairs, nails, as is wont most grossly to be preached, or not? And they with great deliberation answered, that they did not only abhor the teaching of such gross doctrine, but also would detest themselves, if they should so think.

At which two principal points, wherein they fully confirmed my doctrine which I ever taught, I was not a little comforted and rejoiced, but marvellously encouraged. Whereupon I demanded of them again, what manner of body they then affirmed it to be in the sacrament? Forsooth, said they, not a visible, palpable, or circumscribable body, for that is always at the Father's right hand; but in the sacrament it is invisible, and can neither be felt, seen, nor occupy any place, but is there by the omnipotency of God's holy word, they know not how.

And for this they brought in St. Augustine, although by them not truly understood, yet they would admit no other sense than their own, but would take upon them to confirm it with Martin Luther, Melancthon, Bucer, and Calvin: so that I, perceiving their obstinacy in that behalf, gave them over for that time, and afterwards talked with Dr. Barret, whom I also found of the same opinion. For, said he, if you would dissent from the fathers of the primitive church, of which St. Augustine is one, you shall be contented to die out of the favour of God. Well, I gave them over, being obstinate in their errors; however, to bring them to confess that openly which they had granted privately, I granted them according to the scriptures, and my former protestation, a presence, although not as they supposed.

After all this, the honourable earl of Suffex came to me, and that gentle knight sir William Woodhouse, with great persuasions: to whom, after long talk, I said, That I would do all that I might, saving my conscience, which I would in no wise pollute: and neither have I, as knoweth God, by whom all men must be judged.

The Last Examination of THOMAS ROSE before the Bishop.

NOW to come to my last appearance, the bishop forthwith demanded of me, whether I were resolved as he had heard say. To whom I answered, that as I always had said before, even so I was now. Then by low bowing my knee, I gave him my due reverence, and the rather for that the honourable earl of Suffex was there. At this some who would be counted great gospellers, were (contrary to all christianity) sore offended. I then said, that whatsoever laws were set forth for the establishment of Christ's true religion, and that according to the doctrine of Christ's holy apostles, and the faithful fathers of the primitive church, I did not only obey them, but most earnestly embrace and believe them. Yea, and yet to the further blinding of their eyes, I said, that if any thing could justly be proved by God's holy word, by me heretofore preached or taught untruly, either for lack of learning, unwarily, or through ignorance, yet by better knowledge, when it shall justly be tried and examined by the same, I shall not refuse (the thing perfectly proved) to revoke the same, provided always the word of God herein be my judge.

All this spake I (as God knoweth) to keep them from suspecting that which I went about, and that they should have no occasion to judge me of obstinacy. Then said I, moreover, all you must of force confess, that the doctrine by me heretofore preached, had, besides the authority of God's eternal verity, the authority of two most noble and mighty princes, with the advice and counsel of all the nobility and clergy of the land, and that with great deliberation from time to time, with open disputations in both the universities, enacted also by parliament with the consent of the whole body and commons of the same, and that without any resistance or gainsaying established, as a religion most pure and perfect, most earnestly and sincerely preached by the principal bishops and doctors, and that before the king's majesty's person; and I, as one who was called to that office, did the like with all the rest, and in the zeal of God, and with a pure conscience, did set forth the same, as the only and absolute truth of God, and the just and most true proceedings of my sovereign lord and king: and I had then my head where it now standeth, betwixt mine ears, altogether applying the same, to apprehend with all diligence that which then was established and taught, as the only and absolute truth, and a thing unto me most desirable, and well willing, without any desire to hear the contrary, till now, through this my captivity; I am compelled to hear the contrary part speak, who are even here present, and whom my lord sent unto me.

After several long private disputations had happened betwixt us, at length I have heard of them a contrary doctrine, which I never before had heard, and therefore must confess mine own ignorance in the same: for, quoth I, after I had inforced these men here present (meaning the bishop's two chaplains) to confess Jesus Christ's natural body, with his full complete members, in due order and proportion of a perfect man's body; to be present at the right hand of God the Father, and that without return from thence, until the last judgment, and also that after the words pronounced by the priest, there remaineth no such gross presence of flesh, blood, bones, hair, and nails, as was wont to be preached; but that after I had demanded of them what manner of body they affirmed to be present, they said, a body invisible by the omnipotency of God's word, which neither can be felt or seen, nor that hath any distinction of members, but such a body as occupieth no place, but is there they know not how; necessity compelled me to confess my ignorance in that behalf, although in very deed they perceived not my meaning therein, neither was it in my thought they should do so: for by this their confession, and my silence afterward, I perceived their horrid blasphemies.

And methought in this I had well discharged at that time my conscience, in causing them, in open audience, to confess the same, and so I granted a presence, but not as they supposed: for I only said, that Christ, after the words pronounced, is present in the lawful use and right distribution of his holy supper; which thing I never denied, or any godly man that ever I heard of. For, said I, Eusebius Emiffenus, a man of singular fame and learning, about three hundred years after Christ's ascension, saith, that the conversion of the visible creatures of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, is like unto our conversion in baptism, where nothing is outwardly changed, but all the change is inwardly, by the mighty working of the Holy Ghost, which fashioneth and frameth Christ in the heart and mind of man, as by the example of Peter preaching to the people, Acts ii. by which he so pierced their conscience, that they openly, with most earnest repentance, confessed their sins, saying, "Men and brethren, what shall we do? Repent and be baptized every one of you," said Peter, "in the name of Jesus Christ;" so that at this sermon there were turned unto Christ three thousand persons; in whom Christ was so fashioned and formed, as that he dwelt in every one of them, and they in him; and after the like manner, said I, is Christ present in the lawful use and right distribution of his holy supper, and not otherwise. For although I said, according to the truth, that Christ dwelt in every one of these persons rehearsed, yet meant I not that he in them should have a gross, carnal, or fleshly dwelling.

And no more meant I (as God knoweth) him carnally or grossly to be in the sacrament, but according to the scriptures, and my former protestation, that is, to the spiritual nourishment of all such as worthily come unto that holy supper, receiving it according to his holy institution.

And thus I ended; which the papists most maliciously and slanderously named a recantation; which I never meant nor thought, as God knoweth.

Now after I had thus concluded my speech, the bishop taking me by the hand, said, Father Rose, you may be a worthy instrument in God's church, and we will see to you at our coming home (for he was about to take his journey in visitation of his diocese), and they feared much at this very time, lest queen Mary should have miscarried in her child-travail, which was looked for, being then accounted very great with child, so that they were not so fierce as they had been, and were apprehensive of some stir, if I should have suffered; and therefore were glad to be rid of me, so that by any colourable means for their own discharge it might be; and the night following I was only committed to mine own lodging.

On the morrow, when the bishop was ready to ride forth in visitation, he called me before him, and perceiving that sir William Woodhouse did bear me great favour, said, he was sorry for me and my expences, and therefore wished that I was somewhere where I might spend no more money till his return. Why, my lord, said sir William Woodhouse, he shall have meat and drink, and lodging with me, till you return again, seeing you now break up house; and hereupon I went home with sir William, that good knight, who most genteely entertained me, and I had great liberty. Upon this the popish priests of the college of Christ's church in Norwich, because they saw me at liberty in sir William's absence, who had been from home a fortnight, blazed it abroad that sir William was bound for me in body and lands. At his coming home, therefore, I asking sir William if he were so bound for me, he denied it. Then, said I, sir, but for the reverence I bear to you, I might have been an hundred miles from you before this. I now trust, sir, as you are not bound for me, I may go and visit my friends. Go where you will, said sir William; for I told the bishop I would not be your gaoler, but promised only meat, drink, and lodging for you. Shortly after, by the advice of some friends, I was secretly conveyed to a friend's house, where I was closely kept for near a month, until rumours were over: for at the bishop's return, search was made for me in all houses where it was known I had been acquainted, and in the ships at Yarmouth.

At length the bishop sent to a conjuror, to know of him which way I was gone; and he answered, that I was gone over water, and in keeping of a woman. And in very deed I was passed over a small water, and was hid by a blessed woman, who lived in a small cottage, the space of three weeks, till the inquiries had nearly subsided.

I was then conveyed to London, and from thence passed over the seas, where I lived till the death of queen Mary, and till it pleased God, for the comfort of his church, and restoring of all poor exiles and prisoners, for his name's sake, to bless this realm with the government of our noble queen, whom God, to the glory of his own name, and the defence of his church, according to his good will and pleasure, long preserve and continue over us.

A Brief Discourse concerning the Troubles and happy Deliverance of Dr. SANDS, first Bishop of Worcester, next of London, afterwards Archbishop of York.

AT king Edward's death, the duke of Northumberland came down to Cambridge with an army of men, having commission to proclaim lady Jane queen, and by power to suppress lady Mary, who took upon her that dignity, and was proclaimed queen in Norfolk. The duke sent for Dr. Sands, the vice-chancellor, Dr. Parker, Dr. Bill, and Mr. Leaver, to sup with him. Amongst other speeches, he said to them, Masters, pray for us, that we speed well: if not, you shall be made bishops, and we deacons. And even so it came to pass: Dr. Parker and Dr. Sands were made bishops, and he and sir John Gates, who was then at the table, were made deacons not long after, on Tower-hill. Dr. Sands being vice-chancellor, was required to preach on the morrow. The warning was short for such an auditory, and to speak of such a matter; yet he refused not the thing, but went into his chamber, and so to bed. He rose at three o'clock in the morning, took his bible in his hand, and after he had prayed a considerable time, he shut his eyes, and holding his bible before him, earnestly earnestly prayed to God that it might fall open where a most fit text should be for him to treat of. The Bible, as God would have it, fell open upon the first chapter of Joshua, the three last verses, where he found so convenient a place of scripture for that time, that the like he could not find in the whole Bible. His text was thus: "And they answered Joshua, saying, All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us, we will go. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee: only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses. Whosoever he be that doth rebel against thy commandment, and will not hearken unto thy word, in all that thou commandest him, he shall be put to death: only be strong, and of a good courage."

Whoever shall consider what was concluded by such as called themselves the state, and likewise the auditory, the time, and other circumstances, may easily see that this text most fitly served for the purpose. And as God gave the text, so gave he such order and utterance, as drew tears from the eyes of the greatest of them.

In the time of his sermon, one of the guard lifted a mass-book and a grail up to him in the pulpit, which Sir George Haward, with certain of the guard, had taken that night in Mr. Hurlestone's house, where lady Mary had been a little before, and there had mass. The duke, with the rest of the nobility, required Dr. Sands to put his sermon in writing, and appointed Mr. Leaver to go to London with it, and to put it in print. Dr. Sands required one day and a half for writing of it. At the time appointed he had made it ready, and Mr. Leaver was ready booted to receive it at his hands, and carry it to London. As he was delivering of it, one of the beadles, named Adams, came weeping to him, and prayed him to shift for himself, for the duke was retired, and queen Mary proclaimed.

Dr. Sands was not troubled thereat; but gave the sermon written to Mr. Layfield. Mr. Leaver departed home, and he went to dinner to one Mr. More's, a beadle, his great friend. At the dinner, Mrs. More seeing him merry and pleasant (for he had ever a man's courage, and could not be terrified), drank unto him, saying, Master Vice-chancellor, I drink unto you, for this is the last time that I shall see you. And so it was; for she was dead before Dr. Sands returned out of Germany. The duke that night retired to Cambridge, and sent for Dr. Sands to go with him to the marketplace to proclaim queen Mary. The duke cast up his cap with others; but tears ran down his cheeks for grief. He told Dr. Sands, that queen Mary was a merciful woman, and that he doubted not thereof; declaring that he had sent unto her to know her pleasure, and looked for a general pardon. Dr. Sands answered, My life is not dear unto me, neither have I done or said any thing that urgeth my conscience. For that which I spake of the state, I have instructions warranted by the subscription of sixteen counsellors, neither can speech be treason; neither yet have I spoken further than the word of God, and the laws of the realm do warrant me, come of me what God will. But be you assured, you shall never escape death, for if she should save you, those that now shall rule will kill you.

That night the guard apprehended the duke; and certain grooms of the stable were as busy with Dr. Sands, as if they would take a prisoner. But Sir John Gates, who lay then in Dr. Sands's house, sharply rebuked them, and drove them away. Dr. Sands, by the advice of Sir John Gates, walked in the fields. In the mean time, the university, contrary to all order, had met together in consultation, and ordered that Dr. Mousc and Dr. Hatcher should repair to Dr. Sands's lodging, and bring away the statute-book of the university, the keys, and such other things as were in his keeping; and so they did: for Dr. Mousc being an earnest protestant the day before, and whom Dr. Sands had done much for, was now become a papist, and his great enemy. Certain of the university had appointed a congregation at afternoon. As the bell rang to it, Dr. Sands came out of the fields, and sending for the beadles, asked what the matter meant, and required them to wait upon him to the schools, according to their duty. So they did. And as soon as Dr. Sands, the beadles going before him, came into the regent house and took his chair, one Mr. Mitch, with a rabble of unlearned papists, went into a bye-school, and conspired together to pull him out of his chair, and to use violence unto him. Dr. Sands began his oration, expostulating with the university, charging them with great ingratitude, declaring, that he had said nothing in his sermon, but what he was ready to justify, and their case was all one with him: for they had not only concealed, but consented to that which he had spoken.

And thus while he remembered them how beneficial he had been to the university, and their unthankfulness to him again, in came Mr. Mitch with his conspirators, about twenty in number. One laid hands on the chair to pull it from him; another called him traitor. Whereat he perceiving how they used violence, and being of great courage, groped to his dagger, and had dispatched some of them as God's enemies, if Dr. Bill and Dr. Blith had not fallen upon him, and prayed for God's sake to hold his hands and be quiet, and patiently to bear that great offered wrong. He was persuaded by them, and after that tumult was ceased, he ended his oration; and having some money of the university's in his hands, he there delivered the same every farthing. He gave up the books, reckonings, and keys pertaining to the university, and withal yielded up his office, praying God to give the university a better officer, and to give them better and more thankful hearts, and so repaired home to his own college.

On the morrow after there came unto him one Mr. Gerningham, and Mr. Thomas Mildmay. Gerningham told him, that it was the queen's pleasure, that two of the guard should attend upon him, and that he must be carried prisoner to the Tower of London, with the duke. Mr. Mildmay said, he marvelled that a learned man would speak so unadvisedly against so good a prince, and wilfully run into such danger. Dr. Sands answered, I shall not be ashamed of bonds, but if I could do as Mr. Mildmay can, I needed not to fear bonds: for he came down in payment against queen Mary, and armed in the field, and now he returned in payment for queen Mary; before a traitor, and now a great friend; I cannot with one mouth blow hot and cold after this manner.

Upon this his stable was robbed of four very good geldings, the best of them Mr. Huddleston took for his own saddle, and rode on him to London in his sight. An inventory was taken of all his goods by Mr. More, beadle for the university. He was set upon a lame horse that halted to the ground; which thing a friend of his perceiving, prayed that he might lend him a nag. The yeomen of the guard were contented. As he departed forth at the town's end, some papists resorted thither to jeer at him, and some of his friends to mourn for him. He came in the rank to London, the people being full of out-cries. And as he came in at Bishopsgate, one like a milk-woman hurled a stone at him, and hit him on the breast, with such a blow, that he was like to fall off his horse. To whom he mildly said, Woman, God forgive thee. Truth is, that that journey one evil intreating so mortified him, that he was more ready to die than to live.

As he came through Tower-hill-street, one woman standing at her door, cried, Fie on thee, thou knave, thou knave, thou traitor, thou heretic. Whereat he smiled. Look, the desperate heretic, said she, laughed at this jeer. A woman on the other side of the street answered, saying, Fie on thee, neighbour, thou art not worthy to be called a woman, railing upon this gentleman whom thou knowest not, nor the cause why he is thus treated. Then she said, Good gentleman, God be thy comfort, and give thee strength to stand in God's cause, even to the end. And thus he passed through rough and smooth to the Tower, the first prisoner that entered in that day, which was St. James's day. The yeomen of the guard took from him his borrowed nag, and what else soever he had. His man, one Quinting Suainton, brought after him a Bible, and some shirts, and such like things. The Bible was sent in to him, but the shirts and such like served the yeomen of the guard.

After he had been in the Tower three weeks in a bad prison, he was brought up into Nun's-Bower, a better prison, where was put along with him Mr. John Bradford.

At the day of queen Mary's coronation their prison door was set open, ever shut before. One Mr. Mitchell, his old acquaintance, who had been prisoner before in the same place, came in to him, and said, Master Sands, there is such a stir in the Tower, that neither gates, doors, nor prisoners are looked to this day. Take my cloak, my hat, and my rapier, and get you gone, you may go out of the gates without questioning, save yourself, and let me do as well as I can. A rare friendship; but he refused the offer, saying, I know no cause why I should be in prison. And to do thus were to make myself guilty. I will expect God's good will, yet must I think myself much obliged to you: and so Mr. Mitchell departed.

While Dr. Sands and Mr. Bradford were thus in close prison twenty-nine weeks, one John Bowler was their keeper, a very perverse papist, yet by often persuading of him, for he would give ear, and by gentle using of him, at length he began to dislike popery, and to favour the gospel, and was so persuaded in true religion, that on a Sunday when they had mass in the chapel, he brought up a service book, a manchet, and a glass of wine, and there Dr. Sands ministered the communion to Bradford and to Bowler. Thus Bowler was their son begotten in bonds. When Wyatt was in arms, and the old Duke of Norfolk sent forth with a number of men to apprehend him; that room might be made in the Tower for him and other his accomplices, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Bradford, were cast into one prison, and Dr. Sands with nine other preachers were sent unto the Marshalsea.

The keeper of the Marshalsea appointed to every preacher a man to lead him in the street; he caused them to go far before, and he and Dr. Sands came behind, whom he would not lead, but walked familiarly with him. Yet Dr. Sands was known, and the people every where prayed God to comfort him, and to strengthen him in the truth. By that time the people's minds were altered, popery began to be unfavoury. After they passed the bridge, the keeper said to Dr. Sands, I perceive the vain people would set you forward to the fire. You are vain as they, if you being a young man will stand in your own conceit, and prefer your own judgment before that of so many worthy prelates, ancient, learned, and grave men as be in this realm. If you so do, you shall find me a severe keeper, as one that utterly dislikes your religion. Dr. Sands answered, I know my years to be young, and my learning but small, it is enough to know Christ crucified, and he hath learned nothing who seeth not the great blasphemy that is in popery. I will yield unto God, and not unto man: I have read in the scriptures of many godly and courteous keepers: God may make you one; if not, I trust he will give me strength and patience to bear your hard usage. Then said the keeper, Are you resolved to stand to your religion? Yes, quoth the doctor, by God's grace. Truly, said the keeper, I love you the better for it; I did but tempt you: what favour I can shew you, you shall be sure of; and I shall think myself happy if I might die at the stake with you. He was as good as his word, for he trusted the doctor to walk in the fields alone, where he met with Mr. Bradford, who was also a prisoner in the King's-Bench, and had found the same favour from his keeper: he laid him in the best chamber in the house; he would not suffer the knight-marshal's men to lay fetters on him, as others had. And, at his request, he put Mr. Sanders in along with him, to be his bed-fellow, and sundry times after he suffered his wife, who was Mr. Sands's daughter of Essex, a gentlewoman beautiful both in body and soul, to resort to him. There was great resort to Dr. Sands; and Mr. Sanders; they had much money offered them, but they would receive none. They had the communion there three or four times, and a great many communicants. Dr. Sands gave such exhortation to the people, (for at that time being young, he was thought very eloquent) that he moved many tears, and made the people abhor the mass, and defy all popery.

When Wyatt with his army came into Southwark, he sent two gentlemen into the Marshalsea, to Dr. Sands, saying, that Mr. Wyatt would be glad of his company and advice, and that the gates should be set open for all the prisoners. He answered, Tell Mr. Wyatt, if this his rising be of God, it will take place; if not, it will fall. For my part, I was committed here by order, I will be discharged by like order, or I will never depart hence. So answered Mr. Sanders, and the rest of the preachers, being there prisoners.

After that Dr. Sands had been nine weeks prisoner in the Marshalsea, by the mediation of sir Thomas Holcroft, knight marshal, he was set at liberty; sir Thomas sued earnestly to the bishop of Winchester, Dr. Gardiner, for his deliverance, after many repulses: but he could not prevail, except Dr. Sands would be of their sect, and then he could want nothing. He wrung out of him at last, that if the queen would grant him his deliverance, he would not be against it; for that was sir Thomas's last request. In the mean time he had procured two ladies of the privy chamber to move the queen in it; who was contented if the bishop of Winchester would like it. The next time that the bishop went into the privy chamber to speak with the queen, Mr. Holcroft followed, and had his warrant for Dr. Sands's remission ready, and prayed the two ladies, when the bishop should take his leave, to put the queen in mind of Dr. Sands. So they did, and the queen said, Winchester, what think you of Dr. Sands, is he not sufficiently punished? As it please your majesty, saith Winchester. That he spake, remembering his former promise to Mr. Holcroft, that he would not be against Dr. Sands, if the queen should like to discharge him. Saith the queen, Then truly, we would that he were set at liberty. Immediately Mr. Holcroft offered the queen the warrant, who subscribed the same, and called Winchester to put to his hand, and so he did. The warrant was given to the knight marshal again, by sir Thomas Holcroft. As the bishop went forth of the privy chamber door, he called Mr. Holcroft to him, commanding him not to set Dr. Sands at liberty, until he had taken sureties of two gentlemen of this country with him, each one bound in 500l. that Dr. Sands should not depart out of the realm without licence. Mr. Holcroft immediately after met with two gentlemen of the North, friends, and cousins to Dr. Sands, who offered to be bound in body, goods, and lands for him. After dinner, the same day, Mr. Holcroft sent for Dr. Sands to his lodging at Westminster, requiring the keeper to accompany him. He came accordingly, finding Mr. Holcroft alone walking in the garden. Mr. Holcroft imparted his long suit, with the whole proceeding, and what effect it had taken, to Dr. Sands; much rejoicing that it was his good hap to do him good, and to procure his liberty, and that nothing remained, but that he would enter into bonds with his two sureties, for not departing out of the realm. Dr. Sands answered, I give God thanks, who hath moved your heart to mind me so well, and I think myself most bound unto you. God shall requite, and I shall never be found unthankful. But as you have dealt friendly with me, I will also deal plainly with you. I came a freeman into prison; I will not go forth a bondman. As I cannot benefit my friends, so I will not hurt them. And if I be set at liberty, I will not tarry six days in this realm, if I may get out. If therefore I may not get free forth, send me to the Marshalsea again, and there you shall be sure of me.

This answer Mr. Holcroft much disliked: he told Dr. Sands that the time would not long continue, a change would shortly come, the state was but a cloud, and would soon shake away. And that his cousin sir Edward Bray would gladly receive him and his wife into his his house, where he should never need to go to church, and the lady Bray was a zealous gentlewoman, who hated popery. Adding, that he would not so deal with him to lose all his labour. When Dr. Sands could not be removed from his former saying, Mr. Holcroft said, Seeing you cannot be altered, I will change my purpose and yield unto you. Come of it what will, I will set you at liberty: and seeing you have a mind to go over sea, get you gone as quick as you can. One thing I require of you, that while you are there, you write nothing to me hither, for so you may undo me. He friendly kissed Dr. Sands, bade him farewell, and commanded the keeper to take no fees of him, saying, Let me answer Winchester as I may. Dr. Sands returning with the keeper to the Marshalsea, tarried all night, and on the morrow he gave a dinner to all the prisoners, to which he invited his bed-fellow, and sworn stake-fellow, if it had so pleased God. When he took his leave, he said, Mr. Sanders, farewell, with many tears and kisses, the one falling on the other's neck, and so departed, clearly delivered without examination or bond. From thence he went to the King's-bench, and there talked with Mr. Bradford, and Dr. Farrar, bishop of St. David's, then prisoners. Then he comforted them, and they praised God for his happy deliverance. He went by Winchester's house, and there took boat, and came to a friend's house in London, called William Banks, and tarried there one night. The next night he shifted to another friend's house, and there he heard that search was made for him.

Dr. Watson and Mr. Christopherfon coming to the bishop of Winchester, told him, that he had set the greatest heretic in England at liberty, and one that had of all others most corrupted the university of Cambridge, namely, Dr. Sands. Whereupon the bishop, being chancellor of England, sent for all the constables of London, commanding them to watch for Dr. Sands, who was then within the city, and to apprehend him, and whosoever of them should take him and bring him to him, he should have five pounds for his labour. Dr. Sands suspecting the matter, conveyed himself by night to one Mr. Berty's house, a stranger, who was in the Marshalsea prisoner with him awhile; he was a good protestant, and dwelt in Mark-lane. There he was six days, and had one or two of his friends that repaired to him. Then he removed to one of his acquaintance in Cornhill; he caused his man Quinting to provide two geldings for him, minding on the morrow to ride into Essex, to Mr. Sands his father-in-law, where his wife was.

At going to bed he found that a pair of hose which he had newly bought were too long for him: he desired the good woman of the house to send for somebody that could cut them two inches shorter. The wife required the boy of the house to carry them to the next taylor: which he accordingly did: and he chanced (or rather God so provided) to go to the very person that first made them, whose name was Benjamin, a good protestant in Birchin-lane; and the boy desired him to cut the hose. Said he, I am not thy master's taylor. Said the boy, Because you are our next neighbour, and my master's taylor dwelleth afar off, I came to you, being late in the night, for he must put them on betimes in the morning. Benjamin took the hose, and looking upon them, knew his handy work, and said, These are not thy master's hose, they belong to Dr. Sands, I made them for him in the Tower. The boy confessed it to be so. Said he, go to thy mistress, pray her to sit till twelve o'clock, and then I will bring the hose and speak with the doctor for his good.

At midnight the good wife of the house and Benjamin came to Dr. Sands's chamber: the good woman desired him not to be surpris'd at their coming. He answered, Nothing can be amiss; what God will, that shall be done. Then Benjamin told him that he was the man that made his hose, and by good chance they now came to his hands. God used the means, he might admonish him of his danger, and advise him how to escape it, telling him, that all the constables of London, whereof he was one, watched for him, and some were so greedily set, they prayed him, if he took him, to let them have the carriage of him to the bishop of Winchester, and he should have the five pounds. It is well known (quoth Benjamin) that your man hath provided two geldings, and that you intend to ride out at Aldgate to-morrow morning, and there then you are sure to be taken. Follow my advice, and by God's grace you shall escape their hands. Let your man walk all the day to-morrow in the street where your horses stand, booted and ready to ride. The good man's servant of the house shall take the horses, and carry them to Bethnal-green. The good man shall be booted, and follow after, as if he would ride. I will be here with you to-morrow about eight o'clock, it is both term and parliament time, here we will break our fast, and when the streets are full, we will go forth. Look wildly, and if you meet your brother in the streets, shun him not, but outface him; and know him not. Accordingly Dr. Sands did, clothed like a gentleman in all respects, and looked wildly, as one that had been long kept in prison out of the light. Benjamin carried him through Birchin-lane, and from one lane to another till he came to Moregate. There they went forth until they came to Bethnal-green, where the horses were ready, and Mr. Hurlestone to ride with him as his man. Dr. Sands pulled on his boots, and taking leave of his friend Benjamin, with tears they kissed each other: he put his hand in his purse, and would have given Benjamin a great part of that little he had, but Benjamin would take none. Yet since that, Dr. Sands remembered him thankfully. He rode that night to his father-in-law Mr. Sands, where his wife was: he had not been there two hours, but it was told Mr. Sands, that there were two of the guard which would that night apprehend Dr. Sands, and so they were appointed.

That night Dr. Sands was guided to an honest farmer near the sea, where he tarried two days and two nights in a chamber without company. After that he shifted to one James Mower, a shipmaster, who dwelt at Milton Shore, where he expected wind for the English fleet ready into Flanders. While he was there, James Mower brought to him forty or fifty mariners, to whom he gave an exhortation; they liked him so well, that they promised to die for it, before that he should be apprehended.

The sixth of May, being Sunday, the wind served. He took his leave of his host and hostess, and went towards the ship. In taking his leave of his hostess who was barren, and had been married eight years, he gave her a fine handkerchief and an old royal of gold in it, thanking her much, and said, Be of good comfort, before that one whole year be past, God shall give you a child; a boy. And it came to pass, that that day twelvemonth lacking one day, God gave her a fair son.

At the shore Dr. Sands met with Mr. Isaac, of Kent, who had his eldest son there, who, upon the liking he had to Dr. Sands, sent his son with him, who afterwards died in his father's house in Frankfort. Dr. Sands and Dr. Cox were both in one ship, being one Cockrel's ship, and were within the kenning, when two of the guard came thither to apprehend Dr. Sands. They arrived at Antwerp, being bid to dinner by Mr. Locke. And at dinner time one George Gilpin, being secretary to the English house, and kinsman to Dr. Sands, came to him, and rounded him in his ear, and said, king Philip hath sent to make search for you, and to apprehend you. Hereupon they rose from their dinner in great haste, and went out of the gate leading toward Cleveland. They found a waggon, and hastening away, got safe to Augsburg, in Cleveland, where Dr. Sands tarried fourteen days, and then travelled towards Strasburgh, where after he had lived one year, his wife came to him. He fell sick of a flux, which kept him nine months, and brought him to death's door. He had a child which died of the plague. His wife at length fell into a consumption, and died in his arms; no man had a more godly woman to his wife.

After this, Mr. Sampson went away to Emanuel, a man skilful in Hebrew. Mr. Grindal went into the country to learn the Dutch tongue. Dr. Sands still remained in Strasburgh, whose support was chiefly from one Mr. Isaac, who loved him most dearly, and was ever more ready to give than to receive. He gave him in that space above an hundred marks, which sum the said Dr. Sands paid him again, and by his other gifts and friendship shewed himself to be a thankful man. When his wife was dead, he went to Zurich, and there was in Peter Martyr's house for the space of five weeks. Being there, as they sat at dinner, word suddenly came that queen Mary was dead, and Dr. Sands was sent for by his friends at Strasburgh. That news made Mr. Martyr, and Mr. Jarret then there, very joyful; but Dr. Sands could not rejoice, it smote into his heart that he should be called to misery.

Mr. Bullinger and the ministers feasted him, and he took his leave and returned to Strasburgh, where he preached; and so Mr. Grindall and he came over to England, and arrived in London, the same day that queen Elizabeth was crowned.

The miraculous Preservation of the Lady ELIZABETH, afterwards Queen of England, from extreme Calamity and Danger of Life, in the Time of Queen MARY, her Sister.

BUT when all hath been said and told, whatsoever can be recited touching the admirable working of God's present hand in defending and delivering any one person out of thralldom, never was there since the memory of our fathers, any example to be shewed, wherein the Lord's mighty power hath more admirably shewed itself, to the glory of his own name, to the comfort of all good hearts, and to the public felicity of this whole realm, than in the miraculous escape of the lady Elizabeth, in the time of queen Mary, her sister.

In which story we first have to consider in what extreme misery, sickness, fear, and peril her highness was; into what care, what trouble of mind, and what danger of death she was brought: first, with great bands of armed men (and happy was he that might have the carrying of her), being fetched up as the greatest traitor in the world, clapped into the Tower, and again tossed from thence, and from house to house, from prison to prison, from post to pillar, at length also prisoner in her own house, and guarded with a set of cut-throats, who ever gaped for the spoil, whereby they might be fingered of somewhat.

Secondly, we have to consider again, all this notwithstanding, how strangely, or rather miraculously, she was delivered from the danger, what favour and grace she found with the Almighty; who, when all the help of man, and hope of recovery was past, stretched out his mighty protection, and preserved her highness, and placed her in her princely seat of rest and quietness.

In which story, if I should set forth at large all the particulars and circumstances thereunto belonging, and as just occasion of the history requireth; beside the importunate length of the story discoursed, peradventure it might move offence to some, and truth might get me hatred. Yet notwithstanding I intend (by the grace of Christ) therein to use such brevity and moderation, as both may be to the glory of God, the discharge of the story, the profit of the reader, and hurt to none, suppressing the names of some, whom here although I could recite, yet I thought not to be more cruel in hurting their names, than the queen hath been merciful in pardoning their lives.

Therefore now to enter into the discourse of this tragical matter, first here is to be noted, that queen Mary, when she was first queen, before she was crowned, would go no whither, but would have her by the hand, and send for her to dinner and supper; but after she was crowned she never dined or supped with her, but kept her apart from her, &c. After this it happened immediately upon the rising of sir Thomas Wyatt (as before was mentioned) that the lady Elizabeth and lord Courtney were charged with false suspicion of sir Thomas Wyatt's rising. Whereupon queen Mary, whether for that surmise, or for what other cause I know not, being offended with the said lady Elizabeth her sister, at that time lying in her house at Ashbridge, the next day after the rising of Wyatt, sent to her three of her counsellors, to wit, sir Richard Southwell, sir Edward Hastings, then master of the horse, and sir Thomas Cornwallis, with their retinue and troop of horsemen, to the number of two hundred and fifty, who at their sudden and unprovided coming, found her at the same time sick in her bed, and very feeble and weak of body. Whither when they came, ascending up to her grace's chamber, they desired one of her ladies, whom they met, to declare to her grace, that there were divers come from the court who had a message from the queen.

Her grace having knowledge thereof, was right glad of their coming; however, being then very sick, and the night far spent (which was at ten o'clock) she requested them by the messenger, that they would resort thither in the morning. To this they answered, that they must needs see her, and would so do, in what case soever she were. Whereat the lady being surprised, went to shew her grace their words, but they hastily following her, came rushing as soon as she into her grace's chamber unbidden.

At whose sudden coming into her bed-chamber, her grace, being greatly amazed, said unto them, Is the haste such that it might not have pleased you to come to-morrow in the morning?

They made answer, that they were right sorry to see her in that case; and I (said she) am not glad to see you here at this time of the night. Whereunto they answered, That they came from the queen to do their message and duty, which was to this effect, that the queen's pleasure was, that she should be at London the seventh day of that present month. Whereunto she said, Certainly no creature can be more glad than I to come to her majesty, being right sorry that I am not in case at this time to wait on her, as you yourselves do see, and can testify.

Indeed we see it true, said they, that you do say; for which we are very sorry. Although, we let you to understand, that our commission is such, and so straiteneth us, that we must needs bring you with us, either alive or dead. Whereat she being amazed, sorrowfully said, That their commission was very sore; but yet notwithstanding she hoped it would be otherwise, and not so strait. Yes verily, said they. Whereupon they calling for two physicians, Dr. Owen and Dr. Wendy, demanded of them whether she might be removed from thence with life, or no. Whose answer and judgment was, that there was no impediment in their opinion to the contrary, but that she might travel without danger of life.

In conclusion, they desired her to prepare against the next morning, at nine o'clock to go with them, declaring that they had brought with them the queen's litter for her. After much talk, the messengers declaring how there was no prolonging of times and days, departed to their chamber, being entertained as became their worships.

The next morning, at the time prescribed, they had her forth as she was, very faint and feeble, and in such case that she was ready to swoon three or four times between them. What should I speak here, that cannot well be expressed, what a heavy house there was, to behold the irreverend and doleful dealings of these men, but especially the fear and captivity of their innocent lady and mistress.

Now to proceed in her journey from Ashbridge; sick in the litter, she came to Redborne, where she was guarded all night. From thence to St. Alban's, to sir Ralph Rowlet's house, where she tarried that night, both feeble in body, and comfortless in mind. From thence they passed to Mr. Dod's house at Myms, where they also remained that night; and so from thence she came to Highgate, where she being very sick, tarried that night and the next day. During which time of her abode, there came many pursuivants and messengers from the court, but for what purpose I cannot tell.

From that place she was conveyed to the court, where by the way came to meet her many gentlemen to accompany her highness, who were very sorry to see her in that situation. But especially a great multitude of people were standing by the way, who then flocking about her litter, lamented and bewailed greatly her estate. Now when she came to the court, her grace was there shut up, and kept a close prisoner a fortnight, which was till Palm-Sunday, seeing neither king nor queen, nor lord, nor friend, all that time, but only the then lord chamberlain, sir John Gage, and the vice-chamberlain, which were attendant unto the doors. About which time sir William Sentlowe was called before the council. To whose charge was laid, that he knew of Wyat's rebellion, which he stoutly denied, protesting that he was a true man both to God and his prince, defying all traitors and rebels; but being straitly examined, he was in conclusion committed to the Tower.

The Friday before Palm-Sunday, the bishop of Winchester with nineteen others of the council (who shall be here nameless) came unto her grace from the queen's majesty, and burdened her with Wyat's conspiracy; which she utterly denied, affirming that she was altogether guiltless therein. They being not contented with this, charged her grace with business made by sir Peter Carew, and the rest of the gentlemen of the West country: which also she utterly denying, cleared her innocency therein.

In conclusion, after long debating of matters, they declared unto her, that it was the queen's will and pleasure that she should go unto the Tower, while the matter were further tried and examined.

Whereat she being amazed, said, that she trusted the queen's majesty would be a more gracious lady unto her, and that her highness would not otherwise conceive of her but that she was a true woman; declaring furthermore to the lords, that she was innocent in all those matters wherein they had burdened her, and desired them therefore to be a further means to the queen her sister, that she being a true woman in thought, word, and deed, towards her majesty, might not be committed to so notorious and doleful a place; protesting that she would request no favour at her hand, if she should be proved to have consented unto any such kind of matter as they laid unto her charge, and therefore in fine desired their lordships to think of her what she was, and that she might not so extremely be dealt withal for her truth.

Whereunto the lords answered again, that there was no remedy, for that the queen's majesty was fully determined that she should go unto the Tower. Where-with the lords departed, with their caps hanging over their eyes. But not long after, within the space of an hour or a little more, came four of the aforesaid lords of the council, which were the lord treasurer, the bishop of Winchester, the lord steward, the earl of Suffex, with the guard; who warding the next chamber to her, secluded all her gentlemen and yeomen, ladies and gentlewomen; except that for one gentleman usher, three gentlewomen, and two grooms of her chamber, were appointed in their rooms, three other men of the queen's, and three waiting women to give attendance likewise upon her, that none should have access to her grace.

At which time there was an hundred northern soldiers in white coats, watching and warding about the gardens all that night, and a great fire being made in the midst of the hall, two certain lords were watching there also with their band and company.

Upon Saturday following, two lords of the council, (the one was the earl of Suffex, the other shall be nameless) came and certified her grace, that she must go forthwith unto the Tower, the barge being prepared for her, and the tide now ready, which tarrieth for nobody. In heavy mood her grace requested the lords that she might tarry another tide, trusting that the next would be better and more comfortable. But one of the lords replied, that neither time nor tide was to be delayed.

And when her grace requested him that she might be suffered to write to the queen's majesty, he answered, that he durst not permit that: adding, that in his judgment it would rather hurt, than profit her grace in so doing.

But the other lord, more courteous and favourable, (who was the earl of Suffex) kneeling down, told her grace that she should have liberty to write, and as he was a true man, he would deliver it to the queen's highness, and bring an answer of the same, whatsoever came thereof. Whereupon she wrote, although she could in no case be suffered to speak with the queen, to her great discomfort, being no offender against the queen's majesty.

And thus the time and tide passed away for that season, they privily appointing all things ready that she should go the next tide, which fell about midnight; but for fear she should be taken by the way, they durst not. So they stayed till the next day, being Palm-Sunday, when about nine o'clock these two returned again, declaring that it was time for her grace to depart. She answered, if there be no remedy, I must be contented, willing the lords to go on before. Being come forth into the garden, she cast her eyes towards the window, thinking to see the queen, which she could not. Whereat she said, she marvelled much what the nobility of the realm meant, which in that sort would suffer her to be led into captivity, the Lord knew whither, for she did not. In the mean time commandment was given throughout London, that every one should keep the church, and carry their Palms, while in the mean season she might be conveyed without any concourse of people to the Tower.

After this, she took her barge with the two aforesaid lords, three of the queen's gentlewomen, and three of her own, her gentleman usher, and two of her grooms lying and hovering upon the water a certain space, for that they could not shoot the bridge, the bargemen being very unwilling to shoot the same so soon as they did, because of the danger thereof: for the stern of the boat struck upon the ground, the fall was so great, and the water was so shallow, that the boat being under the bridge, there stayed again a while. At landing she first stayed, and refused to land at those stairs where all traitors and offenders customably used to land, neither could she well, unless she should go over her shoes. The lords were gone out of the boat before, and asked why she came not. One of the lords went back again to her, and brought word she would not come.

Then said one of the lords, who shall be nameless, that she should not chuse; and because it did then rain, he offered to her his cloak, which she, putting it back with her hand with a good dash, refused. So she coming out, having one foot upon the stairs, said, Here landeth as true a subject, being prisoner, as ever landed at these stairs: and before thee, O God, I speak it, having no other friends but thee alone.

To whom the same lord answered again, that if it were so, it was the better for her. At her landing there was a great multitude of their servants and warders standing in their order. What needed all this, said she? It is the use, said some, so to be when any prisoner came thither. And if it be, quoth she, for my cause, I beseech you that they may be dismissed. Whereat the poor men kneeled down, and with one voice desired God to preserve her grace, who the next day were released of their old coats.

After this, passing a little further, she sat down upon a cold stone, and there rested herself. To whom the lieutenant then being, said, Madam, you were best to come out of the rain, for you sit unwholsomely. She then replying, answered again, It is better sitting here, than in a worse place; for God knoweth, I know not whither you will bring me. With that her gentleman usher wept; she demanding of him what he meant by using her so uncomfortably, seeing she took him to be her comfort, and not to dismay her, especially for that she knew her truth to be such, that no man should have cause to weep for her. But forth she went into prison.

The doors were locked and bolted upon her, which greatly discomfited and dismayed her grace. At which time she called to her gentlewomen for her book, desiring God not to suffer her to build her foundation upon the sands, but upon the rock, whereby all blasts of blustering weather should have no power against her. The doors being thus locked, and she close shut up, the lords had great conference how to keep ward and watch, every man declaring his own opinion in that behalf, agreeing straitly and circumspectly to keep her.

Then one of them, which was the lord of Suffex, swearing, said, My lords, let us take heed, and do no more than our commission will bear us out in, whatsoever shall happen hereafter. And further, let us consider that she was the king our master's daughter; and therefore let us use such dealing, that we may answer it hereafter, if it shall so happen; for just dealing (quoth he) is always answerable; whereunto the other lords agreed that it was well said of him, and thereupon departed. Being in the Tower, within two days commandment was that she should have mass within her house. One Mr. Young was then her chaplain, and because there were none of her men so well learned to help the priest to say mass, the mass stayed for that day.

The next day two of her yeomen, who had gone long to school before, and were learned, had two abcies provided, and delivered them, so that upon the abcies they should help the priest. One of the said yeomen, holding the abcie in his hand, pretending ignorance at Kyrie Eleison, set the priest, making as though he could answer no further.

It would make a pitiful and a strange story, here by the way to touch and recite what examination and rackings of poor men there were to find out the knife that should cut her throat; what gaping among my lords of the clergy, to see the day wherein they might wash their goodly white rochets in her innocent blood; but especially the bishop of Winchester, Stephen Gardiner, then lord chancellor, who within five days after came unto her with divers others of the council, and examined her of the talk that was at Awbridge, between her and sir James Acroft, concerning her removing from thence to Dunnington castle, requiring her to declare what she meant thereby.

At the first she being so suddenly asked, did not well remember any such house; but within a while, well advising herself, she said, Indeed I do now remember that I have such a place, but I never lay in it in all my life. And as for any that hath moved me thereunto, I do not remember.

Then, to enforce the matter, they brought forth sir James Acroft. The bishop of Winchester demanded of her what she said to that man. She answered, that she had little to say to him, or to the rest that were then prisoners in the Tower: but, my lords, said she, you do examine every mean prisoner of me, wherein methinks you do me great injury. If they have done evil, and offended the queen's majesty, let them answer to it accordingly. I beseech you, my lords, join not me in this sort with any of these offenders. And as concerning my going unto Dunnington castle, I do remember that Mr. Hobby and mine officers, and you sir James Acroft, had such talk; but what is that to the purpose, my lords, but that I may go to mine own houses at all times?

The lord of Arundel kneeling down, said, Your grace saith true, and certainly we are very sorry that we have troubled you about so vain matters. She then said, My lords, you do sift me very narrowly: but well I am assured, you shall not do more to me than God hath appointed; and God forgive you all.

At their departure, sir James Acroft kneeled down, declaring he was sorry to see the day in which he should be brought as a witness against her grace. But I assure your grace, said he, I have been marvellously tossed and examined touching your highness, which, the Lord knoweth, is very strange to me: for I take God to record, before all your honours, I do not know any thing of that crime that you have laid to my charge, and will thereupon take my death, if I should be driven to so strict a trial.

That day, or thereabouts, divers of her own officers, who had made provision for her diet, brought the same to the outer gate of the Tower, the common rascal soldiers receiving it; which was no small grief unto the gentlemen, the bringers thereof. Wherefore they desired to speak with the lord-chamberlain, who was then constable of the Tower. On coming into his presence, they declared unto his lordship, that they were much afraid to bring her grace's diet, and to deliver it to such common and desperate persons as those who received it, beseeching his honour to consider her grace, and to give such order, that her viands might at all times be brought in by them, who had been appointed for that purpose. Yea, sirs, said he, who appointed you this office? They answered, her grace's council. Council, said he, there is none of them which hath to do either in that case, or any thing else within this place; and I assure you, for that she is a prisoner, she shall be served by the lieutenant's men, as other the prisoners are. One of the gentlemen on this told him, that they trusted for more favour from his hands, considering her personage: and added, that they imagined the queen and her council would be better to her grace than so; and shewed themselves to be offended at the ungracious words of the lord-chamberlain respecting their lady and mistress.

On this he swore by God, striking himself upon the breast, that if they did either frown or shrug at him, he would set them where they should see neither sun nor moon. Thus taking their leave, they desired God to bring him into a better mind towards her grace, and departed from him.

Upon which occasion, her grace's officers made great suit unto the queen's council, that some proper persons might be appointed to bring her grace's diet unto her, and that it might no more be delivered by the common soldiers of the Tower: which being reasonably considered, was by them permitted; and one of her gentlemen, her clerk of the kitchen, and her two purveyors, were appointed to bring in her provision once a day: the warders, however, continued to wait upon them on these occasions.

The lord chamberlain himself being always with them, circumspectly and narrowly watched and searched what they brought, and took care that they should have no talk with any of her grace's waiting servants, and so guarded them both in and out. At the said suit of her officers, were sent by the commandment of the council to wait upon her grace, two yeomen of her chamber, one of her robes, two of her pantry and ewry, one of her buttery, another of her cellar, two of her kitchen, and one of her larder, all which continued with her the time of her trouble.

Here the constable, being at the first not very well pleased with the coming in of such a company against his will, would have had his men still to have served with her grace's men; which her servants would by no means suffer, desiring his lordship to be contented, for that orders were given, that no stranger should come within their offices. At which answer being sore displeased, he broke out into these threatening words, Well, I will handle you well enough. Then he went into the kitchen, and there would needs have his meat roasted with her grace's, and said, that his cook should come thither and dress it. To that her grace's cook answered, My lord, I will never suffer any stranger to come about her diet, but her own sworn men, as long as I live. He said they should. But the cook said, his lordship should pardon him for that matter. Thus did he trouble her poor servants very grievously; though afterward he was otherwise advised, and they were more courteously used at his hands. And good cause why. For he had good cheer, and fared of the best, and her grace payed well for it. Wherefore he used himself afterward more reverently toward her grace.

Having been a whole month there in close prison, and being on that account uneasy, she sent for the lord-chamberlain and the lord Chandois to come and speak with her. When they were come, she requested them that she might have liberty to walk in some place, for that that she felt herself not well. To which they answered, that they were right sorry that they could not satisfy her grace's request, for that they had commandment to the contrary, which they durst not in any wise break. She then desired of them, if that could not be granted, that she might but walk into the queen's lodging. No, nor yet that, they answered, could by any means be obtained without a further suit to the queen and her council. Well, said she, my lords, if the matter be so hard that they must be sued unto for so small a thing, and that friendship be so strict, God comfort me; and so they departed, she remaining in her old dungeon still, without any kind of comfort but only God.

The next day lord Chandois came unto her grace, declaring unto her that he had applied to the council for further liberty. Some of them consented thereunto, divers others dissented, for that there were so many prisoners in the Tower. But, in conclusion, they did all agree that her grace might walk into those lodgings, so that he and the lord chamberlain, and three of the queen's gentlewomen, did accompany her, the windows being shut, and she not suffered to look out at any of them: wherewith she contented herself, and gave him thanks for his good-will in that behalf.

Afterwards there was liberty granted to her grace to walk in a little garden, the doors and gates being shut up, which was as much discomfort to her as the walk in the garden was pleasant and acceptable. At which times of her walking there, the prisoners on that side were strictly commanded not to speak or look out of the windows into the garden, till her grace was gone out again, having their keepers waiting upon them for that time. Thus her grace with this small liberty contented herself in God, to whom be praise therefore.

During this time, there used a little boy, a man's child in the Tower, to resort to their chambers, and many times to bring her grace flowers; which he likewise did to the other prisoners confined there. Whereupon some evil and suspicious persons, thinking to make something out of this, on a time called the child unto them, promising him figs and apples, and asking him when he had been with the earl of Devonshire, not ignorant of the child's often visiting him. The boy answered, that he would go by and by thither. Further, they demanded of him, when he was with the lady Elizabeth's grace. He answered, every day. They then asked him what the lord of Devonshire sent by him to her grace. The child said, I will go know what he will give to carry to her. Such was the discretion of the child, though only four years of age. This fame is a crafty boy, said the lord-chamberlain. How say you, my lord Chandois? I pray you, my lord, said the boy, give me the figs you promised me. No marry, answered he, thou shalt be whipped if thou come any more to the lady Elizabeth, or the lord Courtney. The boy answered, I will bring my lady my mistress more flowers. Whereupon the child's father was commanded to permit the boy to come no more up into their chambers.

The next day as her grace was walking in the garden, the child peeping in at a hole in the door, called unto her, Mistress, I can bring you no more flowers. At which she smiled, but said nothing, understanding thereby what they had done. Wherefore the chamberlain highly rebuked his father afterwards, and commanded him to put the child out of the house. Alas, poor infant! said the father. It is a crafty knave, said the lord-chamberlain; let me see him here no more.

The fifth day of May, the constable of the Tower was discharged from his office, and one sir Henry Benifield placed in his room, a man unknown to her grace, and therefore the more feared; which sudden alteration occasioned her no small surprize. He brought with him an hundred soldiers in blue coats, wherewith she was marvellously discomforted, and demanded of such as were about her, whether the lady Jane's scaffold were taken away or not, fearing, by reason of their coming, lest she should have played her part. To whom answer was made, that the scaffold was taken away, and that she need not be apprehensive of any such tyranny; for God would not suffer any such treason against her person. Wherewith being contented, but not altogether satisfied, she asked what sir Henry Benifield was, and whether he was of that conscience, or no, that if her murdering were secretly committed to his charge he would see the execution thereof.

She was answered, that they were ignorant what manner of man he was. However they persuaded her that God would not suffer such wickedness to proceed. Well, quoth she, God grant it be so. For thou, O God, canst mollify all such tyrannous hearts, and disappoint all such cruel purposes; and I beseech thee to hear me thy creature, who am thy servant, and at thy commandment, trusting by thy grace ever so to remain.

About which time it was spread abroad, that her grace should be carried from thence by this new jolly captain and his soldiers; but whither it could not be learned. Which was unto her a great grief, especially for that such a company was appointed for her guard, requesting rather to continue there still, than to be led thence by such a set of rascals. At last, plain answer was made by the lord Chandois, that there was no remedy, but from thence she must needs depart to the manor of Woodstock, as he thought. Being demanded by her, for what cause; For that, quoth he, the Tower is like further to be furnished. She being desirous to know what he meant thereby, demanded wherewith. He answered, with such matter as the queen and council were determined in that behalf, whereof he had no knowledge; and so departed.

In conclusion, on Trinity Sunday, being the nineteenth day of May, she was removed from the Tower, the lord treasurer being there for the lading of her carts, and discharging the place of the same, where sir Henry Benifield (being appointed her jailor) received her with a company of rake hells to guard her, besides the lord of Darby's band, waiting in the country about for the moon-shine in the water. Unto whom at length came my lord of Tame, joined in commission with the said sir Henry, for the safe guiding of her to prison; and they together conveyed her grace to Woodstock, as hereafter followeth.

The first day they conducted her to Richmond, where she continued all night, being deprived of her own men which were lodged in out-chambers, and sir Henry Benifield's soldiers were appointed in their rooms to give attendance on her person. Whereat she being marvelously dismayed, thinking verily some secret mischief to be working towards her, called her gentleman usher, and desired him with the rest of his company to pray for her, for this night, said she, I think to die. Wherewith he being struck to the heart, said, God forbid that any such wickedness should be intended against your grace. So comforting her as well as he could, at last he burst out into tears, and went from her down into the court, where were walking the lord of Tame, and sir Henry Benifield.

Then he coming to the lord of Tame (who had professed him much friendship) desired to speak a word or two with him. Unto whom he familiarly said, he would with all his heart. Which when sir Henry, standing by, heard, he asked what the matter was. To whom the gentleman usher answered. No great matter, sir, but to speak with my lord a word or two.

Then when the lord of Tame came to him, he spake on this wise, My lord, quoth he, you have been always my good lord, and so I beseech you to remain. The cause why I come to you at this time, is to desire your honour unfeignedly to declare unto me whether any danger is meant towards my mistress this night, or not, that I and my poor fellows may take such part as shall please God to appoint: for certainly we will rather die, than she should secretly and innocently miscarry. Marry, said the lord of Tame, God forbid that any such wicked purpose should be wrought; and rather than it should be so, I with my men are ready to die at her feet also: and so (praised be God) they passed that doleful night, with no little heaviness of heart.

Afterwards passing over the water at Richmond, going towards Windsor, her grace espied certain of her poor servants fervants standing on the other side, which were very desirous to see her. Whom when she beheld, turning to one of her men standing by, she said, Yonder I see certain of my men: go to them and say these words from me, Tanquam ovis, that is, Like a sheep to the slaughter.

So she passing forward to Windsor, lodged that night in the dean of Windsor's house, a place more meet for a priest than a prince's.

And from thence her grace was guarded and brought the next night to Mr. Dormer's house, where much people standing by the way, some presented to her one gift, and some another, so that sir Henry was greatly moved therewith, and troubled the poor people very sore, for shewing their loving hearts in such a manner, calling them rebels and traitors, with such like vile words.

Besides, as she passed through the villages, the townsmen rang the bells, as being joyful of her coming, thinking indeed that it had been otherwise than it was, as the sequel proved after to the said poor men. For immediately the said sir Henry hearing the same, sent his soldiers thither, who apprehended some of the ringers, setting them in the stocks, and otherwise uncourteously misusing some others for their good wills.

On the morrow, her grace passing from Mr. Dormer's (where was for the time of her abode there, a strict watch kept), came to my lord of Tame's house, where she lay all night, being very princely entertained both by knights and ladies, gentlemen and gentlewomen. Whereat sir Henry Benifield grumbled, and was highly offended, saying unto them, that they could not tell what they did, and were not able to answer their doings in that behalf, letting them to understand, that she was the queen's prisoner, and no otherwise; advising them therefore to take heed and beware of after-claps. Whereunto the lord of Tame answered in this wise; That he was well advised of his doings, being joined in commission as well as he, adding with warrant, that her grace might and should, while in his house, be merry.

The next day, as she should take her journey from Richmond towards Woodstock, the lord of Tame with another gentleman being at tables, playing, and dropping vie crowns, the lady Elizabeth passing by, stayed, and said she would see the game played out, which sir Henry Benifield would scarce permit. The game running long about, and they playing drop vie crowns, Come on, saith he; I will tarry, saith she, and will see this game out.

After this, sir Henry Benifield went up into a chamber, where was appointed for her grace a chair, two cushions, and a foot carpet, very fair and prince-like, wherein presumptuously he sat, and called one Barwick, his man, to pull off his boots. Which as soon as it was known among the ladies and gentlemen, every one mused thereat, and laughed him to scorn, observing his indiscreet manners in that behalf, as they might very well.

When supper was done, he called my lord, and willed him that all the gentlemen and ladies should withdraw themselves every one to his lodging, marvelling much that he would permit there such a large company, considering the great charge he had committed to him.

Sir Henry, quoth my lord, content yourself, all shall be avoided, your men and all. Nay, my soldiers, quoth sir Henry, shall watch all night. The lord of Tame answered, There is no need. Well, said he, need or need not, they shall so do, mistrusting perhaps the company, which God knoweth was without cause.

The next day her grace took her journey from thence to Woodstock, where she was inclosed, as before in the Tower of London, the soldiers guarding both within and without the walls, every day, to the number of sixty; and in the night without the walls forty, during the time of her imprisonment there.

At length she had gardens appointed for her to walk in, which was very comfortable to her grace. But always when she recreated herself therein, the doors were fast locked up, in as strict a manner as they were in the Tower, being at least five or six locks between her lodging and her walks; sir Henry himself keeping the keys, and trusting no man therewith. Whereupon she called him her jailor; and he kneeling down, desired her grace not to call him so, for he was appointed there to be one of her officers. From such officers (quoth she) good Lord deliver me.

And now by the way, as digressing, or rather refreshing the reader, if it be lawful in so serious a story to recite a matter incident, and yet not impertinent to the same; occasion here moveth, or rather inforceth me to touch briefly what happened in the same place and time, by a certain merry conceited man, being then about her grace: who observing the strict and strange keeping of his lady and mistress, by the said sir Henry Benifield, with so many locks and doors, with such a watch and guard about her, as was strange and wonderful, espied a goat in the ward where her grace was; and whether to refresh her oppressed mind, or to notify her strait handling by sir Henry, or else both, he took it upon his neck, and followed her grace therewith as she was going into her lodging.

Which when she saw, she asked him what he would do with it, desiring him to let it alone. The man answered, No, by St. Mary (if it please your grace), will I not; for I cannot tell whether he be one of the queen's friends or not. I will carry him to sir Henry Benifield (God willing) to know what he is: so leaving her grace, he went with the goat on his neck, and carried it to sir Henry: who when he saw him coming with it, asked him, half angrily, what he had there.

Unto whom the man answered, saying, Sir, I cannot tell what he is. I pray you examine him, for I found him in the place where my lady's grace was walking, and what talk they have had I cannot tell. For I understand him not, but he should seem to me to be some stranger, and I think verily a Welshman, for he hath a white frize coat on his back. And forsomuch as I being the queen's subject, and perceiving the strict charge committed to you, that no stranger should have access to her without sufficient licence, I have here found a stranger (what he is I cannot tell) in the place where her grace was walking: and therefore for the necessary discharge of my duty, I thought it good to bring the said stranger to you, to examine as you see cause; and so he set him down. At this sir Henry seemed much displeased, and said, Well, well, you will never leave this gear, I see; and so they departed.

Now to return to the matter from whence we have digressed, after her grace had been there a time, she applied to the counsel for leave to write to the queen. This at last was permitted: so sir Henry Benifield brought her pen, ink, and paper; and standing by her while she wrote (which he strictly observed), she being sometimes weary, he would carry away her letters, and bring them again when she called for them. When she had finished, he would fain have been messenger to the queen with the same. Whose request her grace denied, saying, One of her own men should carry them, and that she would neither trust him, nor any of his with them.

Then he answered again, saying, None of them durst be so bold (he thought) as to carry her letters for her in her present situation. Yes, said she, I am assured I have none so dishonest as to deny my request in that behalf, but will be as willing to serve me now as before. Well, said he, my commission is to the contrary, and I may not so suffer it. Her grace replying again, said, You charge me very often with your commission. I pray God you may justly answer the cruel dealings you use towards me.

Then he kneeling down, desired her grace to think and consider how he was a servant, and put in trust there by the queen to serve her majesty; protesting, that if the ease were her's, he would as willingly serve her grace, as now he did the queen's highness. For which answer her grace thanked him, desiring God that she might never never have need of such servants as he was; declaring further to him, that his doings towards her were not good nor answerable, but more than all the friends he had would stand by.

To whom sir Henry replied, and said, that there was no remedy but his doings must be answered, and so they should, trusting to make good account thereof. The cause which moved her grace so to say, was, for that he would not permit her letters to be carried four or five days after the writing thereof. But in fine he was content to send for her gentleman from the town of Woodstock, demanding of him whether he durst enterprise the carriage of her grace's letters to the queen, or no: and he answered, Yea sir, that I will with all my heart. Whereupon sir Henry, half against his stomach, took them unto him.

Then about the eighth of June came down Dr. Owen and Dr. Wendy, sent by the queen to her grace, for that she was sickly; who ministering to her, and letting her blood, tarried there and attended on her grace five or six days. Then she being well amended, they returned again to the court, making their good report to the queen and council of her grace's behaviour and humility towards the queen's highness. Which her majesty hearing, took very thankfully; but the bishops repined thereat, looked black in the mouth, and told the queen, they marvelled much that she submitted not herself to her majesty's mercy, considering that she had offended her highness.

About this time, her grace was requested by a secret friend, to submit herself to the queen's majesty, which would be well taken, and to her great quiet and advantage. Unto whom she answered, that she would never submit herself to them whom she never offended. For (quoth she) if I have offended and am guilty, I then crave no mercy, but the law, which I am certain I should have had before this, if it could be proved by me. For I know myself (I thank God) to be out of the danger thereof, wishing that I were as clear out of the peril of my enemies, and then I am assured I should not be so locked and bolted up within walls and doors as I am. God give them a better mind when it pleaseth him.

About this time there was a great consultation among the bishops and gentlemen, touching the marriage of her grace, which some of the Spaniards wished to be with some stranger, that she might go out of the realm with her portion; some saying one thing, and some another.

A lord (who shall be here nameless) being there, at last said, That the king should never have any quiet common-wealth in England, unless her head were severed from her shoulders. Whereunto the Spaniards answered, saying, God forbid that their king and master should have that mind to consent to such a mischief.

This was the courteous answer of the Spaniards to the Englishmen, speaking after that sort against their own country. From that day the Spaniards never left off their good persuasions to the king, that the like honour he should never obtain, as he should in delivering the lady Elizabeth's grace out of prison; whereby at length she was happily released from the same. Here is a plain and evident example of the good clemency and nature of the king and his counsellors toward her grace (praised be God therefore), who moved their hearts therein. Then hereupon she was sent for shortly after to come to Hampton-Court.

But before her removing away from Woodstock, we will stay a little to declare in what dangers her life was, during the time she remained there: first through fire, which began to kindle between the boards and ceiling under the chamber where she lay, whether by a spark of fire getting accidentally into a crevice, or whether for the purpose by some that meant her no good, the Lord doth know. Nevertheless a worshipful knight of Oxfordshire, which was there joined the same time with sir Henry Benifield in keeping that lady, (who then took up the boards and quenched the fire) verily supposed it to be done for the purpose.

No. 59.

Furthermore it is thought, and affirmed (for truth) of one Paul Penny, the keeper of Woodstock, a notorious ruffian, and a butcherly wretch, that he was appointed to assassinate the said lady Elizabeth; who both saw the man being often in her sight, and also knew thereof.

Another time, one of the privy chamber, a great man about the queen, and chief darling of Stephen Gardiner, named James Basset, came to Blandenbridge, a mile from Woodstock, with twenty or thirty privy coats, and sent for sir Henry Benifield to come and speak with him. But as God would, who disposeth all things according to his own will, so it happened, that a little before, the said sir Henry Benifield was sent for by post to the council, leaving strict word behind him with his brother, that no man, whosoever he were, though coming with a note of the queen's hand, or any other warrant, should have access to her before his return again. By reason whereof it so fell out, that Mr. Benifield's brother, coming to him at the bridge, would suffer him in no case to come in, who otherwise (as is supposed) was appointed violently to murder the innocent lady.

In the life of Stephen Gardiner we declared before, how that the lady Elizabeth being in the Tower, a writ came down, subscribed with certain hands of the council for her execution: which if it were certain, as it is reported, Winchester (no doubt) was deviser of that mischievous drift: and doubtless the same Ahithophel had brought his impious purpose that day to pass, had not the fatherly purpose of Almighty God stirred up Mr. Bridges, lieutenant the same time of the Tower, to come in haste to the queen to give certificate thereof, and to know further her consent touching her sister's death. Whereupon it followed, that all that device was disappointed, and Winchester's devilish platform, which he said he had cast, through the Lord's great goodness came to no effect.

There moreover is to be noted, that during the imprisonment of this lady and princess, one Mr. Edmund Tremaine was on the rack, and Mr. Smithwike, and others in the Tower were examined, and divers offers made to them to accuse the guiltless lady, being in her captivity. Howbeit, all that notwithstanding, no matter could be proved by all examinations, as she the same time lying at Woodstock had certain intelligence by the means of one John Gayer; who under a colourable pretence of a letter to Mrs. Cleve from her father, was let in, and so gave them secretly to understand of all this matter. Whereupon the lady Elizabeth, at her departing out from Woodstock, wrote these lines with her diamond in a glass window:

Much suspected by me;
Nothing proved can be.

Quoth ELIZABETH, Prisoner.

And thus much touching the troubles of lady Elizabeth, at Woodstock. Whereunto this is more to be added, that during the same time, the lord of Tame had laboured to the queen, and became surety for her, to have her from Woodstock to his house, and had obtained a grant thereof. Thereupon preparation was made accordingly, and all things ready in expectation of her coming. But through the procurement either of Mr. Benifield, or by the advice of Winchester her mortal enemy, letters came over night to the contrary; whereby her journey was stopped.

Thus this worthy lady, oppressed with continual sorrow, could not be permitted to have recourse to any friends she had, but still in the hands of her enemies was left desolate, and utterly destitute of all that might refresh a doleful heart, fraught full of terror and thralldom. Whereupon no marvel if she hearing upon a time, out of her garden at Woodstock, a certain milkmaid singing pleasantly, wished herself to be a milkmaid as she was, saying that her case was better, and life more merry than her's, in that state as she was.

Now after these things thus declared, to proceed further there where we left before, sir Henry Benifield and his soldiers, with the lord of Tame, and sir Ralph Chamberline, guarding and waiting upon her, the first night from Woodstock she came to Ricot. In which journey such a mighty wind did blow, that her servants were fain to hold down her cloaths about her: insomuch that her hood was twice or thrice blown from her head. Thereupon she desiring to return to a certain gentleman's house there near, could not be suffered by sir Henry Benifield so to do, but was constrained under an hedge to trim her head as well as she could.

After this, the next day they journeyed to Mr. Dormer's, and so to Colbroke, where she lay all that night at the George, and by the way coming to Colbroke, certain of her grace's gentlemen and yeomen met her, to the number of threescore, much to all their comforts, who had not seen her grace for a long time before: notwithstanding they were commanded in the queen's name immediately to depart the town, to both their's, and her grace's no little heaviness, who could not be suffered once to speak with them. So that night all her men were taken from her, saving her gentleman-usher, three gentlewomen, two grooms, and one of her wardrobe, the soldiers watching and warding about the house, and she close shut up within her prison.

The next day following, her grace entered Hampton-Court on the back-side into the prince's lodging; the doors being shut upon her, and she guarded with soldiers as before, lay there a fortnight at least, before any had recourse unto her: at length came the lord William Haward, who used her grace honourably. Whereat she took much comfort, and requested him to be a means that she might speak with some of the council. To whom not long after came the bishop of Winchester, and the lord of Arundel, the lord of Shrewsbury, secretary Peter, who with great humility humbled themselves to her grace. She again likewise saluting them, said, My lords, I am glad to see you; for methinks I have been kept a great while from you desolote and alone. Wherefore I would desire you to be a means to the king and queen, that I may be delivered from prison, wherein I have been kept a long time, as to you my lords is well known.

When she had spoken, Stephen Gardiner, the bishop of Winchester, kneeled down, and requested that she would submit herself to the queen's grace, and in so doing he had no doubt but that her majesty would be good to her: she made answer, That rather than she would so do, she would lay in prison all the days of her life; adding, that she craved no mercy at her majesty's hand, but rather desired the law, if ever she did offend her majesty in thought, word, or deed: and besides this, in yielding (quoth she) I should speak against myself, and confess myself to be an offender, which I never was towards her majesty, by occasion wherof the king and queen might ever hereafter conceive of me an evil opinion: and therefore I say, my lords, it were better for me to lie in prison for the truth, than to be abroad and suspected by my prince. And so they departed, promising to declare her message to the queen.

On the next day the bishop of Winchester came again unto her grace, and kneeling down, declared that the queen marvelled that she would so stoutly use herself, not confessing that she had offended: so that it should seem that the queen's majesty had wrongfully imprisoned her grace.

Nay, quoth the lady Elizabeth, it may please her to punish me as she thinketh good.

Well, quoth Gardiner, her majesty willeth me to tell you, that you must tell another tale before that you be set at liberty.

Her grace answered, that she had as soon be in prison with honesty and truth, as to be abroad, suspected by her majesty; and this that I have said, I will stand unto, for I will never belie myself.

Wincheller again kneeled down, and said, Then your grace hath the advantage of me and other lords for your wrong and long imprisonment.

What advantage I have (quoth she) you know; taking God to record, I seek no advantage at your hands for your so dealing with me, but God forgive you and me also. With that the rest kneeled, desiring her grace that all might be forgotten, and so departed, she being fast locked up again.

A seven-night after the queen sent for her grace at ten o'clock at night to speak with her: for she had not seen her for two years before. Yet for all that, she amazed at the suddenness of the message, thinking it had been worse than afterwards it proved, desired her gentlemen and gentlewomen to pray for her, for that she could not tell whether ever she should see them again or no.

At which time sir Henry Benifield with Mrs. Claren- cius coming in, her grace was brought into the garden, unto a stairs foot that went into the queen's lodging, her grace's gentlewomen waiting upon her, her gentleman-usher, and her grooms going before with torches, where her gentlemen and gentlewomen being commanded to stay, all saving one woman, Mrs. Claren- cius conducted her to the queen's bed-chamber where her majesty was.

At the sight of whom her grace kneeled down, and desired God to preserve her majesty, not mistrusting but that she should prove herself as true a subject towards her majesty as ever any did, and desired her majesty even so to judge of her; and said, that she should not find her to the contrary, whatsoever report otherwise had gone of her.

To whom the queen answered, You will not confess your offence, but stand stoutly to your truth; I pray God it may so fall out.

If it doth not, (quoth the lady Elizabeth) I request neither favour nor pardon at your majesty's hands. Well, (said the queen) you stiffly still persevere in your truth. Belike you will not confess but that you have been wrongfully punished.

I must not say so (if it please your majesty) to you.

Why then (said the queen) belike you will to others.

No, if it please your majesty (quoth she) I have borne the burden, and must bear it. I humbly beseech your majesty to have a good opinion of me, and to think me to be your true subject, not only from the beginning hitherto, but for ever, as long as life lasteth: and so they departed with very few comfortable words of the queen, in English: but what she said in Spanish, God knoweth. It was thought that king Philip was there behind a cloth, and not seen, and that he shewed himself a very great friend in that matter, &c.

Thus her grace departing, went to her lodging again, and that day seven-night was released of sir Henry Benifield her gaoler (as she termed him), and his soldiers, and so her grace being set at liberty from imprisonment went into the country, and had appointed to go with her sir Thomas Pope, one of queen Mary's counsellors, and one of her gentlemen-ushers, Mr. Gage, and thus strictly was she looked after all queen Mary's time. And this is the discourse of her highness's imprisonment.

Then there came to Lamhevre, Mr. Jerningham and Mr. Noris, gentlemen-ushers, queen Mary's men, who took away from her grace, Mrs. Ashly to the Fleet, and three other of her gentlewomen to the Tower; which thing was no little trouble to her grace, saying, that she thought they would fetch all away at the end. But God be praised, shortly after was fetched away Gardiner, through the merciful providence of the Lord's goodness, by occasion of whose opportune decease (as is partly touched in this story before) the life of this excellent princess, and the wealth of England was preserved. For this is credibly to be supposed, that the said wicked Gardiner, of Winchester, had long laboured his wits, and to this only most principal mark bent all his devices, to take this our happy and dear sovereign out of the way; as both by his words and doings before notified, may sufficiently appear.

But such was the gracious and favourable providence of the Lord, to the preservation not only of her royal majesty, but also of the miserable and woful state of this whole island, and poor subjects of the same, whereby the proud platforms and peevish practices of this wicked Ahithophel prevailed not: but contrariwise, both he and all the snares and traps of his pernicious council laid against another, were turned to a net to catch himself, according to the proverb, "The mischief he designed for another, fell upon his own head."

After the death of this Gardiner, followed the death also and drooping away of other her enemies, where by little and little her jeopardy decreased, fear diminished, hope of comfort began to appear as out of a dark cloud: and albeit as yet her grace had no full assurance of perfect safety, yet more gentle entertainment daily did grow unto her, till at length in the month of November, and seventeenth day of the same, three years after the death of Stephen Gardiner, followed the death of queen Mary.

Although this history following be not directly appertaining to the former matter, yet the same may here not unaptly be inserted, for that it doth discover and shew forth the malicious hearts of the papists to the lady Elizabeth in the time of queen Mary her sister, which is reported, by sundry honest persons, of unquestionable credit. The matter whereof is this.

Soon after the stir of Wyat, and the troubles that happened to the lady Elizabeth for that cause, it happened that one Robert Farrer, a haberdasher of London, dwelling near Newgate-market, in a certain morning was at the Rose tavern, where chanced to meet him one Laurence Shirriff, grocer, dwelling also not far from thence; they drinking together as good friends (as they had been for a long time before), Farrer being a little elevated, and not considering who were present, began to talk at large against the lady Elizabeth, and said, That jilt hath been one of the chief doers in this rebellion of Wyat, and before all be done, she and all the heretics shall well understand it. Some of them hope that she shall have the crown, but she and they (I trust) that so hope, shall hop headless, or be fried with faggots before she come to it.

Laurence, the grocer, being sworn servant to the lady Elizabeth, could no longer bear these scandalous expressions of his old acquaintance concerning his mistress, but said to him, Farrer, I have loved thee as a neighbour, and have had a good opinion of thee, but in this I defy thee; and I tell thee I am her grace's sworn servant, and she is a princess, and the daughter of a noble king, and it doth not become thee to call her a jilt; and for thy so saying, I say thou art a knave, and I will complain of thee. Do thy worst, said Farrer, for what I said, I will say again; and so Shirriff went out of his company.

Shortly after, the said Shirriff, taking an honest neighbour with him, went before the commissioners to complain, who sat then at bishop Bonner's house near St. Paul's, Bonner being then chief commissioner, the lord Mordaunt, sir John Baker, Dr. Darbishire, chancellor to the bishop, Dr. Story, Dr. Harpsfield, and others, being present.

Mr. Shirriff coming before them, declared the manner of Farrer's talk against the lady Elizabeth. Bonner answered, Peradventure you took him worse than he meant.

Yea, my lord, said Dr. Story, if you knew the man as I do, you would say there is not a better catholic, nor an honest man in the city of London.

Well, said Mr. Shirriff, my lord, she is my gracious lady and mistress, and it is not to be suffered that such a varlet as he is should call so honourable a princess by the name of jilt: and I saw yesterday at court that my lord cardinal Poole, meeting her in the chamber of presence, kneeled down on his knees and kissed her hand; and I saw also that king Philip meeting her, made her such obeisance, that his knee touched the ground, and then methinketh it were too much to suffer such a varlet as this is, to call her jilt, and to wish them to hop headless that shall wish her grace to enjoy the possession of the crown, when God shall send it unto her, as in the right of her inheritance.

Yea; stay there, quoth Bonner. When God sendeth it unto her, let her enjoy it. But truly (said he) the man that spake the words that you have reported, meant nothing against the lady Elizabeth your mistress, and no more do we: but he like an honest and zealous man feared the alteration of religion, which every good man ought to fear: and therefore (said Bonner), good man, go your ways home and report well of us to your mistress, and we will send for Farrer and will rebuke him for his rash and indiscreet words, and we trust he will not do the like again. And thus Shirriff came away, and Farrer had a slap with a fox's tail.

Queen Mary, being long sick before, upon the 17th day of November, in the year above mentioned, about three or four o'clock in the morning, yielded her life to nature, and her kingdom to queen Elizabeth her sister. Concerning whose death, some say that she died of a tympany, some (by her great sighing before her death) supposed she died of thought and sorrow. Whereupon her council seeing her sighing, and desirous to know the cause, to the end they might the more readily minister consolation unto her, feared, as they said, that she took that thought for the king her husband, who was gone from her. To whom she answering, said, Indeed that may be one cause, but that is not the greatest wound that pierceth my oppressed mind; but what that was, she would not express to them.

However afterward she opened the matter more plainly to Mr. Rife and Mrs. Clarencius (if it be true what they told me, who heard it of Mr. Rife himself), who then being most familiar with her, told her, that they feared she took thought for king Philip's departing from her. Not that only, said she, but when I am dead and opened, you shall find Calais lying in my heart, &c. And here is an end of queen Mary, and of her persecutions.

Of which queen this truly may be affirmed, and left in story for a perpetual memorial or epitaph, for all kings and queens that shall succeed her to be noted, That before her never was read in the history of any king or queen of England, since the time of king Lucius, under whom in time of peace, by hanging, beheading, burning, and imprisoning, so much christian blood was spilled, and so many Englishmen's lives lost within this realm, as under the said queen Mary for the space of four years was to be seen, and I beseech the Lord never may be seen hereafter.

A brief Declaration, shewing the unprosperous Success of Queen MARY in persecuting God's People, and how mightily God wrought against her in all her Affairs.

AS queen Mary during all her reign was such a vehement adversary against the sincere professors of Christ and his gospel; for which there be many who do highly magnify and approve her doings therein: to the intent therefore that all men may understand, how the blessing of God did not only not attend her proceedings, but contrariwise rather how his manifest displeasure ever wrought against her, in plaguing both her and her realm, and subverting all her counsels and attempts, whatsoever she took in hand, we will bestow a little time therein, to survey the whole course of her actions, and consider what success she had in the same. Which being well considered, we shall never find any reign of any prince in this land, or any other, which did ever shew in it (for the proportion of time) so many arguments of God's wrath and displeasure, as were to be seen in the reign of this queen, whether we behold the shortness of her time, or the unfortunate events of all her purposes, who seemed never to purpose any thing that came luckily to pass, neither did any thing frame to her purpose, whatsoever she took in hand touching her own private affairs.

Of good kings we read in scripture, in shewing mercy and pity, in seeking God's will in his word, and subverting the monuments of idolatry, how God blessed their ways, increased their honours, and mightily prospered all their proceedings, as we see in king David, Solomon, Josias, Josaphat, Ezechias, with such others; Manasses made the streets of Jerusalem to swim with the blood of his subjects; but what came of it, the text doth testify.

Of queen Elizabeth, who now reigneth among us, this we must needs say, which we see, that she in sparing the blood, not only of God's servants, but also of God's enemies, hath doubled now the reign of queen Mary her sister, with such abundance of peace and prosperity, that it is hard to say, whether the realm of England felt more of God's wrath in queen Mary's time, or of God's favour and mercy in these blessed days of queen Elizabeth.

Gamaliel, speaking his mind in the council of the Pharisees concerning Christ's religion, gave this reason, that if it were not of God, it could not stand. So may it be said of queen Mary and her Romish religion, that if it were so perfect and catholic as they pretend, and the contrary faith of the gospellers were so detestable and heretical as they make it; how cometh it then, that this so catholic a queen, such a necessary pillar of his spouse the church, continued no longer, till she had utterly rooted out of the land this heretical generation? yea, how chanced it rather, that Almighty God, to spare these poor heretics, rooted out queen Mary so soon from her throne, after she had reigned but only five years and five months?

Further, how God blessed her ways and endeavours in the mean time, while she thus persecuted the true servants of God, remaineth to be discussed. Where this is first to be noted, that when she first began to stand for the title of the crown, and yet had wrought no resistance against Christ and his gospel, but had promised her faith to the Suffolk men, to maintain the religion left by king Edward her brother, so long God went with her, advanced her, and by the means of the gospellers brought her to the possession of the realm. But after that, the breaking her promise with God and man, began to take part with Stephen Gardiner, and had given over her supremacy to the pope, by and by God's blessing left her, neither did any thing thrive well with her afterward, during the time of her government.

For first, the greatest and finest ship she had, called Great Harry, was burnt; such a vessel as was not to be matched in these parts of Europe.

Then would she needs bring in king Philip, and by her strange marriage with him, to make the whole realm of England subject to a stranger. And all that notwithstanding, that she either did, or was able to do, she could not bring to pass to set the crown of England on his head. With king Philip came in the pope and his popish mass; with whom also her purpose was to restore again the monks and nuns to their places, neither lacked there any attempts to the utmost of her power; and yet therein God stopt her of her will, that it came not forward. After this, what a famine happened in her time here in her land? The like whereof hath not been in England, insomuch that in sundry places her poor subjects were forced to live upon acorns for want of corn.

Furthermore where other kings are wont to be renowned by some worthy victory and valour atchieved, let us now see what valiant victory was gotten in this queen Mary's days. King Edward the Sixth, her blessed brother, how many rebellions did he suppress in Devonshire, in Norfolk, in Oxfordshire, and elsewhere? What a famous victory was got in his time in Scotland, by the singular working (no doubt) of God's blessed hand, rather than by any expectation of man? King Edward the Third (which was the eleventh king from the conquest) by princely puissance purchased Calais unto England, which hath been kept English ever since, till at length came queen Mary, the eleventh likewise from the said king Edward, who lost Calais from England again; so that the victories of this queen were very small, and what the losses were let other men judge.

Hitherto the affairs of queen Mary have had no great success, as you have heard: but never had any woman worse success than she had in her childbirth. For seeing one of these two must needs be granted, that either she was with child, or not with child; if she were with child, why was it not seen? If she were not, how was all the realm deluded? And in the mean while, where were all the prayers, the solemn processions, the devout masses of the catholic clergy? Why did they not prevail with God, if their religion were so godly as they pretend? If their masses indeed be able to fetch Christ from heaven, and to reach down to purgatory; how chanced it then they could not reach to the queen's chamber, to help her in her travail, if she had been with child indeed? If not, how then came it to pass that all the catholic church of England did so err, and was so deeply deceived? Queen Mary, after these manifold plagues and corrections, which might sufficiently admonish her of God's disfavour provoked against her, would not yet cease her persecution, but still continued more and more to revenge her catholic zeal upon the Lord's faithful people, setting fire to their poor bodies by dozens and half dozens. Whereupon God's wrathful indignation, increasing more and more against her, ceased not to touch her more near with private misfortunes and calamities. For after that he had taken from her the fruit of children (which chiefly and above all things she desired), then he bereft her of that, which of all earthly things should have been her chief stay of honour, and staff of comfort, that is, withdrew from her the affection and company, even of her own husband, by whose marriage she had promised before to herself whole heaps of such joy and felicity; but the omnipotent Governor of all things so turned the wheel of her own spinning against her, that her high buildings of such joys and felicities came all to nothing; her hopes being confounded, her purposes disappointed, and she also brought to desolation; who seemed neither to have the favour of God, nor the hearts of her subjects, nor even the love of her husband; who neither had fruit by him while she had him, neither could enjoy him whom she had married, nor yet at liberty to marry any other whom she might. Now observe the woeful adversity of this queen, and learn hence what the Lord can do when man's wilfulness will needs resist him, and will not be ruled.

At last, when all these fair admonitions would take no place with the queen, nor move her to revoke her bloody laws, nor to stay the tyranny of her priests, nor yet to spare her own subjects, but that the servants of God were drawn daily by heaps most pitifully as sheep to the slaughter, it so pleased the heavenly Majesty of Almighty God, when no other remedy would serve, seasonably to cut her off by death, who in her life so little regarded the lives of others, giving her throne, which she abused to the destruction of Christ's church and people, to another who more temperately and quietly could guide the same, after she had reigned here the space of five years and five months. The shortness of whose reign, scarce we find in any other story of king or queen since the conquest or before (being come to their own government), save only king Richard III.

And thus much here, as in the closing up of this story I thought to insinuate, touching the unlucky and deplorable reign of queen Mary: not for any detraction to her place and state-royal, whereunto she was called of the Lord, but to this only intent and effect, that forso-much as she would needs set herself so confidently to work and strive against the Lord and his proceedings, all readers and rulers may not only see how the Lord did work against her therefore, but also by her may be advertised and learn what a dangerous thing it is for men and women in authority, upon blind zeal and opinion, to stir up persecution in the christian church, to the effusion of christian blood, lest it prove in the end with them (as it did here), that while they think to persecute heretics, they stumble at the same stone as did the Jews in persecuting Christ and his true members to death, to their own confusion and destruction.

The severe Punishment of God upon the Persecutors of his People and Enemies to his Word, with such also as have been Blasphemers, Contemners, and Mockers.

QUEEN MARY being dead and gone, we will now leave her, and treat of those under her who were the chief instruments in this persecution, the bishops and and clergy, to whom she, as a true catholic, gave all the execution of her power, as did queen Alexandra to the Pharisees after the time of the Maccabees; of whom Josephus thus writeth: She only retained to herself the name and title of the kingdom, but all her power she gave to the pharisees to possess, &c. Touching which prelates and priests, here is to be noted in like manner the wonderful and miraculous providence of Almighty God, which as he shortened the reign of their queen, so he suffered them not to escape unvisited: first beginning with Stephen Gardiner, the arch-persecutor of Christ's church, whom he took away about the midst of the queen's reign; of whose poisoned life and stinking end, so much as sufficient hath been touched before, I need not here make rehearsal thereof.

After him dropped away others also, some before the death of queen Mary, and some after, as Morgan, bishop of St. David's, who sitting upon the condemnation of bishop Farrer, and unjustly usurping his room, not long after was struck by God's hand in such a strange manner that his meat would not go down, but rise and puke up again, sometimes at his mouth, sometimes blown out at his nose, most nauseous to behold, and so he continued till his death.

Where note moreover, that when Mr. Leyson, being then sheriff at bishop Farrer's burning, had brought away the cattle of the said bishop, from his servant's house, named Matthew Harbottel, into his own custody, the cattle coming into the sheriff's ground, divers of them would never eat meat, but lay bellowing and roaring, and so died.

What a stroke of God's hand was brought upon the cruel persecutor of the holy saints of God, bishop Thornton, suffragan of Dover, who after he had exercised his cruel tyranny upon so many pious men at Canterbury, at length coming upon a Saturday from the chapter-house at Canterbury to Borne, and there upon Sunday following looking upon his men playing at bowls, fell suddenly in a palsy, and so had to bed, was willed to remember God: Yea, so I do, said he, and my lord cardinal too, &c.

After him succeeded another bishop or suffragan, ordained by the aforesaid cardinal. It is reported that he had been suffragan before to Bonner, who, not long after being made bishop or suffragan of Dover, broke his neck falling down a pair of stairs in the cardinal's chamber at Greenwich, as he had received the cardinal's blessing.

John Cooper, of the age of 44 years, dwelling at Watfarnham, in the county of Suffolk, a carpenter by trade, a man of a very honest report, and a good house-keeper, a harbourer of strangers that travelled for conscience, and one that favoured religion, and those that were religious.

This man being at home, there came unto him one William Fenning, a serving-man, dwelling in the said town of Watfarnham, and understanding that the said Cooper had a couple of fat bullocks, and did desire to buy them of him, because he had brought them up for his own use, and if he should sell them, he then must be compelled to buy others, and that he would not do.

When Fenning saw he could not get them (for he had often tried), he said, he would sit as much in his light, and so departed, and went and accused him of high-treason. The words he was charged with were these, How he should pray, if God would not take away queen Mary, that then the devil would take her away. Of these words did this Fenning charge him before sir Henry Doiel, knight (unto whom he was carried by Mr. Timperley, of Hinclesham, in Suffolk, and one Grimwood, of Lowshaw, constable), which words Cooper flatly denied; and said he never spoke them; but that did not avail.

Notwithstanding that, he was arraigned at Bury, before sir Clement Higham, at a Lent assize, and there this Fenning brought two vile men, that witnessed to the speaking of the aforesaid words, whose names were Richard White, of Watfarnham, and Grimwood, of Hitcham, in the said county of Suffolk. Whose testimony was received as truth, although this good man John Cooper, had said what he could to declare himself innocent therein, but to no purpose, God knows. For his life was determined, as in the end appeared by sir Clement Higham's words, who said he should not escape, for an example to all heretics, as indeed he thoroughly performed: for immediately he was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, which was accordingly performed soon after, to the great grief of many a good heart. Here good Cooper is bereft of his life, and leaves behind him a wife and nine children, with goods and cattle to the value of 300 marks, all which substance was taken away by the said sir Henry Doiel, sheriff, but his wife and poor children were left to the wide world in their clothes, and suffered not to enjoy one penny of that they had sore laboured for, unless they made friends to buy it with money of the said sheriff, so cruel and greedy was he and his officers upon such things as were there left.

Now, this innocent man being dead, his goods spoiled, his wife and children left desolate and comfortless, and all things hushed, and nothing feared of any part: yet the Lord, who surely doth revenge the guiltless blood, would not still so suffer it, but at length began to punish it himself. For in the harvest following, as the said Grimwood, of Hitcham, one of the witnesses before mentioned, was at his labour stacking up a goss of corn, being in health, and fearing no danger, suddenly his bowels fell out of his body, and thus most miserably he died: such was the terrible judgment of God, to shew his displeasure against his bloody act, and to warn the rest by these his judgments to repentance. The Lord grant us to honour the same, for his mercy's sake. Amen.

In the story of Mr. Bradford mention was made before of Mr. Woodroffe, who being the sheriff, used much to rejoice at the death of the poor saints of Christ, and so hard was he in his office, that when Mr. Rogers was in the cart going towards Smithfield, in the way his children were brought unto him, the people making a lane for them to come; Mr. Woodroffe had the carman's head broken, because of his stopping his cart. But what happened? He was not come out of his office the space of a week, but he was stricken suddenly by the hand of God, the one half of his body was in such a condition, that he lay benumbed and bed-ridden, not able to move himself, but as he was lifted by others; and so he continued in that infirmity the space of seven or eight years, till his dying day.

Likewise touching Ralph Lardin, the betrayer of George Eagles, it is thought by some, that the said Ralph was afterward attached himself, arraigned, and hanged.

Who, being at the bar, before the judges, and a great number of people, spake these words: This is most justly fallen upon me, for that I have betrayed the innocent blood of that good and just man George Eagles, who was here condemned in the time of queen Mary through my procurement, when I sold his blood for a little money.

Among other persecutors, there came also to our hands the cruelty of one Mr. Swingfield, an alderman's deputy about Thames-street, who hearing one Angel's wife, a midwife, that kept herself from their popish church, to be at the labour of one Mrs. Walter, at Crooked-lane end, took with him three more, and beset the house about, and took her and carried her to Bonner's officers, big with child, twenty-eight weeks gone, who laid her in Lollards' Tower; where, the same day she came in, through fear, and a fall at her taking, she was delivered of a male child, and could have no women to assist her in that needful time. Lying there five weeks, she was delivered under sureties by friendship; and Dr. Story hearing thereof, charged her with felony, and so sent her to Newgate. The cause was, because that she having a woman at her house that died in labour, and the child also, and so charged her with both their deaths.

But when sir Roger Cholmley heard her tell her tale, he delivered her; and not much more than ten weeks after, if it were so long, died the said Mr. Swingfield, and the other three that came to take her.

Because some there be, and not a few, who have such great devotion in setting up the popish mass, I would desire them to mark well the following story. There was a certain bailiff, of Crowland, in Lincolnshire, named Burton, who pretending an earnest friendship to the gospel in king Edward's days, at least in outward shew (although inwardly he was a papist or atheist, and well known to be a man of a wicked and adulterous life), set forth the king's proceedings lustily, till the time that king Edward was dead, and queen Mary placed quietly in her estate.

Then perceiving by the first proclamation concerning religion, how the world was like to turn, the bailiff turned his religion likewise; and so he moved the parish to shew themselves the queen's friends, and so set up the mass speedily. Nevertheless the most substantial of the parish marvelling much at the bailiff's inconstancy, considering also his abominable life, and having no great devotion unto his request, knowing moreover that their duty and friendship to the queen stood not in setting up the mass, spared to provide for it, as long they might, but the bailiff called on them still in the queen's name.

At last, when he saw his words were not regarded, and purposing to win his spurs by playing the man in the mass's behalf and the queen's, he got him to church upon a Sunday morning, when the curate was beginning the English service, according to the statute set forth by king Edward the Sixth; the bailiff cometh in a great rage to the curate, and saith, Sirrah, will you not say mass? Buckle yourself to mass, you knave, or by God's blood I shall sheath my dagger in your shoulder. The poor curate for fear settled himself to the mass.

Not long after this, the bailiff rode from home upon certain business, accompanied by one of his neighbours, and as they came riding together upon the Fennebank homeward again, a crow sitting in a willow-tree took her flight over his head, singing after her wonted note, knave, knave, and withal let fall upon his face, so that her excrements ran from the top of his nose down to his beard.

The poisoned scent and savour whereof so annoyed his stomach, that he never ceased vomiting until he came home, wherewith his heart was so sore, and his body so distempered, that through extreme sickness he got him to bed, and so lying, he was not able for the stink in his stomach and painful vomiting, to receive any relief of meat or drink, but cried out still, sorrowfully complaining of that stink, and with no small oaths cursed the crow that poisoned him. To make short, he continued but a few days, but with extreme pain of vomiting and crying, he desperately died, without any token of repentance of his former life.

Reported and testified for a certainty, by divers of his neighbours, both honest and credible persons.

As James Abbes was led by the sheriff towards his martyrdom, divers poor people stood in the way, and asked their alms. He then having no money to give them, and desirous yet to distribute something amongst them, did pull off his apparel, saving his shirt, and gave the same unto them, to some one thing, to some another, in the giving whereof he exhorted them to be strong in the Lord, and as faithful followers of Christ, to stand stedfast unto the truth of the gospel, which he (through God's help) would then in their fight seal and confirm with his blood. While he was thus charitably occupied, and zealously instructing the people, a servant of the sheriff's going by and hearing him, cried out aloud unto them, and blasphemously said, Believe him not, good people, he is an heretic and a mad-man, out of his wits; believe him not, for it is heresy that he saith. And as the other continued in his godly admonitions, so did this wicked wretch still blow forth his blasphemous exclamations, until they came unto the stake where he should suffer. Unto which this constant martyr was tied, and in the end cruelly burned, as in his story more fully is already declared.

But immediately after the fire was put unto him (such was the fearful stroke of God's justice upon this blasphemous railer), that he was there presently, in the sight of all the people, stricken with a frenzy, wherewith he had before most railingly charged that good martyr of God, who in this furious rage and madness casting off his shoes with all the rest of his clothes, cried out unto the people, and said, Thus did James Abbes the true servant of God, who is saved, but I am damned. And thus ran he round about the town of Bury, still crying out, that James Abbes was a good man and saved, but he was damned.

The sheriff then being amazed, caused him to be taken and tied in a dark house, and by force compelled him again to put on his clothes, thinking thereby within a while to bring him to some quietness. But (all that notwithstanding) as soon as they were gone, he continued his former raging, and casting off his clothes, cried as he did before, James Abbes is the servant of God, and is saved, but I am damned.

At length he was tied at a cart, and brought home to his master's house, and within half a year or thereabouts, he being at the point of death, the priest of the parish was sent for: who coming unto him, brought with him the crucifix, and their houseling host of the altar. Which gear when the poor wretch saw, he cried out to the priest, and defied all that baggage, saying, that the priest, with such others as he was, was the cause of his damnation, and that James Abbes was a good man and saved. And so shortly after died.

Clark, an open enemy to the gospel and all godly preachers, in king Edward's days hanged himself in the Tower of London.

The great and notable papist, called Troling Smith, of late fell down suddenly in the street, and died.

Dale, the promoter, was eaten into his body with lice, and so died, as it is well known of many, and confessed also by his fellow John Avaes, before credible witnesses.

Alexander, the keeper of Newgate, a cruel enemy to those that lay there for religion, died very miserably, being so swollen, that he was more like a monster than a man, and so rotten within, that no man could abide the smell of him. This cruel wretch, to hasten the poor lambs to the slaughter, would go to Bonner, Story, Cholmley, and others, crying out, Rid my prison, rid my prison. I am too much pestered with these heretics.

The son of the said Alexander, called James, having left unto him by his father great substance, within three years wasted all to nought: and when some marvelled how he spent these goods so fast: O, said he, evil gotten, evil spent; and shortly after, as he went in Newgate-market, he fell down suddenly, and there wretchedly died.

John Peter, son-in-law to this Alexander, and an horrible blasphemer of God, and no less cruel to the said prisoners, rotted away, and so most miserably died. Who commonly, when he would affirm any thing, were it true or false, used to say, If it be not true, I pray God I rot ere I die. Witness the printer hereof, with divers others.

And what a notable spectacle of God's revenging judgment have we to consider in Sir Ralph Ellerker, who as he was desirous to see the heart taken out of Adam Damlip, whom they most wrongfully put to death: so shortly after the said Sir Ralph Ellerker being slain of the French, they fell to mangling him, and after they had cut off his privy members, would not so leave him before they might see his heart cut out of his body.

Stephen Gardiner, hearing of the pitiful end of judge Hales, after he had drowned himself, taking occasion thereby, called the following and profession of the gospel a doctrine of desperation. But as judge Hales never fell into that inconvenience before he had consented to papistry; so who so well considereth the end of doctor Pendleton, (which at his death full sore repented that ever he had yielded to the doctrine of the papists as he did) and likewise the miserable end of the most part of the the papists besides, and especially of Stephen Gardiner himself, who after so long professing the doctrine of papistry, when there came a bishop to him on his death-bed, and put him in remembrance of Peter denying his master; he answering again, said, that he had denied with Peter, but never repented with Peter, and so both stinking and unrepentedly died, will say, as Stephen Gardiner also himself gave an evident example of the same to all men, to understand that popery rather is a doctrine of desperation, procuring the vengeance of Almighty God to them that wilfully do cleave unto it.

And thus much concerning those persecutors.

The persecuting clergy who died in the time of persecution, we shall take no notice of, but those who remained after the death of queen Mary were deprived, and committed to several prisons.

In the Tower.

Nicholas Heath, archbishop of York, and lord chancellor.

Thomas Thirlby, bishop of Ely.

Thomas Watson, bishop of Lincoln.

Gilbert Bourne, bishop of Bath and Wells.

Richard Pates, bishop of Worcester.

Troublefield, bishop of Exeter.

John Fecknam, abbot of Westminster.

John Borall, dean of Windsor and Peterborough.

Of David Pool, bishop of Peterborough, it is not known whether he was in the Tower, or in some other prison.

Goldwel, bishop of St. Asaph, and Maurice, elect of Bangor, ran away.

Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, in the Marshalsea.

Thomas Wood, bishop elect, in the Marshalsea.

Cuthbert Scot, bishop of Chester, was in the Fleet, from whence he escaped to Louvain, and there died.

In the Fleet.

Henry Cole, dean of St. Paul's.

John Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, and dean of Norwich.

Nicholas Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury.

Anthony Draycot, archdeacon of Huntingdon.

William Chedsey, archdeacon of Middlesex.

Concerning which doctor Chedsey here is to be noted, that in the beginning of king Edward's reign he recanted and subscribed to thirty-four articles, wherein he then fully consented and agreed with his own hand-writing to the whole form of doctrine approved and allowed then in the church, as well concerning justification by faith only, as also the doctrine of the two sacraments then received, denying as well the pope's supremacy, transubstantiation, purgatory, invocation of saints, elevation and adoration of the sacrament, the sacrifice, and veneration of the mass, as also all other like excrements of popish superstition, according to the king's book then set forth.

Wherefore the more marvellous it is, that he, being counted so famous and learned a clerk, would shew himself so fickle and unstable in his assertions, so double in his doing, to altar his religion according to time, and to maintain for truth, not what he thought best, but what he might most safely defend. So long as the state of the lord protector and of his brother stood upright, what was then the conformity of this doctor Chedsey, his own articles in Latin, written and subscribed with his own hand, do declare, what I have to shew, if he will deny them. But after the decay of the king's uncles, the fortune of them turned not so fast, but his religion turned withal, and he took upon him to dispute with Peter Martyr, in upholding transubstantiation, at Oxford, which a little before with his own hand-writing he had overthrown.

After this ensued the time of queen Mary, wherein doctor Chedsey, to shew his double diligence, was so eager in his commission to sit in judgment, and to bring poor men to their death, that in the last year of queen Mary, when the lord chancellor, sir Thomas Cornwallis, lord Clinton, and divers others of the council had sent for him by a special letter to repair to London out of Essex, he writing again to the bishop of London, sought means not to come at the desire of the council, but to continue still in his persecuting progress. The copy of whose letter I have also in my hands (if need were) to bring forth.

It happened in the first year of queen Elizabeth, that one William Mauldon was bound servant to one Mr. Hugh Aparry, then a wheat-taker for the queen, dwelling at Greenwich; who being newly come to him, and having no book there to look upon, being desirous to occupy himself virtuously, looked about the house, and found a primer in English, wherein he read on a winter's evening. While he was reading, there sat one John Apowel, that had been a serving-man, about thirty years of age, born in Wales, whom the said Mr. Hugh gave meat and drink unto, till such time as he could get a service. And as William Mauldon read in the book, the said John Apowel mocked after every word, with contrary and flouting words irreverently, insomuch that he could no longer abide him for grief of heart, but turned to him and said, John, take heed what thou dost; thou dost not mock me, but thou mockest God: for in mocking of his word, thou mockest him; and this is the word of God, though I be simple that read it; and therefore beware what thou dost.

Then Mauldon fell to reading again, and still he proceeded on in his mocking; and when Mauldon had read certain English prayers, in the end he read, Lord have mercy upon us, Christ have mercy upon us, &c.

And as Mauldon was reciting these words, the other with a start suddenly said, Lord have mercy upon me.

With that Mauldon said, What ailest thou, John?

He said, I was afraid.

Whereof wast thou afraid? said Mauldon.

Nothing now, said the other: and so he would not tell him. After this, when Mauldon and he went to bed, Mauldon asked him what he was afraid of.

He said, when you read, Lord have mercy upon us, &c. methought the hair of my head stood upright, with a great fear which came upon me.

Then said Mauldon, John, thou mayest see, the evil spirit could not abide that Christ should have mercy upon us. Well, John, said Mauldon, repent and amend thy life, for God will not be mocked. If we mock and jest at his word, he will punish us.

Also you use ribaldry words, and swearing very much: therefore, for God's sake, John, amend thy life. So I will (said he) by the grace of God; I pray God I may. Amen, said the other, with other words, and so went to bed.

On the morrow, about eight o'clock in the morning, John came running down out of his chamber in his shirt into the hall, and wrestled with his mistress as if he would have thrown her down. Whereat she shrieked out, and called her servants to help her, and took by strength and carried him up unto his bed, and there bound him; for they perceived plainly that he was out of his right mind.

After that, as he lay, almost a day and a night, his tongue never ceased, but he cried out of the devil of hell, and his words were ever still, O the devil of hell; now the devil of hell, I would see the devil of hell, there he is, there he goeth, &c.

Thus he lay without amendment about six days, that his master and all the family being weary of the noise, agreed with the keepers of Bedlam, and gave a piece of money, and sent him thither.

This is a terrible example to you that be mockers of God: therefore repent and amend, lest the vengeance of God fall upon you in like manner. Witness hereof, William Mauldon, of Newington.

The same William Mauldon chanced afterwards to dwell at a town six miles from London, called Walthamstow, where his wife taught young children to read, which was about the year of our Lord, 1563, and the fourth year of queen Elizabeth's reign. Unto this school, amongst other children, came one Benfield's daughter, named Dennis, about the age of twelve years.

As these children were talking together, they happened among other talk (as the nature of children is to be busy with many things) to fall into communication of God, and to reason among themselves, after their childish discretion, what he should be. Some answered one thing, some another. Among whom, when one of the children had said, He was a good old Father, Dennis Benfield said, He is an old doating fool.

What wretched and blasphemous words were those you heard? Now mark what followed.

When Mauldon heard of these abominable words of the girl, he desired his wife to correct her for the same; which was appointed to be done the next day; but when the morrow came, her mother would needs send her to London market: the girl greatly intreated her mother that she might not go; however, through her mother's compulsion, she was forced to go. And what happened? Her business being done at London, as she was returning again homeward, a little beyond Hackney, she was suddenly struck on one side, which turned black, and she speechless. Whereupon she was carried back to Hackney, and there died the same night. Witness of the same, William Mauldon and his wife, also Benfield her father, and mother.

A dreadful example, no doubt, both to old and young, what it is for children to blaspheme the Lord their God, and what it is for parents to suffer their young ones to grow up in such blasphemous blindness, and not to nurture them betimes in the rudiments of the christian catechism, to know first their creation, and then their redemption in Christ our Saviour, to fear the name of God, and to reverence his Majesty. For what else do they deserve but to be taken away by death, who contemptuously despise him they derive the benefit of life from?

Therefore let all young maids, boys, and young men, take example by this wretched creature, not only to avoid blaspheming the sacred Majesty of the omnipotent God their creator, but also not once to take his name in vain, as they are taught in his commandments.

Secondly, let all fathers, godfathers, and godmothers, take this for a warning, to see to the instruction and catechising of their children, for whom they have bound themselves in promise both to God and to his church: for if the father and godfather, the mother and godmothers, had done their duty by this young girl, this destruction might not have fallen upon her.

Thirdly, let all blind atheists, epicures, mammonists, belly-gods of this world, and sons of Belial, hypocrites, infidels, and mockers of religion, who say in their hearts, there is no God, learn also hereby not only what God is, and what he is able to do, but also in this miserable creature here punished in this world, behold what shall likewise fall on them in the world to come, unless they will be warned betimes by such examples as the Lord doth give them.

Fourthly and lastly, here may also be a spectacle for all those who are blasphemers and abominable swearers, or rather tearers of God, abusing his glorious name in such a contemptuous and despiteful manner as they frequently do: whom if neither the command of God, nor the calling of the preacher, nor remorse of conscience, nor rule of reason, nor their withering age, nor hoary hairs, will admonish, yet let these terrible examples of God's strict judgment somewhat move them to take heed to themselves. For if this young maiden, who was not full twelve years old, for her irreverent speaking of God (and that but at one time) did not escape the stroke of God's terrible hand, what then have they to look for, who being men grown in years, and often warned by the preacher, yet cease not continually with their blasphemous oaths, not only to abuse his name, but also most contumeliously to tear him (as it were) and all his parts to pieces?

Did not Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, give sentence against the lord Cobham, and died himself before him, being so mortified in his tongue, that he could neither swallow nor speak for some time before his death?

William Swallow, the cruel tormentor of George Eagles, was shortly after so plagued of God, that all the hair of his head, and nails of his fingers and toes, went off, his eyes almost closed up, that he could scarce see.

I trust, however, the gospel of Christ being now received in the queen's court amongst the courtiers and servants of her guard, hath framed their lives and manners in the due fear of God, and temperance of life, with all sobriety, and merciful compassion towards their own christians, that they need not greatly any other instructions to be given them in this story: yet forasmuch as examples frequently operate more effectually on the minds and memories of men; and also partly considering with myself how these, above all other sorts of men in the whole realm, in time past ever had most need of such wholesome lessons and admonitions, to leave their inordinate riot of drunkenness, and their heathenish prophaneness of life, I thought it may not be improper here to set before their eyes a terrible example, not of a strange and foreign person, but of one of their own coat, a yeoman of the guards, not feigned by me, but brought to me by God's providence, for a warning to all courtiers, and of very truth no longer ago than in the year of our Lord 1568: and as the story is true, so is the name of the party not unknown, being called Christopher Landesdale, living in Hackney, in Middlesex: the order of whose life, and manner of his death, being worthy to be noted, is as follows.

This Landesdale, who was married to an old woman of considerable property, lived notwithstanding in a state of whoredom with a younger woman, by whom he had two children, a son and a daughter, whom he kept in his own house till his decease. It was customary for him, when he should have been serving God on the sabbath-day, to be riding or walking about his fields, neither he nor any of his house coming to church after the English service was again received. Besides this, he was a great swearer, and a great drunkard, and also took great delight in making other men drunk, whom, when he had made drunkards, he would have to call him father, and he would call them his sons; and of these sons, by report, he had above forty. If he saw a man that would drink freely, he would take great notice of him, and spend his money cheerfully with him in ale or wine, but mostly in wine, to make him the sooner drunk. These blessed sons of his would have great cheer oftentimes, both at his own house and at taverns: and not long before his death, he was so very much disguised with liquor, at a tavern opposite his own house, that he fell down in a state of insensibility; nor could he arise till helped up, and carried home.

This father of drunkards, as he was a great feaster of the rich and wealthy of Hackney, and others, so his poor neighbours and tenants fared little the better for him, except it were with some broken meat, which, after his feasts his wife would send unto them, or some alms given at his door.

Besides all this, he did much injury to his poor neighbours, in turning his cattle on the adjoining commons, which eat up all from the poor without pity or mercy.

About two years before he died, a poor man, who was ill of a flux, happened, through weakness, to lie down in a ditch of the said Landesdale's, a small distance from his house, where he had a little straw brought him. Notwithstanding the said Landesdale had out-houses and barns enough to have laid him in, but would not shew him so much pity. In that situation the poor man lay night and day about six weeks before he died.

Certain good neighbours hearing of this, procured things necessary for his relief, but he was so far spent that he could not be recovered; lying in the hot sun, with a horrible smell, most pitiful to behold.

A little before this poor man died, he desired to be moved to another ditch more shady. Whereupon one of the neighbours coming to Landesdale's wife for a bundle of straw for him to sit upon, she required to have him removed to Newington side, because, she said, if he should die, it would be very far to carry him to the church.

Besides

Besides this, there was a marriage in Landesdale's house, and the guests that came to the marriage gave the poor man money as they passed, and repassed him, but Landesdale disdained to contribute any thing to his relief, notwithstanding that he had promised to Mr. Searles, one of the queen's guard, who had more pity on him, to minister to him things necessary.

To be short, the next day poor Lazarus departed this life, and was buried in Hackney church-yard; upon whom Landesdale did not so much as bestow a winding-sheet towards his burial. And thus much concerning the end of poor Lazarus. Now let us hear what became of the rich glutton.

About two years after, the said Landesdale being full of liquor (as his custom was), came riding in great haste from London on St. Andrew's day, 1568, and as was reported by those who saw him, reeling to and fro, with his hat in his hand, and coming by a ditch, tumbled headlong into it. Some say that the horse fell upon him, but that is improbable. True it is, however, that the horse, more sober than his master, came home, leaving him behind. Whether he broke his neck with the fall, or was drowned, (though the water was scarce a foot deep) is uncertain; but certain it is, he was there found dead. Being thus found dead in the ditch, the coroner (as is the custom) sat upon him: and how the matter was managed to save his goods, the Lord knoweth; but the goods were saved, and the poor horse indicted for his master's death.

The neighbours hearing of this man's death, and considering the manner thereof, said it was justly fallen upon him, that, as he suffered the poor man to lie and die in a ditch near his own house, so his end was to die in a ditch likewise. And thus, christian reader, in this story, I have set before your eyes the true image of a rich glutton and poor Lazarus; by which we may discover what happeneth in the end to such voluptuous epicures and atheists, who, being void of all sense of religion, and fear of God, yield themselves up to all profaneness of life, neither regarding honesty at home, nor shewing mercy to their neighbours abroad.

Christ our Saviour saith, Matt. v. "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy:" but judgment without mercy shall be executed on them which have shewed no mercy, &c. and St. John saith, 1 John iv. "He that seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him." Again, Isaiah crieth out against such profane drunkards, "Woe be unto them that rise up early to follow drunkenness, and to them that so continue until night, till they be set on fire with wine. In those companies are harps and lutes, tabrets and pipes, and wine: but they regard not the works of the Lord, and consider not the operation of his hands," &c. Woe be unto them that are strong to spue out wine, and expert to set up drunkenness.

The punishments of such as are dead, are wholesome documents to such as are alive. Therefore, as the story above exemplified may serve to warn all courtiers and yeomen of the guard; so by what followeth, I would admonish all gentlemen to take heed in time, and forsake their outrageous swearing and blaspheming of the Lord their God.

In the reign of king Edward, there was in Cornwall a certain lusty young gentleman, who rode in company with other gentlemen, and their servants, to the number of about forty horsemen. This youngster entering into conversation with some of them, began to swear most horribly, blaspheming the name of God, with other ribaldry words besides. One of the company, not able to abide the hearing of such blasphemous abomination, told him in gentle words, that he should give answer and account for every idle word.

The gentleman, offended thereat, said, Why takest thou thought for me? take thought for thy winding-sheet. Well, said the other, amend, for death giveth no warning; for as soon cometh a lamb's skin to the market as an old sheep's. God's wounds, saith he, care not thou for me; raging still after this manner worse and worse in words, till at length, on their journey, they came riding over a large bridge, standing over a piece of an arm of the sea. Upon which bridge this gentleman swearer spurred his horse in such a manner, that he sprang clean over with him on his back; who, as he was going, exclaimed, Horse and man, and all to the devil. This terrible story happening at a town in Cornwall, I would have been afraid to have related here, but for the testimony of Mr. Heynes, a minister, who was both the reprehender of his swearing, and witness of his death. Ridley, then bishop of London, also preached and declared the same fact and example at Paul's Cross. The name of the gentleman I could by no means obtain of the party and witness aforesaid, for dread of those (as he said) of his kindred who yet remained in the said county.

Having now sufficiently admonished, first the courtiers, then the gentlemen, now thirdly, for a brief admonition to the lawyers, we will here insert the strange end and death of one Henry Smith, a student of the law.
